RELIGION.

1. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself.
2. The root of religion is universal human nature.
3. Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root.
4. Historical religions are all different, in virtue of their different historical origin and development.
5. Every historical religion has thus two distinct elements,—one universal or spiritual, and the other special or historical.
6. The universal element is the same in all historical religions; the special element is peculiar in each of them.
7. The universal and the special elements are equally essential to the existence of an historical religion.
8. The unity of all religions must be sought in their universal element.
9. The peculiar character of each religion must be sought in its special element.

RELATION OF JUDAISM TO CHRISTIANITY.

10. The idea of a coming "kingdom of heaven" arose naturally in the Hebrew mind after the decay of the Davidic monarchy, and ripened under foreign oppression into a passionate longing and expectation.
11. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be a world-wide empire on this earth, both temporal and spiritual, to be established on the ruins of the great empires of antiquity by the miraculous intervention of Jehovah.
12. The Messiah or Christ was to reign over the "kingdom of heaven" as the visible deputy of Jehovah, who was considered the true sovereign of the Hebrew nation. He was to be a Priest-King,—the supreme pontiff or high-priest of the Hebrew church, and absolute monarch of the Hebrew state.
13. The "apocalyptic literature" of the Jews exhibits the gradual formation and growth of the idea of the Messianic "kingdom of heaven."
14. All the leading features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "kingdom of heaven," the "end of the world," the "great day of judgment," the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," the "resurrection of the dead," the condemnation of the wicked and the exaltation of the righteous, the "passing away of the heavens and earth," and the appearance of a "new heaven and a new earth," were definitely formed and firmly fixed in the Hebrew mind, in the century before Jesus was born.
15. John the Baptist came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." But he declared himself merely the forerunner of the Messiah.
16. Jesus also came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and announced himself as the Messiah or Christ.
17. Jesus emphasized the spiritual aspect of the Messianic kingdom; but, although he expected his throne to be established by the miraculous intervention of God, and therefore refused to employ human means in establishing it, he nevertheless expected to discharge the political functions of his office as King and Judge, when the fulness of time should arrive.

18. As a preacher of purely spiritual truth, Jesus probably stands at the head of all the great religious teachers of the past.

19. As claimant of the Messianic crown, and founder of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, Jesus shared the spirit of an unenlightened age, and stands on the same level with Gautama or Mohammed.

20. In the belief of his disciples, the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus would not prevent the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven." His throne was conceived to be already established in the heavens; and the early church impatiently awaited its establishment on earth at the "second coming of the Christ."

21. Christianity thus appears as simply the complete development of Judaism,—the highest possible fulfilment of the Messianic dreams based on the Hebrew conception of a "chosen people."

CHRISTIANITY.

22. Christianity is the historical religion taught in the Christian Scriptures, and illustrated in the history of the Christian church.

23. It is a religion in virtue of its universal element; it is the Christian religion in virtue of its special element.

24. The Christian Scriptures teach, from beginning to end, that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God,"—that is, the Hebrew Messiah. This, the Christian Confession, was declared both by Jesus and the apostles to be necessary to salvation or admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

25. The Christian church, from its origin to the present day, has everywhere planted itself on faith in the Christian Confession, as its divinely appointed foundation,—the eternal "rock" against which the "gates of hell shall never prevail."

26. The Christian Confession gradually created on the one hand the theology, and on the other hand the hierarchy, of the Roman Catholic Church. The process was not, as is claimed, a corruption, but a natural and logical development.

27. The Church of Rome embodies Christianity in its most highly developed and perfect form, as a religion of authority based on the Christian Confession.

28. Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of Christianity, whether regarded theologically or ecclesiastically, under the influence of the free spirit of protest against authority.

29. "Liberal Christianity,"—that is, democratic autocracy in religion,—is the highest development of the free spirit of protest against authority which is possible within the Christian church. It is, at the same time, the lowest possible development of faith in the Christ,—a return to the Christian Confession in its crudest and least developed form.

30. Christianity is the religion of Christians, and all Christians are believers in the Christ.

31. The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian Confession is the boundary line of Christianity.

FREE RELIGION.

32. The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion,—the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church.

33. The history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion at the expense of the Christian Religion. As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases.

34. The completion of the religious protest against authority must be the extinction of faith in the Christian Confession.

35. Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law.

36. The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.

37. The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man,—the race serving the individual, the individual serving the race.

38. The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous and universal education of man.

39. The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice of the private soul.

40. The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One.

41. Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion,—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend.

RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO FREE RELIGION

42. Christianity is identical with Free Religion so far as its universal element is concerned,—antagonistic to it so far as its special element is concerned.

43. The corner-stone of Christianity is faith in the Christ. The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in Human Nature.

44. The great institution of Christianity is the Christian Church, the will of the Christ being its supreme law. The great institution of Free Religion is the coming Republic of the World, the universal conscience and reason of mankind being its supreme organic law or constitution.

45. The fellowship of Christianity is limited by the Christian Confession; its brotherhood includes all subjects of the Christ and excludes all others. The fellowship of Free Religion is universal and free; it proclaims the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

46. The practical work of Christianity is to Christianize the world,—to convert all souls to the Christ, and ensure their salvation from the wrath of God. The practical work of Free Religion is to humanize the world,—to make the individual nobler here and now, and to convert the human race into a vast Co-operative Union devoted to universal ends.

47. The spiritual ideal of Christianity is the suppression of self and perfect imitation of Jesus the Christ. The spiritual ideal of Free Religion is the free development of self, and the harmonious education of all its powers to the highest possible degree.

48. The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of Free Religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face; Free Religion is erect on its feet.

49. The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake.—The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

50. Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.

THE GENIUS OF CHRISTIANITY AND FREE RELIGION.

[A lecture delivered Feb. 14, 1869, at Horticultural Hall, Boston, by F. E. ABBOT, in the course of Sunday Afternoon Meetings.]

To say that the age we live in is pre-eminently an era of revolution, is to utter a stale and profitless truism. The fact mirrors itself on every open eye, and voices itself to every unstopped ear. Not merely in the forms of government, the adjustments of society, and other external matters, constant changes occur which are perceptible by all; but the more observing also detect indications of some profound and hidden movement in the depths of the human spirit. The world's heart is ill at ease. Miseries and oppressions and crimes are, it is true, like the poor, ever with us; but cancel these, and the world's unrest will still remain. Its secret inquietude betrays itself even in the tone of the popular poems and novels of the day; and although the Church, abundantly assiduous with prescription and pill, promises to cure the distemper, she encounters a most alarming symptom in the patient's distrust of the physician. In fact, the patient refuses to be a patient; and what the Church accounts disease turns out to be a new-born hunger for truth and life,—a most excellent sign of spiritual health. The world needs, not to be doctored, but to be fed; and whose brings substantial food fairly cooked finds a hearty welcome.

The old faiths, like cotyledons well stored with starch, are perishing as the spring advances, yet only to yield their contents as nourishment for a better faith. Although there are no "new truths" except as the discovery, or ripper development in human thought and life, of truths old as God, yet in this sense new truths are creating to-day a new faith in the world before which the elder faiths lose their power. The grounds of human hope, the motives of human action, the objects of human aspiration, are slowly changing; and because change in these respects involves corresponding change in all the relations of public and private life, the great visible movements of the age are but indices of the greater invisible movements in the spiritual consciousness of mankind. Because all questions of immediate interest in the amelioration of society depend ultimately on deeper questions in the soul, there can be no theme of profounder practical importance than that to which I now invite your attention,—the "Genius of Christianity and Free Religion." In the conflict between these two faiths, and in the law of spiritual development by which the one must increase and the other decrease, lies, as I believe, the secret of the religious restlessness of the times. With the seriousness befitting so great a subject, and yet with no shrinking from the plainness of speech which equally befits it, I wish to express convictions, neither hastily formed nor weakly held, for which I ask from you only a calm and candid hearing. Whether right or wrong, they must affect profoundly the well-being of every one who makes them the basis of intelligent and fearless action. Let them, then, be intelligently and fearlessly judged.

THE UNITY IN DIVERSITY OF ALL RELIGIONS.

A savage coming of the sea-shore at several distant points, might perhaps imagine that he had come to several disconnected seas, not knowing that the sea is one. So he who beholds without reflection the great religions of the world might conceive these to be separate and distinct, not knowing that religion is one. It must have been from some such conception as this that men used to class Christianity by itself as wholly true, and all other religions in a group by themselves as wholly false. But this distinction cannot stand. The question of the truth or falsity of different religions is purely a question of degree. They are all expressions of the universal aspiration of humanity, and are so far all based on eternal truth. But each of them has its own special historic form, determined by the personality of its founder, by the spirit of the age in which it arose, and by the character of the historic forces by which it was developed; and so far it must share the error which clings to all things human. The worst religion has its truth,—the best has its error. Thus all religions are one, in virtue of their common origin in the aspiring and worshipping spirit of man; while they are many, in virtue of the historic form peculiar to each. The universal element in each belongs, not to it, but to universal human nature; while its special element, its historic form, is its own.

Whoever, therefore, would find the oneness of all religions must seek it in the universal spiritual consciousness of the race; while he who would learn the characteristics of any particular religion, must seek this in its history and origin. The object of the first seeker is generic unity,—the object of the second is specific difference. Their methods, consequently, must correspond with their objects, and be the converse of each other. The one must neglect peculiarities, and attend to resemblances; the other must neglect resemblances, and attend to peculiarities. To claim as peculiar to one religion what is common to all religions,—a claim often made in behalf of Christianity,—is unreasonable; but it is equally unreasonable to ignore its actual peculiarities. No estimate of a great historical religion can be just, unless formed by the impartial, scientific application of the historical method.

CHRISTIANITY TO BE STUDIED HISTORICALLY.

In attempting, therefore, to determine what Christianity actually is, as a great fact in human history, I shall not endeavor to frame a transcendental or mystical formula, and thus, spider-like, evolve a definition of it out of my own consciousness. On the contrary, believing Christianity to be the loftiest of all histor-cal religions, I believe that, like all other historical religions, it can only be understood by the study of its sacred books, its traditions, its institutions, its origin, its history. What were the ideas, purposes, and character of Jesus, and what was the nature of the faith which took its name from him and became Christianity as we see it in the world to-day, must be learned historically or not at all. Abstract speculation can throw no light on these questions of fact. History is the key to the problem of Christianity.

CHRISTIANITY HISTORICALLY DEFINED.

Viewed, then, as one of the world's great historical faiths, Christianity is religion as taught in the New Testament, illustrated in the history of the Christian Church, and based on faith in Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ of God.

If we attempt to make Christianity independent of its founder and of the only records we possess of his life and teachings (an attempt sometimes made by modern radical thinkers), we simply abandon the historical ground altogether, identify Christianity with Religion, and annihilate the specific difference between Christianity and all other historical faiths. It thereby becomes impossible to distinguish it from them on the same level; we resolve it into "natural religion," and must treat all other religions as merely various modifications of it. I need not say how arbitrary and irrational this seems to me. If Christianity is itself "natural religion,"—only love to God and love to man,—how can we escape calling Brahmanism and Buddhism and Confucianism and the rest different forms of Christianity? Would there be nothing absurd in that? If on the other hand we say that religion is always natural, and that Christianity, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Zoroastrianism, Mahometanism, and so forth, are all diverse historical forms of this one natural religion, I think we take the only sensible ground. We then put all historical faiths on the same level, and can distinguish them one from another by their different historical characters. But to do this is at once to sweep away all the fine-spun metaphysical, transcendental, and purely ethical definitions of Christianity, in order to make room for its only historical definition, namely, religion as taught in the New Testament, illustrated in the history of the Christian Church, and based on faith in Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ of God.

THE UNIVERSAL ELEMENT IN CHRISTIANITY.

The ethical and spiritual teachings of the New Testament are not peculiar to it; as is well known, they can all be paralleled in other ancient writings. These, therefore, will not help us to comprehend that which is peculiar to Christianity and makes it a distinct historical religion; they belong to the universal religion of man, appear in the sacred books of all religions, and are the private property of none. In accordance with the true historical method, therefore, I shall pass by these universal truths, which find perhaps their best expression in the New Testament, in order to concentrate our attention on the fundamental characteristic of Christianity, namely, its faith in the Christ. It is this which separates it from all other religions, constitutes its prime peculiarity, and serves as foundation to the other leading doctrines of Christian theology. Purity, benevolence, mercy, forgiveness, humility, self-sacrifice, love, and so forth, are nowhere more beautifully taught than in the discourses, conversations, and parables of Jesus; but these make the universal, not the special, element in the New Testament.—these make its religion, not its Christianity,—and it is now its Christianity that we seek to comprehend.

THE SPECIAL ELEMENT IN CHRISTIANITY.

So far as our present object is concerned, we need not be embarrassed by the doubts resting over the authorship, the dates, and the historic credibility of the various books of the New Testament. No critical scholar of the present day regards the gospels as wholly mythical. Yet, unless they are wholly mythical, it is impossible to doubt that Jesus did actually claim to be the Christ or Messiah, that is, the founder and sovereign of the "kingdom of heaven." So all-pervading is this claim, that to eliminate it from the gospels is to reduce them at once to unadulterated myth. If misunderstood on this point, there is no reason to suppose that Jesus has been understood on any point; if his reported sayings on this subject are unguanine, there is no reason to suppose any of his sayings to be genuine. In the words of James Martineau [National Review, April, 1863]:—"Whoever can read the New Testament with a fresh eye, must be struck with the prominence everywhere of the Messianic idea. It seems to be the ideal frame-work of the whole—of history, parable, dialogue; of Pauline reasoning; of Apocalyptic visions. 'Art thou he that should come?' This question gives the ideal standard by which, on all hands,—on the part of disciples, relations, enemies, of Saul the persecutor and Paul the apostle,—the person and pretensions of Christ are tried. His birth, his acts, his sufferings, are so disposed as to 'fulfill what was spoken' by the prophets: so that the whole programme of his life would seem to have pre-existed in the national imagination."

THE MESSIANIC IDEA THE SOUL OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

That these words of Martineau are true, I am profoundly convinced. The Messianic faith is the soul of the entire New Testament, giving unity to the gospels, epistles, and apocalypse, and making Christianity a vital organism. In vain shall we seek to comprehend the spiritual power of Christianity, and determine its agency in the evolution of modern civilization, until we have first comprehended the Messianic idea, and discovered the sources, the channels, and the limitations of its power. In vain shall we seek to solve the mystery of that spiritual Nile which has fertilized the centuries, until we discover its Lake Nyanza in the Messianic hope of Judaism and its widening Delta in the advent of Free Religion. History, not theology, must reveal the true origin of Christianity; and when we are prepared to accept her calm instructions, we shall learn that the greatest of the world's historical religions is no bastard with the bar-sinister of miracle athwart its scutcheon, but the lawful offspring of Jewish faith and Greek thought. In the New Testament, if we will but read aright, is ample proof of its pedigree. In the first three gospels we find the Jewish Messiahship assumed by Jesus; in the fourth gospel, we find it interpreted by the Logos doctrine, and thus rationalized by Greek philosophy; in the book of Acts and in the Epistles we find it stripped by Peter and Paul of its local and national limitations, and thus fitted to become the basis of a world-wide church. The organizing genius of Rome supplied the element necessary to convert the idea into an institution; and the triumph of Christianity was assured.

THE MESSIANIC IDEA THE GREAT TAP-ROOT OF CHRISTIANITY.

Here, then, in the New Testament itself, the Messianic idea appears as the great tap-root of Christianity; and we see, already fulfilled, all the intrinsic spiritual conditions of its subsequent growth. Given the corresponding extrinsic historical conditions, what need of a miracle to account for its wonderful development? It would have been a miracle indeed, if, in the actual state of the Roman Empire at that time, Christianity had failed to become the State Religion. Into what a melancholy and senile decrepitude had fallen its pagan competitors! The decaying mythologies of Persia, Egypt, Greece, Rome, were the spiritual compost whence the vigorous young plant derived its sap. Universal putrefaction is a powerful fertilizer. To the rapid spread of every religion, however rapid (and Christianity is in this respect no more remarkable than Buddhism or Mahometanism), the same explanation applies,—adaptation to the spirit and circumstances of the times. It is customary among Unitarians to extol the purity of "primitive Christianity," and to bewail what they call its theological and ecclesiastical "corruption" during the first three centuries. This is to praise the blossom at the expense of the fruit,—to indulge in that idealization of childhood which is practical depreciation of manhood. The triumph of Athanasius over Arius, and of Augustine over Pelagius, was not accidental. On the contrary, the gradual formation of the Athanasian and Augustinian theology was the strictly logical and natural development of the claim made by Jesus of being the Savior of the world; while the gradual erection of the Romish hierarchy was the equally logical and natural result of the attempt to found a universal church upon this claim. How could a man be the Savior of the world? Only by being also God. The Romish Church with its theology of salvation through the God-Man, so far from being a "corruption of primitive Christianity," was its necessary historical evolution; the Messianic idea, freed from its merely Hebrew application, enfolded mediæval Catholicism as the acorn enfolds the oak. As the Jewish theocracy was at last obliged to enshrine an earthly king as a representative of Jehovah, so the Christian Church was obliged at last to enshrine the Pope as representative of the Christ. It betrays, therefore, a lack of the philosophical, the scientific, the historical spirit, to call that a corruption which was in truth a development.

ROMANISM THE TRUE CHRISTIANITY.

As the history of philosophical systems is the truest exponent of their logical tendencies, so the history of religions is the truest interpreter of their genius and innermost spirit. The Romish Church, whether in its hierarchy, its institutions, its architecture, its painting, its music, its literature, its theology, its spiritual power, its types of spiritual character, or its missionary zeal, is the ripened fruit of the Messianic germ, the supreme culmination of Christianity. Christian poetry and art, no less than Christian character and faith, have reached their zenith in the Catholic Church. The cathedrals, the Madonnas, the anthems, Dante's Divine Comedy (the great poem of Christianity, setting it to eternal music), were born in the souls of Catholics. The Protestant Reformation was simply the first stage in the decay of Christianity. In Wickliffe and Huss, in Luther and Calvin and their compeers, the modern spirit came to self-consciousness. These men were, although unwittingly, the first apostles of Free Religion. Socinus, Priestly, Channing, Parker, and the other reformers of the Reformation, carried the work of disintegration still farther, and gave voice to the deepening demand of humanity for spiritual freedom. "Liberal Christianity," which means Christianity as liberal as it can be, has reduced the Messianic idea to its minimum dimensions and its minimum power; the next step is outside of Christianity altogether. Gradual in its growth and gradual in its decay,—coming to its prime in the Romish, and lying at Death's door in the Unitarian Church,—Christianity has realized the highest possibilities of the Messianic faith, has accomplished the utmost which that faith can accomplish for man, and is now destined to wane before a faith higher and purer still. Its history, from beginning to end, is the history of men's faith in the Christ; its first and last word is, by the law of its being,—"Come to Jesus!" In proportion as the name of Jesus grows infrequent on its lips,—in proportion as his person fails to attract its supreme homage and worship,—in that proportion it ceases to be Christianity, and becomes merged in that universal religion whose only history is the history of soul. Let me repeat, with emphasis, that while Christianity is the perishing form, religion is the eternal substance,—that the universal truths, the inspiring hopes, the tender consolations, the quickening impulses, the divinely beautiful spirit, which have made and still make the name of Christianity so dear to the undistinguishing many, belong to the eternal substance and not to the perishing form. Religion must endure; but as Christianity came into history, so it must go out from history. Its inspiration and life have come in and through its faith in the Christ, the one Lord and Master and Savior of the world; and its Church, or visible embodiment in a social and spiritual fellowship, has planted itself from the beginning on this faith as eternal rock and corner-stone.

STATEMENT OF DR. HEDGE.

There is no clearer recognition of the fundamental character of the Christian Confession than in the following words of Dr. Hedge, a Unitarian clergyman who perceives how much is involved in the apparent truism that Christianity has a history:—

"I am far from maintaining that Christianity must stand or fall with the belief in miracles; but I do maintain that Christian Churches, as organized bodies of believers, must stand or fall with the Christian Confession,—that is, the Confession of Christ as divinely human Master and Head. . . . Things exist in this world by distinction one from another. Enlarge as you will the idea and scope of a church, there must be somewhere, whether stated or not in any formal symbol, a line which defines it, and separates those who are in it from those who are without. The scope of the Liberal Church is large; but everything and everybody cannot be embraced in it. The Christian Confession is its boundary line, within which alone it can do the work which Providence has given it to do. . . . The distinction involved in the Christian Confession is organic and vital; its abolition would be the dissolution of the ecclesiastical world and the end of Christendom."—[Reason in Religion, pp. 218-219.]

THE CHRISTIAN CONFESSION FUNDAMENTAL.

This statement of Dr. Hedge is the verdict of history itself. On the Christian Confession, Jesus himself founded his Church; on the Christian Confession Peter, John, Paul, and the rest, built up its walls; on the Christian Confession, Augustine, Athanasius, and their fellow-workers, roofed and completed the great historic edifice. From the vast ecclesiastical hierarchy of Rome to the puny "National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches" all the sects and sub-sects of Christendom, with one consenting voice, confess that Jesus is the Christ, the Savior of the world, the spiritual King of mankind by the grace of God. In all the endless controversies respecting doctrines, forms, or politics, all parties have accepted the Christian Confession as the universal creed of Christians. Whatever differences of opinion exist or have existed concerning the nature, the official function, or the spiritual mission of the Christ, the Christian Confession has remained the corner-stone of the Christian Church; and a Christian will no more challenge the Christian Confession that "Jesus is the Christ," than a Mahometan will challenge the Mahometan Confession that "there is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet."

THE TESTIMONY OF JESUS.

It is in the first gospel, not the fourth, that Jesus says to Peter, on his confessing him to be "the Christ, the Son of the living God,"—"Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood have not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock [i. e. your faith in me as the Christ] I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." It is in the first gospel, not the fourth, that Jesus replies to the high priest, adjuring him to declare whether he is the Christ,—"I am. Moreover I say to you, Henceforth ye will see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven" [Noyes' translation]. It is in the first gospel, not in the fourth, that Jesus explicitly makes the Christian Confession the necessary condition of salvation:—"Whosoever, therefore, shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father who is in heaven; but whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father who is in heaven." It would be easy to cite scores of passages to the same effect; but these are amply sufficient.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE APOSTLES.

In the same spirit, Peter declares, "in the book of Acts, that 'there is no other name given under heaven whereby men can be saved.' In the same spirit, Paul declares to the Galatians,—"There be some that trouble you and would pervert the gospel of Christ. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed;" and to the Romans,—"If thou shalt confess with the mouth that Jesus is Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God has raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved; for with the heart man believeth so as to obtain righteousness, and with the mouth confesseth so as to obtain salvation." In the same spirit John exclaims in his first epistle,—"Who is a liar, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? Whosoever denieth the Son, the same has not the Father." And so on. Sayings such as these meet the eye on almost every page of the New Testament; and so far from being accidental or non-essential, they utter the heart-faith, the inmost spirit of Christianity, as a distinct religion.

THE GREAT AIM OF JESUS.

The one grand aim of Jesus was to establish the "kingdom of heaven;" and this, however universalized and spiritualized, was in essence the ancient ideal theocracy, in which the Christ was to be the God-appointed king. From the day when, on the very eve of death, Jesus boldly affirmed before Pilate and the high priest his title to the Messianic throne, the highest and deepest prayer of his disciples has been that his throne may be established forever in the hearts of all mankind. Was it an accident that the new faith took its name, not from the individual Jesus, but from his royal office? Christianity was the faith of the Christians, and the Christians were those who believed in the Christ. Hence the condition of Christian fellowship has always been fealty to Jesus as common Lord and Master; and in this, the organic bond of union in all branches of the Christian Church, the innermost life of Christianity has, by the very law of its being, only expressed itself outwardly in social form. In short, the history of Christianity is simply the history of the Messianic faith, deepened and widened, developed and spiritualized, in the highest possible degree,—the history of the varying fortunes which have befallen the attempt of Jesus to found a universal spiritual empire in the hearts of men; and he will seek in vain to fathom the depths of Christianity who looks elsewhere than to this Messianic faith for the secret of its peculiar religious power.

THE NATURAL ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY.

Furthermore, unless liberal thinkers cease to philosophize loosely about Christianity and learn to do complete justice to its Messianic or special element, a problem of great importance will remain permanently insoluble. It is only by tracing the course of the Messianic idea back to its fountain-head in the living faith of Judaism, that it becomes possible to discover the natural origin of Christianity. If the sources of Christianity reach no further back than to the individual soul of Jesus,—if so mighty a power in the world's history was born of one man's single life, and owed nothing to earlier ancestors,—if no deep unity can be discovered between Jesus and the spirit of his age, in virtue of which he became the natural representative of humanity in his day and generation and brought to a living focus the religious forces of his times,—then is Christianity indeed a miracle, and Jesus may well have been God. The naturalistic interpretation of Christianity fails utterly, unless it can reveal an adequate cause for its tremendous influence on the course of history. Once admit that a Jewish peasant lifted the whole world up to a higher spiritual level, not by embodying in himself the best religious life of his era, but by the sheer strength of his own individuality,—and I, for one, must perforce admit him to have been Omnipotence in disguise. The incarnation of God would be a less miracle than the upheaval of the planet by a human arm. But if Jesus was a man, and acted under natural human conditions, then his power must have been the power of humanity; behind him, beneath him, within him, must have been the spirit of his age, concentrating in his word the vitality of his race. Somewhere must he have found a foothold in the profoundest faith of his own nation, or he could not have moved the universal consciousness of man. The secret of success, with every great soul, lies in sympathy with his times, without which his most magnificent utterance perishes on the air. Given, therefore, the humanity of Jesus, it is imperatively necessary to discover the faith which he and his countrymen must have held in common. Where shall we search for this except in that Messianic idea which is the core and heart of his religion?

THE KEY TO THE PROBLEM.

Here we find established a vital relation between Jesus and the Hebrew people. The moment we accept the clew here offered, the labyrinth ceases to bewilder,—our path is clear. It would be at the same time tedious and pedantic, were I to rehearse in detail the evidence which has convinced my own mind that Christianity is only a developed Judaism. From the time of the Babylonish Captivity, the narrow theocracy of earlier ages began to develop in Hebrew thought into the dazzling dream of a universal "kingdom of heaven," designed to succeed the great empires of antiquity and to embrace in its dominions all the nations of the globe. The so-called Jewish Apocalyptic literature, which sprang up as a transformation of the primitive prophetism, and of which the most important writings are the book of Daniel, the Sibylline oracles, the book of Enoch, and the fourth book of Esdras, enables us to distinguish successive stages in the formation of the Messianic faith. At first an aristocracy of the saints rather than the monarchy of the Messiah, the conception of the "kingdom of heaven" incorporated into itself more and more of the personal element, until this at last came to predominate. Long before the birth of Jesus, the chief features of the Messianic idea as contained in the New Testament were strongly marked, both with regard to the "end of the world" and the "coming of the Son of Man." The same place, Jerusalem; the same time, the immediate future; the same symptomatic signs, wars and rumors of wars, and the gathering of Gentile armies against Jerusalem; the same coming of the Messiah with his angels on the clouds of heaven; the same solemn Judgment, with the Son of Man on the throne of his glory and all nations before his tribunal; the same sentences to the wicked and the righteous; the same resurrection of the dead from Hades; the same passing away of the old earth and appearance of the new;—all these, and more, were definite Messianic beliefs in the century before Jesus. Nor this alone. The "kingdom of heaven," as conceived in the later of these Apocalyptic writings, was highly spiritual in its character, bringing at once happiness and holiness to all mankind. The "kingdom of heaven" was to ultimate in a universal brotherhood of man, an era of universal peace and righteousness, introduced through universal submission to the Hebrew Messiah or Christ. Every generous aspiration for spiritual perfection and the welfare of humanity thus found its satisfaction in the vision of Messianic redemption to the chosen people of God.

THE EDUCATION OF JESUS.

Into this circle of ideas and national aspirations Jesus was born; and were they not also his own? They were the very atmosphere he breathed; they filled his soul from the earliest days of childhood. The gospels represent him as not wholly illiterate, being able at least to read. He undoubtedly was ignorant of Greek, which even at Jerusalem was but little known and regarded as dangerous in its tendencies; and there is no trace in the gospel narratives of the influence of the Hellenic culture upon his mind. The study of the Mosaic Law was alone considered reputable and safe by devout Jews. The Rabbi Hillel, however, who fifty years before Jesus anticipated his Golden Rule and others of his finest sayings, in all probability exerted a deep influence upon his development. It is evident from the evangelists that Jesus had earnestly pondered the Old Testament, especially Isaiah and the book of Daniel,—perhaps the book of Enoch also, and other Apocalyptic writings. "The advent of the Messiah," says Renan, "with his glories and his terrors, the nations dashing one against another, the cataclysm of heaven and earth, were the familiar food of his imagination; and as these revolutions were thought to be at hand, so that a multitude of people were seeking to compute their times, the supernatural order of things into which such visions transport us appeared to him from the first perfectly natural." The conception of universal and invariable laws of nature which had been developed to a considerable degree in the Greek mind by the philosophy of Epicurus, and which, nearly a century before the birth of Jesus, had been admirably stated by Lucretius in his great poem on "The Nature of Things," was utterly foreign to the thought of Jesus and his countrymen, who believed in the habitual agency of demons and evil spirits, and had unwavering faith in miracles. The great idea of Jesus, the immediate advent of the "kingdom of heaven," was also the dominant idea of his times; but, various attempts to realize it by political means having ended in utter failure, especially that of Judas the Gaulonite or Galilean, he early perceived the folly of military Messianism, and relied implicitly on the establishment of his Messianic throne by the miraculous display of the divine power. Thus was Jesus educated by his age.

HIS ASSUMPTION OF THE MESSIAHSHIP.

Repelled though he was by the vulgar conception of the Christ as a mere warlike prince, the idea of spiritual supremacy through the religious reformation of his people struck a responsive chord in his soul. His deep nature was thrilled and kindled by his country's hope, and with intense earnestness he has asked himself,—"Can I fulfil it? Am I the Called, the Anointed of God?" The consciousness of his wonderful religious genius, fertilized and developed by the spirit of his age, fanned the wish into a prayer, and the prayer into a conviction, and the conviction into an enthusiasm, and the enthusiasm into a calm and omnipotent faith, that he was indeed the Messiah,—singled out from all eternity by the will of God, foretold by prophets and kings, and awaited for weary centuries by humanity in tears. Impossible as it is for the cool intellect of the West to comprehend the mystic fervor, the religious intensity, of the Semitic race, it is yet evident that Jesus acquired faith in his Messianic destiny by an inward experience analogous to that which convinced the prophets of their divine missions. Fathom it or analyze it we cannot; but we can yet perceive that the phenomenon of Hebrew prophetism, with its sublime identification of impassioned thought with the direct mandate of God, repeats itself in the history of the young Galilean carpenter. It is a fact to be studied,—not to be denied.

Let no one meet me here with the bigot's worn-out dilemma,—"If Jesus was not in reality the Messiah he claimed to be, he was either a madman or an impostor!" Was John Brown a madman or an impostor, when he aspired to be the redeemer of an enslaved race? The moral sublimity of such an aim is not to be measured by the six-inch rule of vulgar souls, but by the astronomic spaces of the heavens above. There is a madness that is more than sanity,—a veritable inspiration to dare the impossible, and by bloody failure to achieve a somewhat greater than "success." The hero is always a fool in the eyes of him who counts the cost. If it be madness to obey the enthusiasm of ideas without stopping to count the cost, God grant us all the wisdom to go mad! Such madness is the glory of humanity. The insane man is he whose thought fatally contradicts his surroundings; but he who comprehends the profoundest, though it may be the unconscious, movement of his age, and carries its underlying ideas into fuller and higher development—this man, I say, is the sanest of the sane. To his contemporaries, the idealist is always crazy; to posterity, he appears as the only practical man of his times,—the guide of his generation in the pathway of progress. In the soul of Jesus, the great aspiration of the Hebrew race became purified from its alloys, and stamped forever with the impress of his superior spirit. But, being essentially Hebrew still, it is incapable of expansion into the aspiration of universal humanity; and Jesus, though endowed with that sanity of genius which is madness in the eyes of mediocrity, is no longer in the van.

To him, however, who, in face of sincerity like that of Jesus, ventures to whisper the word imposture, I will not do insult to my own reverence for human greatness by addressing any defence of Jesus from such a charge. It should blister the mouth that makes it. Enough for me that in the privacy of his own self-communings, Jesus believed he heard the summons to a work of unparalleled sublimity—that he valued not his blood in comparison with obedience,—that he claimed the Messianic diadem with death for its Koh-in-noor. Surely, the suspicion of duplicity as the root of such vast historic influence betrays in the suspecter a disgraceful faith in knavery.

HIS CONCEPTION OF THE MESSIAHSHIP.

The transcendent greatness of Jesus appeared in this, that the popular hope of a Priest-King ruling by the sword transformed itself in his musing soul into the sublime idea of a spiritual Christ ruling by love,—that he sought to establish the "kingdom of heaven," not over the bodies, but deep in the hearts, of men. So pure and piercing was his spiritual insight, that, once possessed with the Messianic idea, he entered into the best that was in it, and forgot the rest, seized on the elder and diviner meaning of the prophets, and cast away as rubbish the popular selfishness with which this was overlaid. Believing himself to be the Anointed of God, he aspired to become, not merely king of the Jewish theocracy after its miraculous restoration by God at the great "day of judgment," but also king of the very heart of regenerated humanity. I would fain put upon this ambition the noblest possible construction; for, so far from wishing to make out a case against him, I am only anxious to do him exact justice, and penetrate the spirit of the faith which he bequeathed to mankind. To become the object of human imitation and the quickening ideal of human aspiration,—to be the One Way to purity and love and peace,—to reign in men's souls, as the sun reigns in the solar system, by developing the seeds of all goodness and beauty,—this, and no selfish empire, was the ambition of Jesus. He aimed to be Lord and King by drawing all men to God, and thus to make himself the great centre of the world's divinest life. To reconcile his supreme self-emphasis with his supreme self-sacrifice, is the great perplexing problem of the gospels. The doctrine of his Deity, which is the orthodox solution, is not a possible one to humanitarian thinkers. Where shall we find another?

THE ORIGINALITY OF JESUS.

On the one hand, the claim of Jesus to the Messianic crown did not grow out of a vulgar lust of power, but out of a profound faith that it was God's will that he should wear it. Belief in the "divine right of kings" was universal in the Jewish world, and Jesus fully shared it. How it happened that he first became convinced of his own divine election to the throne of the "kingdom of heaven," will never, I think, be explained; that is a secret, buried with him. But that he did become convinced of it, and that this profound conviction, rather than any desire of personal aggrandizement, was the root of his Messianic claim, seems to me the simple verdict of justice. His self-emphasis, therefore, was the necessary product of his education, his spiritual experience, and his faith in God; and in the necessity of this connection between cause and effect, lies his defence against the charge of over-weening and selfish egotism. But there was nothing original in this conviction of a special Divine mission; every founder of a religion shares it. The true originality of Jesus lies, I conceive, in the means he adopted to accomplish his end and realize his ambition. Here he stands alone. Strange as it may seem, he aimed to win absolute power by absolutely renouncing it. This is the identification of contradictions,—the very Hegelianism of conscience. With a new conception of what constitutes true royalty of soul, he sought to earn his kingship by the more than regal majesty of his service. The "great Masters" have been rare indeed,—yet how much rarer have been the great Servants! It is the grandest and most original trait in Jesus' character, that he sought to realize his supreme Mastership through a supreme Servantship. Here lies the reconciliation of his self-emphasis and self-renunciation. Here also I find the secret of his wonderful success in subduing souls to his sway. He would govern, yet through love,—he would secure absolute allegiance, yet bind men to it by the spontaneous outflow of their own gratitude,—he would wear a crown, yet bow his head to receive it from the hands of subjects burning with eagerness to place it there. Thus, and thus alone, he aspired to reign, the welcome Sovereign of every human soul.

THE IMPERFECTION OF HIS IDEAL.

What astounding, yet sublime, audacity! How mean, compared with this, the ambitions of Alexanders and Cæsars and Napoleons! How brutal is the ambition that relies on force, compared with the ambition that relies on love! Yet, because it involved his own elevation to a throne, albeit a spiritual throne, his ambition was ambition still, the "last infirmity" of a most noble mind. It precluded the possibility of self-forgetfulness in service,—of that supreme modesty which teaches that the value of the grandest soul is not personal, but inheres in the universal humanity it contains and the universal ideas it represents. There is but one ambition sublime, than to REIGN BY SERVING,—and that is, to SERVE WITHOUT REIGNING. I cannot shut my eyes to the nobler purpose; I cannot forget that Socrates both lived and died to make it real.

THE RADICAL DEFECT OF CHRISTIANITY..

In vain is all the modern noise and bustle about a "Liberal" Christianity. Christianity is based on forgetfulness of liberty; the love of perfect freedom is not in it. Spiritual servitude is its cornerstone,—none the less hurtful, if voluntary. Many a slave has loved his chains. Interpret as loosely as you may the Lordship which Jesus claimed,—it is no Lordship at all, if it leaves the soul supreme Lord over itself. Run down the scale from slavish imitation to simple deference,—it avails nought; there is no spiritual freedom but in reverence for the still, small voice within the soul as supreme above all other voices. This made the greatness of Jesus himself; would that he had fostered it in his disciples! Yet no! Even the mistakes of lofty spirits help on the great cause of human development; and mistaken as was the Messianic ambition of Jesus, the world's debt is immense to this magnificent mistake. Mankind were not yet ripe for self-government in spiritual freedom,—are not wholly ripe for it to-day,—will not be wholly ripe for it this many a long year. The overpowering influence of a spiritual King whose law was love, met the world's wants as the freedom of self-government could not then have done; and thus the gospel of authority accomplished a work not yet possible to the modern gospel of spiritual liberty. The grave responsibilities of independence befit only the ripe maturity of the soul.

THE CONFINES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Whether we consider Christianity with regard to its essence, its origin, or its history, we are thus led to one and the same conclusion,—that its fundamental characteristic as a distinct religion is its faith in Jesus as the Christ. Faith in a Christ or Messiah as "the coming man" had become, long prior to the birth of Jesus, an integral part of Hebrew monotheism; and Christianity, historically considered, is only the complete development of Judaism into its highest possibilities. "In its earliest aspect," says Martineau, "Christianity was no new or universal religion; Judaism had found the person of its Messiah, but else remained the same." All of high truth and spiritual power that are compatible with the Messianic idea, Jesus, I believe, put into it, when he made it the cornerstone of his religion. The Christian Church has expressed outwardly the genuine character of Messianism, and realized, both in their best and in their worst directions, its necessary historical tendencies. Gradually developing until the Papacy reached the zenith of its prosperity, and gradually decaying from that day to this, Christianity becomes daily more and more discordant with modern civilization and modern religion; and those sects that dream of adapting it to modern life, are unconsciously officiating at its funeral. Construe it as largely or as loosely as you please, Christianity, as a great historical and spiritual power, will nevertheless remain religion within the limits of the Messianic idea. Idealize or transcendentalize the Christ as highly as you may, his practical power is gone, the moment you make him aught less than a person. It is the vitality of Jesus that has made, and still makes, the vitality of his religion. Pass beyond the circle of its supreme influence, and, whether you know it or not, you have passed outside of Christianity. Detach Christianity wholly from the person of Jesus, and you destroy all meaning in the Christian name by destroying the historic root from which it sprang. The Christian Confession remains the boundary line which no Christian can overstep.

THE CHRISTIAN NAME.

However some may yearn, having lost all faith in the Messianic idea, to retain nevertheless the Christian name, whether from love for its venerable associations or from reluctance to bear the odium of its distinct rejection, I believe that the proprieties of language and increasing perception of what consistency requires will slowly wean them from this desire. The world at large can never be made to understand what is meant by a Christian who in no sense has faith in the Christ. If Jesus really claimed to be the Christ,—if he made this claim the basis of the Christian religion,—and if through this claim he still infuses into his Church all its Christian life,—then the world is right, and may well marvel at a Christianity that denies the Lord, yet wears his livery. For myself, I cannot evade the practical consequences of my thought. The central doctrine of Christianity is for me no longer true; its essential spirit and faith are no longer the highest or the best; and with the reality, I resign the name. Far be it from me to do this in levity or mockery or defiance! Far be it from me to turn my back in scorn on my own most hallowed experiences in the past! Once I felt the full power of the Christian faith; now I cleave to a faith diviner still. If I am in fatal error, and rush madly into the woes denounced against the Anti-Christ, even so must it be; but come what may, let me never plunge into the deeper damnation of moral faithlessness, nor make my heart the coffin of a murdered truth!

THE HIGHER FAITH.

If, then, there is a higher faith than Christianity, he who shall cherish it is bound to make known what it is, and how it is higher than Christianity. Bear with me while I endeavor to discharge this duty. It is no easy thing to do. Free Religion, the higher faith I hold, has no history, save the history of the human spirit, striving to work out its destiny in freedom. It is spiritual, not historical,—universal, not special,—inward, not outward. It has no list of doctrines to teach, no Church to extend, no rites to perform, no Bible to expound, no Christ to obey. With none of these things, it is the soul's deep resolve to love the truth, to learn the truth, and to live the truth, uncoerced and free. It is Intellect daring to think, unawed by public opinion. It is Conscience daring to assert a higher law, in face of a corrupted society and a conforming church. It is Will setting at naught the world's tyrannies, and putting into action the private whispers of the still, small voice. It is Heart resting in the universal and changeless Law as eternal and transcendent Love. It is the soul of man asserting its own superiority to all its own creations, burning with deep devotion to the true and just and pure, and identifying its every wish with the perfect order of the universe. It is neither affirmation nor negation of the established, but rather a deep consciousness that all the established is inferior to that which has established it. It is the spirit of self-conscious freedom, aiming evermore at the best, and trusting itself as the architect of character. In fine, it is that sense of spiritual unity with boundless Being which fills the soul with reverence for human nature, and disables it from worshipping aught but the formless, indwelling and omnipresent One.

[Here followed a direct comparison of Christianity with Free Religion with respect to their cornerstones, their terms of fellowship, their social ideals, their moral ideals, and their essential spirit, and a brief summary of their differences. This comparison will be published in greater fullness in the series of six discourses or Sunday essays that will be begun in the next number of THE INDEX. It seems best, for various reasons, not to anticipate it here.]

RELIGION AND ORTHOEPEY.—A valued friend in California, who teaches all the week and preaches on Sunday, sends the following, which is too good to be pigeon-holed:—"Possibly in some odd corner you might give a place to this suggestion of a teacher about the prevailing bad pronunciation of God as Gaud,—that the only authority for it is in the lines:

'With sacred awe pronounce His name,
Whom words nor thoughts can reach.'"

THE NATURAL RADICALISM OF CHILDHOOD.—We recently received a letter from a lady containing the following passage:—"I felt like urging you to have a rational Sunday School for the children. My little girl, when nine years old, came home from the Universalist Sunday School with this protest,—'Why, mamma, I can't believe Jesus rose and went up with his body, for if he was like God, he would not want any body. Then he would not have to go up to get to God. And they can't make me believe Jesus did it for a show.' A year later she said,—'Mamma, our holy land isn't in that far-off old country, is it? Iowa is the holy land to me.' 'Why?' I asked. 'Here I got to be, and here I knew God.'"

The men who not only did not fight to put down the rebellion, and who did their best to prevent others from fighting in the same behalf, and who have been howling "Nigger" at the top of their voice ever since the rebellion was put down, are referred to General Sheridan's manly words at Cincinnati: "The man who is good enough to share my dangers on the battle-field, as well as to die there, if need be, is good enough to stand up beside me and vote." This has the ring of the gallant General. "Turn the other way, boys!" on the battle-field; and this is precisely one of those cases in which a man has earned the right to express an opinion, which those who neither fought, spoke, or paid money to save the Republic, most decidedly have not. —*N. PROSPECTUS.

"THE INDEX."

THE INDEX will aim at a two-fold object, positive and negative.

It will aim, above all things, to increase pure and genuine RELIGION in the world,—to develop a nobler spirit and higher purpose both in society and the individual. It will aim, at the same time, to increase FREEDOM in the world,—to destroy every species of spiritual slavery, to expose every form of superstition, to encourage independence of thought and action in all matters that concern belief, character or conduct. It will, in short, be devoted to the cause of FREE RELIGION, which it proposes to advocate with the utmost ability and moral earnestness it can command.

Without limiting itself to any of the great reformatory movements of the time, it proposes to work for them all in the most efficient way, by fostering the spirit of reform, and by uprooting every conservative prejudice by which reform is checked. Uncompromising, fearless, radical, it will put faith in ideas, and work for them openly, regardless of all consequences. Its only policy will be strong thought and plain speech. It will neither seek nor shun to "shock" the religious nerve. Standing squarely outside of Christianity, it will yet aim to be just to it, recognizing its excellencies, noting its defects. It will pay no deference to the authority of the Bible, the Church, or the Christ, but rest solely on the authority of right reason and good conscience. It will trust no revelation but that of universal human faculties. It will accept every certified result of science, philosophy, and historical criticism, asking no question what it proves. Briefly, it will seek the truth and work for humanity, believing that man, who makes all institutions, can re-make or un-make them as well, and that he is abundantly able to take care of himself, without the help of kingcraft or priestcraft.

THE INDEX will be the organ of no party in politics and no sect in religion. The Editor will speak for himself alone, and so will each contributor; neither will commit the other. The only tests in the acceptance of articles will be ability, fairness, courtesy, and pure moral tone; in the application of these tests, the Editor will take all responsibility. No article will be rejected because of its opinions as such. Theism and Atheism, Spiritualism and Materialism, Transcendentalism and Positivism, Free Religion and Christianity—in short, every phase of earnest thought—shall have a fair chance to be heard, and on equal terms.

The first number of THE INDEX will contain in full the lecture on "The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion," delivered in Boston by the Editor in the well known course of Sunday afternoon Meetings held at Horticultural Hall during the spring of 1869. This will be followed by a series of six discourses, designed further to illustrate and explain the great religious revolution of the age, upon the following subjects:

1. What is Christianity?
2. What is Free Religion?
3. Christianity and Free Religion Contrasted as to Corner-stones.
4. Christianity and Free Religion Contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal and Essential Spirit.

5. The Practical Work of Free Religion.

6. Unitarianism versus Freedom.

Each succeeding number of THE INDEX will contain a lecture or discourse by the Editor, short and shotted articles, paragraphs, selections, &c., &c. The co-operation of able and distinguished contributors has been promised. A certain space in each number, offered for the exclusive use of the President (Rev. O. B. Frothingham) and Secretary (Rev. W. J. Potter) of the American Free Religious Association, has been accepted by a unanimous vote of the Executive Committee. No pains will be spared to make the paper strong and scholarly, yet intelligible and interesting to all earnest minds.

Subscriptions and contributed articles (which are invited from all thoughtful persons) may be sent at present to the Editor, Lock-box 19, Toledo, Ohio.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.
TOLEDO, OHIO, Nov. 1, 1869.

In order to avoid all necessity of public appeals or private "dunning" letters, THE INDEX will be continued to those only whose subscriptions are sent in before February 1. Neglect in this respect will be construed as a notification that the paper is no longer wanted.

THE INDEX will succeed, if its real friends put their shoulders to the wheel. The way is simple:

- 1st. Subscribe yourself.
- 2d. Obtain subscribers among your friends and acquaintances.
- 3d. Send the name and post-office address of all persons likely to subscribe.

The present number of THE INDEX will be sent to many persons who have not subscribed for it. Any one of these who may wish it continued will please forward name and post-office address, distinctly written, together with the price of subscription for the period desired. Money-orders preferred. All enclosures of currency must be at the risk of the sender.

Several weeks after the issue of our Prospectus, we received a copy of a monthly Evangelical journal, published in Milwaukee, and bearing the name of "The Index." If we had been aware of the existence of our Wisconsin friend, we should have chosen another name. But there will be no confusion. The Milwaukee Index points backward to the religion of Authority; we mean to point forward to the religion of Freedom. Every cross-roads should have a guide-post with two arms.

The following paragraph from our namesake, however, shows that both papers agree in the main on the proper meaning of the term Christian:—

We ask those who style themselves Liberal Christians, to define the meaning of those terms. We understand a Christian to be a believer in the doctrines of Christ, the Messiah, the Anointed. That term has always been applied to those who accept the divinity of Jesus Christ, that He is the Son of God as taught in the Holy Scriptures. How is it possible then for those who deny His Divinity, to call themselves by His name? Having dishonored and degraded Him, why should they further insult Him by using His name? Let them do away with this imposition, and not in this very illiberal manner insinuate themselves among the followers of Him whom they have despised.

On our first page will be found "Fifty Affirmations." They express the individual convictions of the editor, and constitute the general platform of THE INDEX so far as its editorial department is concerned. But they will compromise no contributor to these columns, in which each writer will speak for himself or herself alone. Neither are they to be considered as expressing the views of the Free Religious Association, in the Constitution of which it is distinctly declared that "membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone." It is intended to reprint the "Fifty Affirmations" in each issue, as a standing statement of truths believed to be greatly needed by the times. Thoughtful discussion of any or all of them will be welcomed in THE INDEX. Any error, clearly proved, will be honestly corrected. But THE INDEX nails its flag to the mast.

To reject the Christian name does not necessarily mean to despise either Jesus or his religion.

TO THE FRIENDS OF FREEDOM.

We ask your aid in our enterprise. THE INDEX will be published at least for one year; but probably at a loss. Two thousand subscribers will make the paper self-supporting. If you who are in earnest will subscribe for as many copies as you can afford, distributing them widely, and interest yourself in obtaining other subscribers, there will be no failure. The numerous letters we are receiving from all parts of the country convince us that the times are ripe for our experiment. The land swarms with men and women who are sick of the popular religion, and wait for a faith that shall not belittle them. The mildest form of Christianity preached in the churches fails to meet their just demand. They want ideas, not dogmas,—principles, not persons,—truths, not fictions. It is to such as these that we speak our word. Give them a chance to hear it, if you think it worth hearing.

But we ask no aid from any one who is not convinced that we are on the right track. If what we have to say is not strong, timely, and true,—if it is not the word which the world waits to hear,—we hope to fail. THE INDEX would have no excuse for being, if it were a private speculation. It exists for a purpose. If the purpose is a mistaken one, let it and THE INDEX die together. But if otherwise, Friends of Freedom! we count upon your aid.

THE McFARLAND-RICHARDSON CASE.

We intend to pronounce no judgment on the parties implicated in this wretched affair. No grounds for any such judgment have been certified to the public. Contradictory ex parte statements have been made, but no one can decide between them. Let the Courts ferret out the truth, and let the public, in simple justice, suspend all judgment as to the guilt or innocence of persons whose misfortunes need no Court to point them out. It is ungenerous and cruel to prejudge a case, in which facts, as yet unknown, should determine the apportionment of blame. The press and the public have been too rash.

But the case raises general questions of grave importance. One of these we would point out, because it is little likely to receive due attention elsewhere; the others we leave for the present to the discussion of other journals. Does modern society obey the Christian law of divorce?

What is this law? It is found in the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. V. 32: "But I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery; and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery." The same explicit declaration is repeated in Matt. XIX, 3-9. If the words of Jesus are the authoritative law of Christianity, then it is perfectly plain that the Christian law unqualifiedly forbids a husband to put away his wife except for adultery on her part,—that it recognises no right in the wife to put away her husband for any cause,—that the husband who puts away his wife except for adultery, and then marries again, commits adultery,—and that whoever marries a woman divorced for any reason but adultery on her part, commits adultery. Jesus taught unequivocally the indissoluble nature of marriage with only one specified exception; and this specified exception is adultery on the part of the wife. In all other cases, divorce is expressly prohibited by him. This, the Christian law of divorce, was re-stated by Augustine in the words,—"Dominus praecepit ne quisquam dimittat uxorem, excepta causa fornicationis," and the Catholic Church insists uncompromisingly on obedience to the law. It was the refusal of Pope Clement VII to sanction the divorce of Henry VIII from Queen Catharine, that precipitated the English Reformation. In this, as in other respects, Romanism is the true Christianity; while Protestantism departs from it.

Now the increasing enlightenment of civilized countries has led to a practical abolition of the Christian law of divorce, although without public consciousness of the fact. Other causes than adultery are deemed sufficient to dissolve the marriage tie in many, if not most of the States of the Union; and not only is this practical violation of the Christian law acquiesced in by the public, but it is not even protested against by the Christian clergy. Gradually the moral sense of the community outgrows the narrow restrictions of the past, and learns to perceive the injustice of laws based on theology. What right has society to legalize prostitution by compelling a man and a woman to live together, when that mutual respect and love which alone justify marriage have died out of their hearts? None whatever. Hence maltreatment, incompatibility of temper and other causes, are silently admitted among the reasons which justify divorce; and the change, however irreconcilable with the Christian law, tends to the honor of the marriage state and the elevation of its ideal. The expediency of divorce for other reasons than adultery has been proved by experience and acknowledged by law; and the vast majority of the Protestant clergy tacitly sanction the fact, though it is a flagrant violation of the gospel they preach.

It is time that the authority of natural morality, by which society thus practically repudiates the obligations of what is called distinctively "Christian" morality, should be publicly recognized. Even in professedly Christian countries, the authority of the Christ is practically disowned, not only in regard to divorce, but also in regard to other important matters that might be specified. Considered from a legal point of view, the sacramental, mystical, or Christian conception of marriage is giving place to the conception of it as a civil contract; and it is this secularization of marriage which has caused the change in our laws of divorce. But how can this change be defended on Christian grounds? It cannot be thus defended. It can only be defended on the ground of natural reason, conscience, and experience. In other words, society begins to exercise the right of self-government, and to resist the attempt of theology to govern it. Let the truth be honestly confessed. In allowing divorce for other reasons than adultery, the American people are violating the law of Christ in obedience to the law of humanity.

From this point of view, the position of the New York Independent concerning the divorce question is passing strange. We quote from a recent editorial on "The Richardson Assassination":

"The horrible case is a new illustration of the folly and wickedness of that semi-superstitious sentiment which, in the name of maintaining the sanctity of marriage, outrageously perverts the very idea of marriage, by compelling the life-long union of two persons, either of whom finds such a union to be loathsome, degrading, and unholy. There is no divine, and there ought to be no human law to compel the continuance of any marriage which, so long as it continues, is nothing better than legalized prostitution. 'Whom God hath joined together'—that, and that only, is the divine idea of marriage. Anything short of that is abomination. To chain two human beings fast to each other's side, against the perpetual protest of galled and wounded human nature, is an offence at which the angels weep. The great, indifferent public have no right to say, either on the basis of any statute law, or on the deeper basis of any popular sentiment, or on the still deeper basis of any supposed religious tenet, that any two individuals, man and woman, shall live together as husband and wife, against the inward protest of their own individual souls. Derived from whatever sources, based on whatever foundation, sanctioned by whatever tradition, such a legalized tyranny is unworthy of a Christian civilization, shamefully perverts the fundamental teachings of Christianity, and destroys the sacred claim of religion to the reverence of mankind."

Down to the closing sentence of this extract we cordially echo every word, (excepting only the allusion to the angels, of whom we know less than Mr. Tilton knows.) The passage is admirable as an utterance of Free Religion. But the "legalized tyranny" against which Mr. Tilton so justly and so eloquently inveighs, is nothing but the practical application of the words of Jesus, forbidding all divorce except for adultery. Do the words of Jesus "shamefully pervert the fundamental teachings of Christianity?" We ask an explanation of this statement. If Mr. Tilton's protest against the "legalized tyranny" which forbids all divorce except for adultery, extends to the precept on which it rests, well and good,—we join him in it. That protest is Free Religion. But, in the name of sincere and manly dealing, we ask him to explain what are those "fundamental teachings of Christianity" which thus abrogate the teachings of Christianity's Lord and Master? Is the disciple above his Lord? To make good his assertion, Mr. Tilton must prove one of two things,—either that his position is not a flat contradiction of the teachings of Jesus, or else that the teachings of Jesus are not the "fundamental teachings of Christianity."

If neither of these things can be proved,—and we believe they cannot be proved,—then why not frankly confess the truth, that the world needs to-day a morality higher in respect to divorce than the morality of the gospel? The age is sick of this conjuring with sacred names. It longs to hear Truth speaking in her own right, not stammering out the shibboleth of a "creed outworn." Let us dare to advocate a just reform in the name of justice, trusting that every "legalized tyranny," once unmasked, will be condemned by the universal conscience of mankind. This is the only court from which there is no appeal.

To accept the Christian law of divorce as final would be not only to legalize, but to eternize tyranny.

THE BOSTON "RADICAL."

We would call especial attention to the "RADICAL EXTRA," which we received with the December number of this very able periodical, and the larger part of which we print on our last page. THE RADICAL and THE INDEX will be co-workers in the same general movement,—the one as a monthly magazine, the other as a weekly paper. Five years of admirable service have proved the worth of THE RADICAL in the estimation of the liberal public; and now when it enters on its sixth year, we sincerely hope that it will be with a doubled subscription list. Whoever takes and intelligently reads it, cannot fail to be instructed by it; and we recommend it to every thoughtful person as worth ten times the money it costs.

LETTER FROM MISS COBBE.

26 HEREFORD SQ.,
LONDON, S. W.,
Dec. 5, 1869.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your letter and feel much interested in your project of starting a paper which shall represent the interests of simple Theism. Most heartily I agree in your view that the retention of the Christian name by those who can allow no authority in religion, even to Christ, is a mistake fraught with elements of confusion and insincerity. As our noble allies and fellow-worshippers, the Brahmos of India, have gone back to the name of the Creator, so must we, if we are ever to stand absolutely straight before the world, call ourselves by the title which expresses, not the temporary and partial obligation of one nation or another or even of the whole human race to its greatest prophet, but the eternal and universal allegiance of all to the only God.

The subjects of interest which need to be discussed in the great transition through which we are passing, are of course absolutely boundless. In my humble estimation and from all I can gather of the thoughts of leading minds in this country, the problem of the Future Life will occupy the fore-ground for some time to come. It is in fact the question of the day, to which a distinct "yes" or "no" must be given, and on whose decision, one way or the other, hang portentous results for both religion and morality.

I have jotted down an argument on the subject which I do not think has been hitherto distinctly stated and which may perhaps seem to you likely to interest your readers. It has occupied my mind for a long time.

May I add that the use which you and all my American friends make of the words "Radical" and "Conservative" has a tendency to mislead us? Surely a Radical is, or ought to be, a man who only wishes to uproot what is bad, while a Conservative is one who only wishes to maintain what is good? There is no Radical, I hope, who does not wish to retain what is good in the old, nor any Conservative (in our day, at all events) who does not admit that some reforms are desirable. If we Theists represent ourselves as nothing but Radicals in Religion, and not Conservatives of all that is true and beautiful and holy in the creeds and hopes of the past, do we not stultify ourselves? Our broad groundwork is the universal human sentiment of religion.

With sincere wishes for your success, believe me, Dear sir,

Cordially yours,

FRANCES P. COBBE.

[NOTE.—Miss Cobbe's "Argument" will be printed in our next issue.—ED.]

Poetry.

A BIRTH-DAY PRAYER.

Art Thou the Life?
To Thee, then, do I owe each beat and breath,
And wait Thy ordering of the hour of death,
In peace or strife.

Art Thou the Light?
To Thee, then, in the sunshine or the cloud,
Or in my chamber lone or in the crowd,
I lift my sight.

Art Thou the Truth?
To Thee, then, loved and craved and sought of yore,
I consecrate my manhood o'er and o'er,
As once my youth.

Art Thou the Strong?
To Thee, then, though the air is thick with night,
I trust the seeming-unprotected Right,
And leave the Wrong.

Art Thou the Wise?
To Thee, then, do I fetch each useless care,
And bid my soul unsay her idle prayer,
And hush her cries.

Art Thou the Good?
To Thee, then, with a thirsting heart I turn,
And stand, and at Thy fountain hold my urn,
As aye I stood.

Forgive the call!
I cannot shut Thee from my sense or soul,
I cannot lose me in the boundless whole,—
For Thou art All!

Department

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association accept with cordial gratitude the offer, gratuitously made by the managers of THE INDEX, of a portion of the paper each week, to be devoted specifically to the organized interests of that Association. It has constantly happened since its organization that the Association has felt the need of some regular medium of communication with the public. There are interesting facts to report connected with the general movement which it represents, notices to be given, statements to be made concerning what has been done, or is proposed to be done, extracts from correspondence which might be printed for the benefit of the constituents of the Association, occasional misunderstandings and misrepresentations in the community of the character of the Association which need official correction, and, generally, the specific aims and work of the organization need to be kept before the public.

And it is to such matters as these that this space will be devoted. It will be a department for information rather than for discussion. As to general questions and principles involved in the free religious movement, these will be amply treated in other parts of THE INDEX; and what the officers of the Association may have to say upon these general issues they will prefer to say in the general columns of the paper in their individual capacity rather than here as officials. The President and Secretary, and probably other officers of the Association, will, by invitation of the editor, be regular contributors to the general departments of the INDEX; but only for this portion of the paper will the Association have any official responsibility.

The Free Religious Association, however, though having no official connection with THE INDEX beyond the limits of this department, cannot but most cordially welcome it to the "battle of ideas" which is now being fought in the domain of religion. Fulfilling, as we believe it will, its promise of fearless inquiry, scholarly ability, and a reverent spirit, it must prove a strong champion for religious liberty and progress; and as such may it be generally sustained by the public to whom it makes its appeal.

Having made these prefatory remarks in reference to the connection of the Free Religious Association with THE INDEX, we proceed to give a brief sketch of the ORIGIN OF THE ASSOCIATION.

The immediate occasion which gave the impetus for organizing the Free Religious Association was furnished by the action of the National Conference of the Unitarian denomination at Syracuse, N. Y., in the Autumn of 1866. This action, however, was only the occasion, not the cause, which gave rise to the Association. The cause is to be found in the various progressive and converging religious tendencies of the time, away from the conflicting authorities of specific religious systems and from the bonds of creeds and churches, to a union as broad as humanity itself, on the ground of common aspirations to know the truth and common efforts to live pure and beneficent lives. And it is these tendencies that the Free Religious Association was organized to represent. Still, those who first moved in the matter of organization were a few radical Unitarians, who having made an attempt to broaden the basis of the National Unitarian Conference so as to strike out of it every implication of a creed and make it a platform simply for what was called in a general way Christian work, and having failed in that attempt, first in the conference at New York in 1865, and then at Syracuse, felt that the time had come for some new Association, which should be inclusive of the freest religious thought of the time, and do a work in behalf of spiritual unity and human brotherhood which could not be done by any of the religious denominations. Upon several of the younger men who attended the Syracuse convention, this conviction seems to have been separately impressed with great force before they reached their homes, and they inwardly resolved to do whatever was in their power to carry the conviction into execution. During the autumn two conferences were held in Boston of some ten or twelve persons, most of whom had at least a nominal connection with the Unitarians, at which the general idea of a new Association was discussed. At these conferences opinion was about equally divided for and against organization,—though all were agreed as to the necessity of protesting against the platform of the National Unitarian Conference, and also as to the importance of the objects which it was proposed to work for in the new organization. The objections came from the feeling against organization in general (beyond the individual church,) which very commonly accompanies radical religious ideas. It was urged that an association would necessarily be somewhat artificial and constrained, while the same objects could be in time more effectually reached by individual action.

Still, those who believed that there might be an Association which should be perfectly free, and that the religious interests of the times demanded that the experiment should be tried, were not discouraged. They had anticipated this objection, and only asked that it might not be thrown in the way of their action; and they urged their cause until it was agreed that a larger conference should be called to consider the question. This was done by the following letter of invitation, which was sent to all the Unitarian Ministers in the country who were supposed to be more or less in sympathy with the defeated minority at Syracuse, and to some well-known representatives of free, or independent churches:

"DEAR BROTHER:—Since all prevailing denominational religious organizations set limits, more or less strict, to religious inquiry and fellowship, and since the recent attempts to organize even the most liberal denomination of Christians, as shown in the National Conference of Unitarian Churches, have fallen into the same error, and so have failed to satisfy the demands of Liberal Faith, it is believed the time has come to form a new association, in spiritual bonds, on the basis of Free Thought, for the purpose of bringing like-minded men together, of gathering to a head powers that are working too aimlessly in the same general direction, and of diffusing rational truths by rational methods. The desire is to make a fellowship, not a party; to promote the scientific study of religious truth, not to defend the legacy of theological tradition; to keep open the lines of spiritual freedom, not to close the lines of speculative belief.

You are cordially invited to meet in conference some of your brethren, at the residence of Rev. Dr. Bartol, No. 17 Chestnut Street, Boston, on Tuesday, February 5th, at 11 o'clock, A. M., to consider the possibility and the wisdom of forming such an association,—the condition under which it should be attempted, and the means by which the project may be successfully carried into effect.

As the interest of laymen is of great value, as giving substance and vitality to such a movement, you are invited to bring with you to the conference any friend who may be specially in sympathy with its objects and likely to add weight to its deliberations.

In the hope that our invitation will be cordially responded to and that the conference will result in the strengthening of our liberty in thought and deed, we are Faithfully yours.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM,
JOHN WEISS,
EDWARD C. TOWNE,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
WM. J. POTTER,

In response to this invitation a company of some twenty-five men and women met at the place and time specified. The greater part, probably, were of Unitarian connections or antecedents. But there were also in the company some of the liberal Universalists, some representatives of progressive Quakerism, a number of the special friends, personally and theologically, of Theodore Parker, and others who could not be classed by any denominational or theological relationship. It is due to Rev. Dr. Bartol, whose house and heart were so generously open to the meeting and to the preceding smaller conferences, to say that he was one of those whose temperament and tastes disinclined to any plan of organization, though he was very pronounced and zealous for the objects sought, and has ever been ready to speak a generous word for the Association that was formed. At this conference of February 5th, a plan of organization, which had been carefully digested and prepared by Messrs. Abbot, Towne, and Potter, was presented and made the subject of deliberation. The talk was deeply earnest, searching, candid, and mostly in a broad and generous spirit of sympathy with the underlying objects of the meeting. In the sacred freedom and privacy of the place heart opened to heart. Some utterances there made, for their keen criticism of the popular forms of religion and for their elevation of spiritual tone, can never be forgotten by those who heard them. The conference was prolonged till nearly evening. Of course the same difference of opinion was developed on the general question of organization as at the smaller meetings, though those who did not incline to organization did not press their objections as an obstacle in the path of those who believed in it. Among the Unitarian ministers present, it was evident, also, that there were some who thought it better to reserve all their influence in behalf of spiritual liberty to use in the Unitarian organizations, with the belief that after a time these could be made as broad as could be desired; to which it was replied, that the plan presented in no wise conflicted with action in Unitarian or other denominational organizations, if any conscientiously believed in such action; it simply provided means for doing a work which none of these organizations were doing or aimed to do. The plan was carefully guarded from the beginning against any attempt or liability to form a new sect or to organize merely a fragment of an existing sect. If aimed rather to break down sectarian barriers than to erect new ones.

It has been thought possible that that meeting might adopt some plan of association, but what has since proved the better course prevailed. A committee was appointed by a nearly unanimous vote to call a public meeting, in any way they should deem most expedient, to consider the same questions that had been presented to this conference. This was the better course, because it helped take the movement out of its accidental but too exclusive Unitarian connections, and gave it a wider constituency. It trusted the question of organization to a popular convention. Already on the committee liberal Universalism was represented. And the committee, in their plan of a public meeting, resolved to secure as wide a representation as possible of the various phases of liberal religious thought to be found in the country. They invited representatives of radical and liberal Unitarianism, of liberal Universalism, of the Hicksite and Progressive Friends, of Spiritualism, of Progressive Judaism, of Transcendentalism, and those who could not be classed with any sect or philosophy. And having formed their plan, they issued the following call in the newspapers of Boston and New York:

"A Public Meeting, to consider the conditions, wants, and prospects of Free Religion in America, will be held on Thursday, May 30, (1867,) at 10 A. M. at Horticultural Hall, Boston.

"The following persons have been asked to address the meeting, and addresses may be expected from most of them: R. W. Emerson, John Weiss, Robert Dale Owen, Wm. H. Furness, Lucretia Mott, Henry Blanchard, T. W. Higginson, D. A. Wasson, Isaac M. Wise, Oliver Johnson, F. E. Abbot, and Max Lilienthal.

[Signed] O. B. FROTHINGHAM, }
WM. J. POTTER, } Com.
ROWLAND CONNOR, }

What followed is a matter of public record. A crowded assembly gathered; most of the persons advertised made addresses, and reports of the meeting were spread far and wide. At the afternoon session the plan of Association substantially as presented at the conference, was adopted, and the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION was organized.

Two annual meetings have since been held, mainly on the plan of this first meeting, except that special effort has been made, and both years with success, to secure among the speakers representatives of Orthodox Christianity, and also to give a portion of the sessions to the bearing of religion on questions of practical philanthropy. At both of these annual meetings the liberal division of Judaism has been represented, and at one of them reformed Hinduism, by an admirable letter from its great native apostle, Keshub Chunder Sen.

We here subjoin the Constitution of the Association, together with the officers for the present year, with their P. O. Address:

ARTICLES.

I. This Association shall be called the Free Religious Association—its objects being to promote the interests of pure religion, to encourage the scientific study of theology, and to increase fellowship in the spirit; and to this end, all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations. Any person desiring to co-operate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled, may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business.

III. The officers of the Association shall be a President, three Vice Presidents, a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, a Treasurer, and six Directors, who together shall constitute an Executive Committee, intrusted with all the business and interests of the Association in the interim of its meetings. These officers shall be chosen by ballot, at the Annual Meeting of the Association, and shall hold their offices for one year, or until others be chosen in their place; and they shall have power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number between the annual meetings.

IV. The Annual Meeting of the Association shall be held in the city of Boston, on Thursday of what is known as "Anniversary Week," at such place, and with such sessions as the Executive Committee may appoint, of which, at least one month's previous notice shall be given. Other meetings and conventions may be called by the Committee, according to their judgment, at such times and places as may seem to them desirable.

V. These articles may be amended at any Annual meeting of the Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

RADICAL EXTRA.

The Radical for 1870.

There is less need now than formerly of announcing the future of THE RADICAL. Five years of consistent endeavor have, we trust, secured what no mere profession could gain. Our early promise that the magazine would "enforce the lessons of intellectual freedom and self-dependence," has, we believe, been fairly redeemed. We have never supposed that formal freedom was all; yet it has a substantial meaning in modern times, and rightly plays an important part. But we want thought as well as freedom; and we want, too, better appreciation of the opportunities of freedom. While we bear in mind that the experiment of modern civilization rests solely upon the idea of free-thinking as applied to all classes of people, we must not forget that the problem is a vast one; and the possibility of its failure, because our freedom may be squandered in pursuit of temporary results, should be allowed a stimulating influence.

.... We welcome this critical reflection recently offered by a correspondent: "It is well to insist upon free thought; it is better to think seriously and studiously. Free thought in some instances signifies much freedom and very little thought: but indifference is more fatal to intelligence than chains, racks, fagots, all the implements of persecution." The point is well taken. It is proper to say to Americans generally, "You have given a great emphasis to your Adjective: it is time to equally honor your Noun, to become free-thinkers."....

We are able to announce that our contributors will continue to give character and interest to THE RADICAL.

The City of Toledo.

To Capitalists and Manufacturers.

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.

In 1850—3,829.

In 1860—13,784.

In 1866—24,401.

In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of Railroad and over 800 miles of Canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 60,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of side-walks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

RELIGION.

1. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself.
2. The root of religion is universal human nature.
3. Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root.
4. Historical religions are all different, in virtue of their different historical origin and development.
5. Every historical religion has thus two distinct elements,—one universal or spiritual, and the other special or historical.
6. The universal element is the same in all historical religions; the special element is peculiar in each of them.
7. The universal and the special elements are equally essential to the existence of an historical religion.
8. The unity of all religions must be sought in their universal element.
9. The peculiar character of each religion must be sought in its special element.

RELATION OF JUDAISM TO CHRISTIANITY.

10. The idea of a coming "kingdom of heaven" arose naturally in the Hebrew mind after the decay of the Davidic monarchy, and ripened under foreign oppression into a passionate longing and expectation.
11. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be a world-wide empire on this earth, both temporal and spiritual, to be established on the ruins of the great empires of antiquity by the miraculous intervention of Jehovah.
12. The Messiah or Christ was to reign over the "kingdom of heaven" as the visible deputy of Jehovah, who was considered the true sovereign of the Hebrew nation. He was to be a Priest-King,—the supreme pontiff or high-priest of the Hebrew church, and absolute monarch of the Hebrew state.
13. The "apocalyptic literature" of the Jews exhibits the gradual formation and growth of the idea of the Messianic "kingdom of heaven."
14. All the leading features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "kingdom of heaven," the "end of the world," the "great day of judgment," the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," the "resurrection of the dead," the condemnation of the wicked and the exaltation of the righteous, the "passing away of the heavens and the earth," and the appearance of a "new heaven and a new earth," were definitely formed and firmly fixed in the Hebrew mind, in the century before Jesus was born.
15. John the Baptist came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." But he declared himself merely the forerunner of the Messiah.
16. Jesus also came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and announced himself as the Messiah or Christ.
17. Jesus emphasized the spiritual aspect of the Messianic kingdom; but, although he expected his throne to be established by the miraculous intervention of God, and therefore refused to employ human means in establishing it, he nevertheless expected to discharge the political functions of his office as King and Judge, when the fulness of time should arrive.

18. As a preacher of purely spiritual truth, Jesus probably stands at the head of all the great religious teachers of the past.

19. As claimant of the Messianic crown, and founder of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, Jesus shared the spirit of an unenlightened age, and stands on the same level with Gautama or Mohammed.

20. In the belief of his disciples, the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus would not prevent the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven." His throne was conceived to be already established in the heavens; and the early church impatiently awaited its establishment on earth at the "second coming of the Christ."

21. Christianity thus appears as simply the complete development of Judaism,—the highest possible fulfilment of the Messianic dreams based on the Hebrew conception of a "chosen people."

CHRISTIANITY.

22. Christianity is the historical religion taught in the Christian Scriptures, and illustrated in the history of the Christian church.

23. It is a religion in virtue of its universal element; it is the Christian religion in virtue of its special element.

24. The Christian Scriptures teach, from beginning to end, that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God,"—that is, the Hebrew Messiah. This, the Christian Confession, was declared both by Jesus and the apostles to be necessary to salvation or admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

25. The Christian church, from its origin to the present day, has everywhere planted itself on faith in the Christian Confession, as its divinely appointed foundation,—the eternal "rock" against which the "gates of hell shall never prevail."

26. The Christian Confession gradually created on the one hand the theology, and on the other hand the hierarchy, of the Roman Catholic Church. This process was not, as is claimed, a corruption, but a natural and logical development.

27. The Church of Rome embodies Christianity in its most highly developed and perfect form, as a religion of authority based on the Christian Confession.

28. Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of Christianity, whether regarded theologically or ecclesiastically, under the influence of the free spirit of protest against authority.

29. "Liberal Christianity,"—that is, democratic autocracy in religion,—is the highest development of the free spirit of protest against authority which is possible within the Christian church. It is, at the same time, the lowest possible development of faith in the Christ,—a return to the Christian Confession in its crudest and least developed form.

30. Christianity is the religion of Christians, and all Christians are believers in the Christ.

31. The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian Confession is the boundary line of Christianity.

FREE RELIGION.

32. The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion,—the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church.

33. The history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion at the expense of the Christian Religion. As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases.

34. The completion of the religious protest against authority must be the extinction of faith in the Christian Confession.

35. Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law.

36. The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.

37. The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man,—the race serving the individual, the individual serving the race.

38. The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous and universal education of man.

39. The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice in the private soul.

40. The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One.

41. Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion,—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend.

RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO FREE RELIGION

42. Christianity is identical with Free Religion so far as its universal element is concerned,—antagonistic to it so far as its special element is concerned.

43. The corner-stone of Christianity is faith in the Christ. The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in Human Nature.

44. The great institution of Christianity is the Christian Church, the will of the Christ being its supreme law. The great institution of Free Religion is the coming Republic of the World, the universal conscience and reason of mankind being its supreme organic law or constitution.

45. The fellowship of Christianity is limited by the Christian Confession; its brotherhood includes all subjects of the Christ and excludes all others. The fellowship of Free Religion is universal and free; it proclaims the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

46. The practical work of Christianity is to Christianize the world,—to convert all souls to the Christ, and ensure their salvation from the wrath of God. The practical work of Free Religion is to humanize the world,—to make the individual nobler here and now, and to convert the human race into a vast Co-operative Union devoted to universal ends.

47. The spiritual ideal of Christianity is the suppression of self and perfect imitation of Jesus the Christ. The spiritual ideal of Free Religion is the free development of self, and the harmonious education of all its powers to the highest possible degree.

48. The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of Free Religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face; Free Religion is erect on its feet.

49. The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake.—The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

50. Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY ?

[A Discourse read to the (then) Unitarian Society of Toledo, Sunday morning, July 11, 1869.]

"It sounds like a degradation of the very name of religion to apply it to the wild ravings of Hindu Yogins or the blank blasphemies of Chinese Buddhists. But as we slowly and patiently wend our way through the dreary prisons, our own eyes seem to expand, and we perceive a glimmer of light where all was darkness at first. We learn to understand the saying of one who more than anybody had a right to speak with authority on this subject, that 'there is no religion which does not contain a spark of truth.'"

Max Mueller, Chips from a German Work-shop, vol. 1, p. 184.

"All positive religions contain three distinct parts: First, a code of morals, very pure, and nearly the same in all; next, a geological dream; and thirdly, a myth or historical novelette, which last becomes the most important of all."

Letters of Alex. von Humboldt to V. von Ense, L. 60.†

If we survey American society in its religious aspect, we are at once struck with the great number of sects all calling themselves by the name of Protestant. Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Quakers, "Christians," Swedenborgians, Universalists, Unitarians,—all these, and more, claim to be Protestant bodies. Each claims to have embodied most completely the true spirit of Protestantism; yet no one ventures to deny the equal claim of all the rest to call themselves by the Protestant name. If we extend our view so as to embrace the whole of Christendom, we find three great churches, the Protestant, the Romish, and the Greek, all calling themselves by the name of Christian. Each claims to have embodied most completely the spirit of Christianity; yet no Protestant, at least, will venture to deny the equal claim of these three great churches to call themselves by the Christian name. The Christian Church split into three vast fragments many centuries ago; and while the Romish and Greek churches still remain undivided in themselves, the process of division has gone on in the Protestant Church, and has not yet by any means come to an end. The point to which I wish to call especial attention is this,—that Protestantism is a great deal larger than any one Protestant sect, and that Christianity is a great deal larger than any one branch of the Christian Church.

Now let us extend our view farther still, and embrace, not Christendom alone, but the whole world within its circle. The same spectacle presents itself again, but on a vaster scale. A few great religions, such as Brahmanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Judaism, Christianity, Mohammedanism, and a countless host of minor forms of worship, divide the human race into what may with perfect propriety be styled so many larger sects. Of the total population of the globe, Christianity includes less than one-third,—according to Berghaus about thirty per cent. Each one of these vast sects claims to embody most completely the spirit and power of religion; yet, without the greatest ignorance and arrogance, no one of them can venture to deny the equal claim of all the rest to be religions. It is plain, therefore, that, just as Protestantism includes equally all the Protestant denominations, and as Christianity includes equally the Protestant, the Romish, and the Greek churches,—so Religion includes equally all the great sects of the world, is greater than any one of them, and has its foundation in universal human nature. As all Protestant denominations have something in common, and yet each has something peculiar to itself,—as the same is true of the three great churches of Christendom,—so also there is something in common, a universal element, among all the world's great faiths; while, at the same time, each one of them has something peculiar to itself, a special element, which makes it unlike the rest. To understand Christianity, therefore, and obtain a sensible answer to the great question,—what is it?—we must distinguish carefully between these two elements, the UNIVERSAL OR RELIGIOUS, and the SPECIAL OR CHRISTIAN. It will then appear that Religion is an indestructible instinct, sentiment, or tendency, in the human soul itself; and that Christianity, like every other historical faith, is the development of this universal tendency under peculiar historical conditions and circumstances.

Now in discussing the problem,—what is Christianity?—I shall regard it as a natural growth, not as a supernatural revelation; and instead of spinning a cobweb theory about it, I shall interrogate the actual facts, and look to common sense, not theology, for an answer. As Lord Bolingbroke saw more than a century ago, history, and not metaphysics, must decide what Christianity really is; and the only way to learn its history is to study its records and sacred books, its traditions, its institutions, its origin, its relation to other religions, and its influence in the development of civilization. It stands, take it all in all, as the loftiest of historical faiths; but we blind ourselves and others, if we regard it as standing on any other than the same level with the rest,—as having its roots in anything else than the common soil of mother Earth. Christianity has developed gradually, like a tree; and no tree ever yet struck its roots into the sky.

Let me begin, then for the sake of clearness and brevity, with a very simple definition:—Christianity is Religion as taught in the New Testament, more especially in the gospels. I think no one, however orthodox or however liberal, will object to this definition; and consequently I will make no pause to argue for its fairness or exactness. The question, however, immediately arises,—How is Religion taught in the New Testament? And here we are deafened by a clamor of discordant tongues. Each little sect in Christendom, and each wing of each sect, and even each feather of each wing, gives a different answer, a different explanation of the meaning of the New Testament. The confusion is great, I admit; and it would be idle to expect to reconcile completely all the conflicting theories. But I believe that the cause of the confusion is plain. Men go the New Testament, not to learn what it actually teaches, but to make it teach what they want to believe. This is all wrong. When they are willing to study the book in the spirit of candor and the love of truth, availing themselves of the light of modern scholarship, the warfare will in great measure cease. Certain great doctrines and ideas will be recognized by all, and the contested points will mostly, in time, be made clear. For myself, I seek to prove nothing out of the New Testament; it makes to me no more difference what the New Testament teaches than what the Koran teaches, for my faith rests on something better than books. I hold myself prepared, therefore, to recognize, as the teaching of the New Testament, whatever shall prove to have been the actual thought of its writers. He who has no "case" of any kind to make out, and no dogma of any kind to defend, will perceive that Christianity, as a great system of faith and life, rests on the New Testament as it is, even though the four gospels contain an imperfect biography of Jesus and imperfectly reflect his teaching. The gospels as they are have moulded the spiritual consciousness of the church, fashioned its theology, and determined the character of its institutions; and although in some respects they may fall below the level of the teaching of Jesus himself, it can hardly be doubted that their fundamental ideas were also his. The miracles, of course, from the modern point of view, must be regarded as legendary, unhistorical; yet such legends never become attached to a great life, unless in some sort they express its actual spirit, and are harmonious with its controlling aims. For this reason, I judge it the fairest and soundest method of getting at the true essence of Christianity, to take the New Testament as it stands, and determine as faithfully as possible what are its great central principles. This, then, I propose to do, interpreting the book as a natural result of the times that produced it, and finding the key to my interpretation in the history of the Jewish nation.

What, then, is the religion taught in the New Testament? Or, in other words, what is Christianity as set forth in its own accepted and venerated records?

Every religion, as we have seen, contains two elements which must be carefully distinguished, universal and special. The universal element, as its name implies, is the same in all religions; while the special element varies in the case of each. The application of this distinction to Christianity clears away at once the obscurity which hangs about it in the minds of many, especially of those who have drifted away from the creeds of the popular churches. It is the universal element which makes Christianity a religion; it is the special element which makes it the Christian religion. Whatever is found in all religions, belongs, consequently, to the universal element; and whatever is found in Christianity alone, belongs to the special element. Bearing this in mind, it becomes a comparatively easy thing to determine, in a large, general way, what belongs properly to each element in Christianity. Its great spiritual and moral precepts are as widespread as man himself: however imperfectly developed, they appear in some form or other in every faith under the sun. It is a simple fact, not to be denied by any well-read man, that every great moral principle, every high spiritual idea, which is found in the New Testament, is found also in the sacred or philosophical books of other religions. There is absolutely not a single great saying of Jesus concerning God, or duty, or immortality, which has not substantially its parallel in so-called heathen writings. It is true, no one book can be found, perhaps, in which occur so many great thoughts on these themes, or at least occur so beautifully expressed, as in the New Testament; nor do I know anywhere another religious character equal, on the whole, to the character portrayed in its pages. But the sublime thoughts which underlie the parables and conversations of the gospels are, like the atmosphere about us, the common breath of all,—here and there poisoned by the malaria of superstition, and seldom so pure as on the mountain heights of that Hebrew soul, yet still as all-embracing and as indispensable as the air we breathe. Piety, purity, benevolence, mercy, forgiveness, self-sacrifice, aspiration, love, prayer, repentance, faith,—these, in greater or less degree, in higher or lower form, are common to all religions, and constitute that universal element, that eternal substance, which is simply the indestructible and divinest part of human nature itself. Christianity cannot appropriate these as its own peculiar property; for they exist in all religions wherever man has emerged out of utter barbarism. But Christianity contains them as the universal element within itself; and it is in virtue of this alone that it is entitled to be called a religion at all.

It remains to examine the special element of Christianity,—that which gives it its name as the Christian religion. The moral and spiritual consciousness, which in some measure is common to all men above the brutish condition, becomes almost always associated with some particular beliefs, or customs, or men, or institutions; and thus assumes an historical or special form. Thus Mohammedanism includes not merely universal spiritual truths, but also faith in Mohammed, as the divinely authorized revealer of these to men; and thus, while faith in these spiritual truths is the substance or universal element of Mohammedanism, faith in Mohammed is its historic form or special element. In every great religion the same distinction must be made. Now the very name of Christianity, like that of Mohammedanism, expresses clearly its special element. Christianity is the faith of Christians, a word first applied to the followers of Jesus, soon after his death, in the Syrian city of Antioch; and the name was doubtless given to them as a derisive nickname, because they professed to be followers of "the Christ."

Now the followers of the Greek thinkers who founded distinct schools in philosophy are often called by the personal name of their masters;—thus the disciples of Epicurus are called Epicureans, those of Plato Platonists, those of Aristotle Aristotelians, and so forth..

So, also, the followers of Mohammed are called Mohammedans; and the followers of Theodore Parker are often called Parkerites. How happened it that the disciples of Jesus were not nicknamed Jesuits or Jesus-ites? Why were they called Christians at all, when "Christ" was not part of their master's name? The answer is that the word "Christ," signifying "Anointed," and referring to that ancient custom of anointing kings which corresponds to the modern custom of crowning them, indicated the kingly rank which, as the Christians believed, God had conferred upon Jesus. It indicated a peculiar, supernatural office, so closely connected with the national life of the Jewish people, that it can only be understood in the light of Jewish history. Faith in Jesus as the Christ of God is the special element of Christianity, its core and essence as a religion distinguishable from the other great religions of the world; and this central faith in the Christ, as the universal Savior of the human race, is simply the expansion and intensification of a patriotic Hebrew hope. Thus Christianity, so far from being a wholly new religion, a special revelation from heaven, is, in fact, the natural development of Judaism. Judaism is germinal Christianity; Christianity is fructified Judaism. It is plain, therefore, that the genius of Christianity can only be comprehended by studying that earlier faith of which it is the fruit. In a very brief way, permit me to sketch the outlines of the history of that Jewish idea, whose development we behold to-day in the great church of Christendom. We shall fail to do justice to the Christian Church if we see in it merely the cunning work of priestcraft and ecclesiastical ambition. Standing wholly outside of it, as I do, and contemplating its vast proportions at a fitting distance, I seem to see far more clearly than formerly the grandeur and symmetry of its architectural design. It is a magnificent structure, and has subserved magnificent purposes in the spiritual education of man. If the American people begins to discover that it has no more use to-day for the church, than it has for a grand cathedral of the middle ages, nevertheless we owe it to ourselves not to despise an institution to which our indebtedness is unspeakably great.

From the time of Abraham, the Jews believed themselves to be a "chosen people," set apart by Jehovah as sacred to himself. Their ideal of government was always a "theocracy," that is, a kingdom of God. From the time of Moses to that of Saul, they had a succession of rulers or judges, who were supposed to be selected immediately by God, and guided by his commands. But the anarchy arising from so unstable a government, under which any ambitious man could pretend to have received the divine appointment, at last drove the people to demand a permanent king; and Saul was raised to the throne. Under David and Solomon, the successors of Saul, the Hebrew nation attained the height of its greatness; and the Davidic monarchy differed from the earlier theocracy only in having a permanent royal dynasty instead of an irregular succession of chiefs, to represent Jehovah, the true King of the nation. An invisible King in heaven could, of course, transact the practical business of government only by placing some visible deputy or viceroy on an earthly throne. This is an important point to be noted, for the logic of events compels the appointment of a similar Vicegerent on earth, whenever the true Head of the State is supposed to reside invisibly in the heavens. From the reign of Solomon, the Hebrews declined in power and importance, and the "good old times" of David became, as it were, a "Golden Age" to which the popular imagination recurred perpetually with increasing desire. At last, about six centuries B. C., came the extinction of the Jewish kingdom, and the long captivity at Babylon. It was about this time that the first traces appear of the hope of the Messianic reign. So terribly sunk in misery and oppression were the Jews, that it became manifest that only a miracle could raise them again to their former splendor and power. A miracle, therefore, they began to expect,—a supernatural restoration of their subverted State, a divine descent upon earth to bring happiness and holiness to the "chosen people of the Most High." It would be altogether too long a tale, to rehearse, the gradual formation of the Messianic faith in the heart of the people. It was the growth of half a dozen centuries, and came at last to twine itself about their very heart-strings. Trampled under foot by Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, Idumaeans, Romans, the people looked for the "kingdom of heaven" as our slaves looked for the great day of emancipation; but with a fiercer and more vindictive feeling. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be introduced by a great day of judgment, by the destruction of the heathen, and the establishment of Hebrew dominion over the whole earth; it was to be both temporal and spiritual in its nature, bringing righteousness and peace to all mankind, and taking the place of the great pagan empires of antiquity. In this dream of a new and universal empire, to be bestowed by Divine favor on the Jews, the figure of the monarch or Messiah gradually came to hold a prominent place. He was to be the chief actor in the great drama of restoration, being clothed by God with miraculous powers and divine authority; and in his own person he was to combine the offices of High Priest and King. As King, he was to govern the Jews and the whole world; as High Priest, he was to inaugurate the pure worship of Jehovah, and free mankind from sorrow and sin. This was the Christ or Messiah,—a Priest-King, appointed by God himself to assume universal dominion on the earth, and endowed with terrible supernatural powers for the purpose of establishing his dominion. The reign of the Christ here on earth, bringing peace and joy to all men, and restoring, as it were, the ancient kingdom of David in a thousandfold greater splendor and power, was what the Jews meant by the "kingdom of heaven," or the "kingdom of God;" and it was precisely in this sense that the early Christians used the phrase. A hundred years before the first line of the New Testament was written, all the main features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "end of the world" and the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," were perfectly familiar to the Jewish mind. The great day of judgment was expected to take place very soon, at Jerusalem; to be preceded by the outbreak of terrific wars; to reveal the Christ in the clouds of heaven, surrounded with angels, and seated on the awful tribunal of divine justice; to bring to the righteous Jews everlasting dominion and happiness, and to the heathen unbelievers the direst destruction. The righteous were to enter the halls of the kingdom, and feast at the Messiah's table; the wicked were to be plunged into the pit of fire in the vale of Hinnom. In short, the earth and the heavens were to be created anew, and the Christ was to reign as both temporal and spiritual prince in the kingdom of heaven. This dream of the "kingdom of heaven" or "kingdom of God" was the inspiration of the entire people of Judaea, and alone gave them hope and courage under their misfortunes; and it became the inheritance of every Jewish child. Mothers used to name their baby boys Jesus, that is, Savior, in the fond hope that their own offspring might prove to be the Christ of God to redeem the oppressed nation. But the kingdom delayed to come, and many a heart grew sick with hope deferred.

At last John the Baptist came, proclaiming that the "kingdom of heaven was at hand." All Judaea rushed to hear him; but he declared he was only the forerunner of the Christ, and not the Christ himself. Then came the young carpenter of Nazareth, taking up the same cry,—"Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand,"—and by and by confessing that he was indeed the expected Christ. That he claimed to be the Christ, is plain on almost every page of the New Testament. When Peter, first of all, guessed the great secret, and avowed his faith in Jesus as the Christ, Jesus replied—"Blessed art thou, Simon, son of Jonah; for flesh and blood did not reveal it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven. And I on my part say to thee, that thou art Peter, a rock, and on this rock [i. e. faith in my Messiahship] will I build my church." It would be tedious to run through the texts in which Jesus claims, directly or indirectly, the Messianic office; it will be enough to add here, that, at his trial, the high-priest asked him solemnly—"I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of God;" and that Jesus, with frank avowal, replied,—"Thou sayest, i. e. I am." To the governor, Pilate, asking the same question, he made the same reply; and, as you all remember, the inscription on the cross mockingly describing his crime, was,—"This is Jesus, the King of the Jews."

It seems to me, therefore, indisputable that Jesus did actually claim to be the Messiah or Christ. It is somewhat doubtful how far he expected to assume temporal sway; but this he could not have escaped, if he should assume the office at all. Many passages seem to show plainly that he would not have shrunk from the political duties of his royal station; he announced the coming of his kingdom as so near at hand, that his disciples could not travel over the cities of Israel before the day of its appearance. All who should be saved must confess him as the Christ, before the great day of judgment should dawn;—"every one, therefore," he says plainly in Matt. X, 32, "who shall acknowledge me before men, him will I also acknowledge before my Father who is in heaven. But whoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father who is heaven." In these words, he clearly states that faith in himself as the Christ is the necessary condition of salvation, i. e. admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

Now this claim of Jesus to be the Christ, which he himself declared to be the basis of his church, has always been the basis of it till the present day, and must continue to be its basis, so long as it shall stand. Faith in the Christ as the only Savior of the world, is the very corner-stone of Christianity, as a great system of religion; and it has become its practical test. All those are Christians who rest in this faith, and accept Jesus as their sole and sufficient Savior; nobody else is, in the right sense of the word, a Christian. The claim of Jesus was confessed from the outset; it became developed by degrees into the orthodox theology, on the one hand, and into the Roman priesthood, on the other hand. The "kingdom of heaven," which Jesus preached in both a temporal and spiritual sense, developed naturally and logically into the Popedom, which is the nearest possible approximation to a fulfilment of the claim of Jesus. A King in the heavens, invisible and inaudible, must have his visible Vicegerent on the earth; and this Vicegerent must be constantly guided and secured from error by the instructions of his Master. Hence came the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility, which cannot be logically shunned, if once the Messianic claim of Jesus is admitted, and which will probably be decreed authoritatively by the approaching Ecumenical Council at Rome. And further. If Jesus is indeed the divinely appointed Christ, or Savior of the world, how could he be merely a man, like other men? To judge all men, he must be omnipresent; he must be omnipotent; he must be omniscient. In a word, he must be God. I believe that the orthodox theology and the ecclesiastical hierarchy of Rome are only the inevitable consequence, the necessary historical result, of confessing Jesus to be the Christ. Faith in Christ is the special element of Christianity, which makes it emphatically and distinctively, the Christian religion; and faith in Christ, once planted in a thoughtful and logical mind, must develop inevitably into acceptance of Roman Catholicism. All the good and all the evil that follow from carrying out consistently this central doctrine of Jesus concerning himself, have been exemplified in the history of Rome. In proportion as men stray away from this, the great venerable church of Christianity, they really stray away from Christianity itself.

To sum up briefly the chief point of this discourse—Christianity is a religion, so far as it develops in man his moral and spiritual nature; and it is the Christian religion, so far as it insists on faith in Jesus as the Christ of God, or sole Savior of the world. Regarded historically, it is simply the complete development of ancient Judaism, whose Messianic hope it realized; and regarded ecclesiastically, it is best embodied in the grand hierarchy of Rome, with the Pope at its head as the Vicegerent of Christ upon earth. This then, is my answer to the question,—what is Christianity?

The Index.

JANUARY 8, 1870.

We begin to-day a series of discourses or Sunday essays on Christianity and Free Religion. They were delivered in July and August to what was at that time the "Unitarian Society of Toledo," with the purpose of stating as simply as possible our convictions on that subject. The readers of THE INDEX will perceive that they go over substantially the same ground as that of the lecture published in our first issue, and naturally contain more or less repetition of its thought,—in some cases, of its language. But as they also contain much that was not in the introductory lecture, and develop certain points with greater fulness, it seems best not to mutilate them by omitting the repeated parts.

PROCRUSTES ORDERING A NEW BED.

Rev. Geo. H. Hepworth, the sensational Unitarian preacher of New York City, made the following frank statement in a recent sermon:

"Here we stand with a creed as liberal as the world can demand, believing in the Bible as much as any other denomination which exists; making our creed out of the very words of Jesus Christ himself."

In the Liberal Christian of Dec. 25th, the same clergyman calls loudly for a "banner," meaning a creed more precise, comprehensive and authoritative than the one he now has. We extract the following significant passage:

"I believe that in New York City alone there are fifty thousand good men and women, who are regular attendants upon other churches, who are not satisfied with the theology they hear, and who would at once come over to us if we could put into their hands a carefully prepared statement of our Unitarian faith. I mean by this a statement that had received the official sanction of any large convention of our ministers and laymen. I am fully persuaded that one great and abiding reason why so many prefer to hear in other churches, what they do not believe rather than come over to us, is that they are unwilling to slip their moorings unless they can see some other pier within reach. . . . Now, then, if Unitarians have a faith which is common to all their ministers; if it is possible to put into print what we believe as a denomination, and if it is possible to put the official imprint of the body on that document, let it be done without delay."

Such statements as these, taken in connection with other signs of Unitarian tendencies (especially the discontinuance of the old, scholarly, independent Christian Examiner, and the recent conservative coup d'état by which the Liberal Christian has been revolutionized) more than suggest a suspicion that at the "National Conference" to be held next autumn, the conservative leaders will take the aggressive, repeal their foolish concessions of 1868, and secure the adoption of a formal and specific creed.

We hope they will,—for the same reason that we hope the Ecumenical Council will decree the infallibility of the Pope. Such a step will do good every way. It will bring matters to a crisis. It will show to every one who really loves spiritual freedom how idle it is to expect this in any organized Christian body. It will make the issue between freedom and Christianity sharp and clear. When a Christian denomination which started fifty years ago with most earnest protestations against creeds, finds itself driven by the stress of ideas to choose between a creed and "Christlessness," intelligent spectators will draw swift inferences. If creedlessness and Christlessness are identical, why are not creeds and Christianity identical, too? Channing must have made a great mistake in his antipathy to creeds. Would it not be wise for the American Unitarian Association to publish an expurgated edition of his works, adapted to the wants of Mr. Hepworth's "fifty thousand good men and women,"—all New Yorkers? With a creed sufficiently strong and long, baited with an expurgated Channing, Mr. Hepworth would doubtless soon catch all the respectable fish of the metropolis,—to the great dismay of his fellow-anglers. What a triumph of piscatorial prowess! Spurgeon and Pere Hyacinthe and Henry Ward Beecher and all the other great "fishers of men," would be quite eclipsed by the new Izaak Walton. For the sake of the poor little fishes, however, now sporting unconscious of their doom in the metropolitan pond, we trust there will be some delay in procuring the requisite fishing-tackle. It is too early in the season. Let them swim awhile longer!

"THE MAIN QUESTION AT LAST."

On our sixth page will be found an article with the above caption, reprinted from the Chicago Standard. The allusion it contains to Theodore Parker, contrasting his position with the "free, open, manly" one of Ralph Waldo Emerson, is by implication unjust to one of the noblest spirits of the century. It would be as fair to accuse the sun of darkening the solar system, as to accuse Theodore Parker of "demoralizing" his contemporaries. He was as spotlessly pure in respect of courage, sincerity and devotion to truth, as any man that ever breathed. We think he made a mistake in regarding Christianity as the "Absolute Religion." We think that, if he were alive to-day, he would perceive, and as frankly avow, its incompatibility with spiritual freedom. But we are not aware that Mr. Emerson either claims or disclaims the "Christian" name; he quietly pursues the even tenor of his way, announcing to the listening age his deep insights into truth without seeking logically to define his position. Both he and Parker have earned the profoundest reverence of every one who honors nobility of soul; and we feel it due to both alike to deny the justice of any contrast made between them in this respect.

But we have entered within the last five years upon a new stage in the great conflict between authority and freedom. The conspicuous failure of the Unitarian denomination to organize itself without sacrificing freedom to Christianity, has opened the eyes of many, and will open the eyes of more, to the fact that the one must be sacrificed to the other. It is no merit to anybody, however, to perceive this fact; and we, certainly, claim none. We can but wonder that others are blind to it. It can hardly be denied, and we must admit, that Mr. Parker's identification of "Absolute Religion" with "pure Christianity," has indeed tended to obscure the issue. But the issue is made at last. Infinitely more is at stake than the meaning of a word; and this is seen plainly enough by all except those who dwell in the misty border-land between the religion of monarchy and the religion of republicanism. The Chicago Standard, with a sincerity and fearlessness of spirit which command our admiration and win our heartiest sympathy, welcomes the clearing-away of the fog, that the great battle of the age may be fought in the "broad daylight." Is Jesus the Christ, or not? That is the question. If he is, let him be the veritable pilot of the ship of civilization, not an idle figure-head at its prow. Let his word be absolute and final, and let humanity obey. But if otherwise, let humanity grasp the helm itself, and sail by the chart of everlasting principles. It is time to have done with trifling. Dilettantism and obscurantism are out of date in America. The age is infinitely in earnest. For long it has been groping after the issue; at last, we believe, it has found it. The sovereignty of the Christ over the soul, or the sovereignty of the soul over itself,—which? The great question is open. Let him shut it who can.

One word more. The Standard makes a frank and most kindly appeal. "If by a fresh study of the question you should see new proofs that Jesus is God's Messiah, will you at once acknowledge his supreme authority, obey his commands, be baptized in his name, and enter his kingdom as 'little children,' truly converted?"

Yes, brother, we will! Perish all pride of opinion that stands in the way of the truth! We pledge ourselves to weigh honestly any fresh evidence you may have to offer,—we have weighed the old, and found it wanting. But consider what it is that needs study. Not the meaning of musty texts, but the import of opposing principles. Either show that Christianity is freedom, and not bondage to authority,—or else show that bondage to authority, and not freedom, is the true destiny of man. Aim at this target, or you will shoot wide of the mark.

The great lie is mighty until it encounters the great truth.

The forthcoming report of the Ohio State School Commissioner will show the following in regard to the wages of school teachers in Ohio. The average monthly wages of teachers are as follows:

Sub-Districts—Male, $38 08; female, $24 29. Separate District (ungraded) Schools—Male, $47 13; female, $28 25. Graded Schools—Male, $92 28; female, $48 62. German and English Schools—Male, $54 92; female, $37 18. Colored Schools—Male, $39 25; female, $28 66. Number of districts where teachers board around, 2,025.

And yet nine out of ten of these female teachers do their work just as well as the male teachers.—Toledo Blade.

An unmarried woman at Verden, Illinois, is the possessor of seven hundred acres of excellent land, which she paid for by teaching school.—Exchange.

[The above item has been going the rounds of the papers. If true, wages in Illinois must be higher than in Ohio.—Ed.]

Helen Dougherty, of Western New York, after a long contest, has secured in the Supreme Court the inventor's title to a machine which cuts splints from a board in a level form, producing a cut hoop ready to apply at once to a barrel, which patent covers a monopoly of the manufacture and a pretty penny for the inventress.—Cincinnati Gazette.

[The author of the statement that "woman is never an inventor," had better take out a patent on his own invention.—Ed.]

A student of Ann Arbor, Michigan, having remarked that men had more endurance than women, a lady present answered that she would like to see the thirteen hundred young men in the University laced up in steel-ribbed corsets, with hoops, heavy skirts, trails, high heels, panniers, chignons, and dozens of hair pins sticking in their scalps, cooped up in the house year after year, with no exhilarating exercise, no hopes, aims, nor ambitions in life, and see if they would stand it as well as the girls. Nothing, said she, but the fact that women, like cats, have nine lives, enables them to survive the present regime to which custom dooms the sex.

Poetry.

THE STRAY SUNBEAM.

Alone I walked the busy street,
With cries and wheels and footsteps loud,
Where kindred hearts unconscious meet,
And part forever in the crowd.

I threaded slow the populous mart,
Unnoticed midst the thunderous din,
Watching the stream with aching heart,
For sorrow sat enthroned within.

"O Life!" I said, "thronged solitude!
Thou ceaseless, pitiless, loveless fray,
Where Passion's hell-begotten brood
Wrangle for unresisting prey!

How black the angry torrent rolls!
On earth below, in heaven above,
There is no light for darkened souls—
For wounded hearts no healing love!"

Leaning against a window-pane
There stood a fair and ruddy child;
I looked, and looked, and looked again,
Until he caught my look, and smiled.

I nodded, as I drew more nigh;
The dimples deepened on his cheek,
And mirth grew riotous in his eye,
And baby lips essayed to speak.

As on I moved with footsteps slow,
The more I laughed, the more laughed he;
I turned my head to look, and lo!
His face still shone with infant glee.

An envious corner made eclipse
Of that sweet star; and I passed by,
The smile yet lingering on my lips,
The warm tear starting in my eye.

"Thank God for childish smiles!" I said,
"For dew-drops on the parching leaf—
For wild-flowers in the forest's shade—
For starlight in the night of grief!"

Father! accept the grateful prayer,
Thank-offering for thy wondrous grace;
For Love unseen, like vital air,
Holds all the earth in his embrace!"

AN ARGUMENT FOR THE IMMORTALITY OF THE HUMAN SOUL.

BY MISS FRANCES P. COBBE.

Postulate. That there exists a Supreme supersensible Will ordering the material universe through the agencies of Nature—electricity, gravitation, &c.—which may be described as constituting in their ultimate unity the Vital Force of God.

1. Geology shows that as this supersensible Will works to-day, so it has been working in a continuous chain of action for millions of ages.

2. Man is a minor supersensible Will, acting on a small fraction of the material world by means of the imponderable agent which we call the human Vital Force, and which is demonstrated to be correlated to, and interchangeable with, the agencies of electricity, gravitation, &c., &c.

3. If the supreme supersensible Will has existed and acted unchanged from the dawn of time till now, it is proved to be independent of the conditions of the physical worlds which are born and extinguished beneath it.

4. In as far, then, as the true Self of man is a true supersensible Will similar to the Will of God, in so far there exists a strong presumption that it also is durable and independent of physical conditions. Unless Electricity, &c., be God (in which case the moral phenomena—the beauty and order of the universe—are utterly unaccountable,) then neither can the human vital force which vanished at death be the real man. That Will which guides the lightning, and that other minor Will which directed the vital fluid to raise the human hand, are the things with which we have to deal. The onus of proof that the minor Will cannot survive the loss of its agent, rests on those who admit its analogy with the Divine Will, yet maintain that while the great unbodied Will lives forever, the disembodied human will must perish.

There is amply enough order, happiness, beauty in creation to show that it is a Cosmos, not a Chaos,—that it has a purpose, and does not come of haphazard. It is not a palette covered with colors, but the half-finished sketch of a god-like Raphael.

On the other hand there is quite enough disorder, misery, sin and hideousness in the world to show that its purpose is incomplete as we behold it. Whatever man can have been meant to be,—good, happy, beautiful he is not. Humanity is not a finished picture, but a group like Michael Angelo's Entombment, with half the figures imperfect—some of them barely indicated, and the only one anything like finished—a Dead Christ. The conclusion that the design,—betrayed, but not fulfilled by the order of things here,—will be executed elsewhere, and the sketch made into a perfect picture, comes to us with whatever weight we may be disposed to allot to the testimony of our whole intelligence exercised on the outer world. The testimony of the soul itself to the things of the soul is, of course, of another order; and, in my opinion, of much superior force.

SECULAR RELIGION.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The vital question of our time in the practical sphere of religion is the relation of religion to life. At present this relation is altogether unsatisfactory. There was a time when religion commanded life. To it belonged power and authority. It was the one supreme concern and interest, in comparison with which what we call "interests" could hardly be said to exist. The dominion of religion was felt everywhere. It overlooked the private lot and scrutinized personal experiences; it presided over households, made laws, consecrated rulers, blessed or annulled covenants, ratified treaties, revised letters, fashioned art, decreed what should be and what should not be science; the soldier confessed to it before he went to the wars; the discoverer sailed under its auspices and laid his newly found lands at its feet. She was supreme; she was alone; she was all in all.

The passage from this state of things to that which prevails now was long and tedious. It commenced with the awaking of the modern world to life. The suspicion of knowledge came first, then its faint dawning, then its full beams. The revival of learning brought to the light of day worlds of thought that had been buried in oblivion for centuries; the discovery of new continents and islands enlarged the view; trade and commerce revealed groups of mankind to each other and bound them together; industries multiplied; men began to be sensible of their importance; a spirit of independence got abroad; the power of the working understanding made itself felt; the nations tried their hands at making laws and institutions for themselves; one interest after another fell from the charge of the priest into the keeping of the men of business; and now, at last, relations are completely altered and situations utterly reversed.

To-day life is uppermost, religion is down; life occupies the grand rooms, religion is thrust into a corner; life takes possession of the week days and leaves to religion a few hours of Sunday; the world patronizes religion, dresses it up in its cast-off clothing, treats it like a baby; its bible is elegantly bound, but it is not read; its creed is disbelieved in; its sacraments are not respected; its ceremonies are not observed; its services are not attended; multitudes treat it with ill-concealed contempt, set their common sense above its revelations, and erect their business affairs to an importance that makes it seem useless; no great human interest pays honor to it; government flings it off; the politician bids it keep its distance; commerce lays its commandments on the shelf; science turns from it disdainfully, as if it were not worth speaking with on important concerns; literature fashions its own laws, and works for its own ends; religion cannot even protect its Sabbath from invasion, and struggles hard against the tides of activity and pleasure that beat from all sides upon its holy time. It is not rarely that we hear religion spoken of as an incumbrance. The prediction is even ventured that it is destined to die out. The reaction is likely to go to fearful lengths. If it goes as far in one direction as the ecclesiastical spirit went in the opposite direction, religion will be nothing, by-and-by, but a piece of harmless decoration on the walls of modern existence. To insist on the evils incident to the present condition of affairs would be foreign to our immediate purpose. The momentous question is, How shall religion and life become reconciled?

One thing is clear: life cannot be changed. Life will not accommodate itself to religion; it is religion that must make the first movement to accommodate itself to life. She has had her opportunity and lost it; she must now simply be content to retain or recover her fair share of authority. Mahomet must go to the mountain.

Without attempting to describe all the concessions that religion must make in order to secure its hold on living people, it is pretty plain what some of these concessions must be.

In the first place the ecclesiastical spirit must be given up. An ecclesiastical religion cannot but be out of line with the popular movement, the apparent success of ritualism notwithstanding. People are not interested in altar forms, though in idle hours they will be amused by them. The living world laughs at ritualism; ritualism scolds at the world. The Roman Church has no hold on the life of the modern world; she grapples with none of its problems; the ethics of politics and trade do not concern her; she does nothing to mend criminal jurisprudence, nothing to eradicate intemperance or reform vice; her work is palliative and apologetic. As far as she exerts an influence, it is to make the world content with stupidity and ignorance.

Again, the theological spirit must be given up. Theological problems interest nobody. Between them and the problems of every day existence there is literally no connection. Men are every day pushing theology more angrily out of doors; it is not tolerated in the parlor; literature has banished it; science pronounces it a chimera; even the preacher must apologize for the little he puts into his sermon. It is customary for theology to be snubbed most pitilessly in the pulpit. A brisk dispensation of the theology on Sundays would in no long time reduce societies to a condition of bankruptcy.

Once more, religion must cease to be mainly concerned about a future life and the fate of mankind in another state of being. She must leave her station at the hither side of the grave, and allow her weather-beaten ferry-boat to drift, while she bestirs herself in the practical affairs of this lower sphere. Her word must be "life." Not this life or that life, not present life or future life; but life as involved in the matters that engage the thoughts and absorb the energies of living men. A ghostly religion can receive but little sympathy from human beings in the flesh.

Shall we not add that religion must cease to live and labor in its own behalf, as if it was a private interest distinct and separate from all others, and must mingle freely with other interests, taking them at their own terms. It must desist from its purpose to build itself up at the expense of society, and must plan how it may help society build itself up with her help. When it shall show a hearty willingness to step out of its consecrated buildings into lecture halls; when it shall cease fighting for the sanctity of Sunday and try to sanctify Monday and Tuesday; when it shall drop its distinction between sacred and profane literature and shall wish to make all literature sacred; when it shall relinquish its endeavors to make the Christ an exception to all the rest of humanity; when it shall abandon its silly denunciation of infidelity; shall burn its bulls against the comet, and throw into the waste basket its manifestoes against the century, then will the impression get abroad that religion is a real thing that is worth thinking about. But till it does this, till it puts on citizens' dress and takes its chance in the crowds of applicants for the privilege of improving the condition of society, it will be elbowed aside as a prig or a prude who is quietly advised that his room is better than his company.

There are those to think that under no circumstances will religion be able to win men back to her service. Whether this opinion be wise or not, it is certain that she will win them the quicker in proportion as she comes to them in plain human fashion. So doing, she puts herself in communication with the spirit of the founder of the Christian Faith, who was, in all respects, as near being a purely secular person as was possible. He affected nothing; he put on no airs; he wore no robes; he occupied no pulpit; he venerated no times or seasons. A return to that disposition and method as modern society furnishes facilities, would probably be a means of restoring to religion a portion, at all events, of the prestige it has in the course of generations been dispossessed of.

TO DESTROY AND TO FULFIL.

BY W. J. POTTER.

Christianity began its career as both radical and conservative; as an abrogation of Judaism and as a fulfilment of Judaism; as destructive of past growths and as a development of past growths into larger life and fruitfulness. These two elements, apparently so contradictory, we find, in a very remarkable degree, in Jesus himself. There is no commandment, he says, greater than the two commandments of Moses,—“Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself;” and when asked what one should do to inherit eternal life, he simply referred to the Mosaic Law as containing the substance of all that needed to be done. And yet in his daily teaching and practice he was in such continual conflict with all the authorized institutions and official expounders of the Mosaic Law that he was regarded by the great majority of his nation as a revolutionary abrogator of the Law, and was put to death as its incorrigible enemy and destroyer. He laid the axe at the root of Hebrew beliefs and institutions, and yet claimed to fulfil Hebrew ideas and purposes.

And the existence of these seemingly contradictory elements in Jesus' character and career has led to much misconception of his historical position and work. It is only by perceiving the principle which harmonizes these two classes of elements that the point of view can be gained from which the mission of Jesus and the origin of Christianity can be historically represented. For, in reality, the career of Jesus, in respect to this combination of apparently opposing tendencies, is one of the finest illustrations the world has ever seen of the normal method of historical development and growth. So far from being a case of miraculous intervention, it is a marked exhibition of the general forces that are always at work to produce human history.

The history of mankind is an organism—the organism of society—in the development of which, as in a living body of a plant or an animal, we can detect certain general laws and processes of advance and increase. And among these general laws and processes—which are, of course, too complicated to be clearly understood as yet in all their workings—this one is well established,—that historic growth, or the development and progress of human society, proceeds by two operations: by taking up and assimilating nutritive elements, and by rejecting and throwing off refuse elements from which the nutrition has been extracted; precisely the double process of healthy activity and growth witnessed in every living organism. And human society is progressing most healthily and most safely when this two-sided process of accretion and excretion is going on most freely and harmoniously; when society is receiving through its regular channels all the substantial aliment it needs for its growth and work, and at the same time is expelling in natural ways all effete materials whose day of service is past.

Thus both the conserving force and the destroying force are at the very foundation of human society and progress. And religious vitality and progress exist on the same conditions, and follow the same law. Religion, under all its forms, everywhere feeds and flourishes on essentially the same nutriment,—that is, on the eternal substance of Divinity: in other words, on whatever of Truth, Love, Integrity, and Holiness is drawn into human consciousness and conduct. This direct communication of the human soul with these divine elements is the fundamental fact below all religions; the vital, organic principle within all religious systems, forms and characters, without which religion could not be. But forms of worship, sacred institutions, beliefs, theologies, bibles, religious systems themselves—these are all temporary and local developments of the organic religious principle, rendering in their time and place very important service, but which the religious principle itself, as it proceeds in its course of development, must judge and sift.

And hence it is that every great prophet, every eminent religious teacher and leader, appears both as a destroyer and a builder; as an abrogator of the past and also as fulfilling it. He will appear as the most radically destructive of men, because he will lay the axe with heavy blows at the root of many existing institutions and beliefs, which he sees are lingering to hinder and corrupt society rather than to promote a healthy religious activity and life. These he will bend all his energies to remove, in order that they may not clog the channels through which fresh particles of mental and spiritual nutriment are to come. And to those persons who are not accustomed to separate religion from its existing forms, he will seem to be destroying the very foundations of religion itself. But really he will be the most conservative and wisest of builders,—throwing out the decayed materials as fast as they have finished their service, and seeking to strengthen and bring into use those parts that are of substantial and durable worth. Instead of abrogating the past, he does it the greatest honor. So far from trying to base religion on any new doctrine or inspiration of his own, he goes back to show that there was never a time in the history of man when religion in its vital constituent elements, did not exist. He puts the sources of religion back of every book, back of every alleged era of special revelation. He finds the elements of all religions that have ever existed to be as old as the creation of man, and sees that religious eras are only marked crises in the historical development of those primitive elements of faith and moral obligation that belong to the human race. He will attack and break to pieces, indeed, many beliefs and rituals, but it is to emancipate the ideas that formed them in order that they may be free for new and better achievements. He will protest against the bondage of the letter, but it is to assert the liberty of the spirit. He will destroy the exclusive claims to authority of specific religious systems, but it is to fulfil their universal aims, and establish religion itself as superior to all its special forms and utterances.

THE MAIN QUESTION AT LAST.

From the Chicago "STANDARD" of December 9, 1869.

Two or three years ago a well-known writer of New England, who is really "a veteran observer" without claiming that designation, made this remark in his notice of a new publication:—"There has been no time since the death of Luther when Christendom was pervaded by such utter confusion of religious thought as we see just now." The remark was quite apposite, certainly, to the surroundings of that writer, and, perhaps, more than ever, to the condition of the whole country to-day. One grand cause of this confusion has been the very success of Christianity itself,—that power of the Christian name, on account of which men of the most antagonistic sentiments have claimed the right to appropriate it, and thus to "christen" systems, sects and schools that would once have repelled such a designation as an injustice and a dishonor.

No one man of the passing half-century has done more to produce this confusion of thought among the young men of this nation, than did Theodore Parker, who instead of taking his position outside of the Christian church, after the free, open, manly style of his friend Ralph Waldo Emerson, insisted upon being recognized as pastor of a regular Congregational church in Boston, descended from the old Puritan stock. Mr. Emerson resigned a similar position; abjured his ordination vows; so that men "knew where to find him," and therefore honored his manliness. But the course of Theodore Parker was demoralizing, and induced many to profess themselves "Christians" who claimed for Plato, Confucius, Mahomet and themselves an inspiration and authority equal to that of Jesus.

Liberal Christianity (so called), the School of Free Thought, of Free Religion, the Broad Church (several designations for one order of men,) have exhibited the effects of this policy in a general confusion of religious thought almost as bewildering as that which prevailed in Athens in the age of Socrates, or that which Jesus found in Judea when "the common people heard him gladly," and rallied around him, because he spoke to them "as one having authority" and "knew what was in man." He laid foundations; built up order out of chaos. But the Liberal Religionists of our time, claiming the prestige of his name while renouncing his authority, have been at work to carry the community through a paganizing process, akin to that wrought in Israel by the Tyrian dynasty through Queen Jezebel, when the people confounded the worship of Jehovah and Baal, knew not when or what to believe, mixed up things that differed, Hebrew and Canaanite meeting on one low level, "worshipping the Lord and serving their own gods."

But in the course of history there is such a thing as logical development. Principles disclose their real nature in their issues, like some strange eggs that cannot be truly classified until they are hatched. The fruitage tells. The disclosure marks a crisis or an era. Such an era is now at hand in the history of Liberal Christianity. Of this new era Mr. F. E. Abbot, once minister of a Unitarian church in New Hampshire, appears as a leading exponent. He is tired of these falsenesses and confusions of position. He speaks in a manly way. He appeals to his fellow-liberals, in behalf of logical consistency, as well as of moral honesty, that, inasmuch as they have cut loose from the principle of authority, they would cut loose from Christianity itself, and claim the name of Christian no more forever.

He puts the case clearly and strongly thus, as quoted in the Radical:—

"There comes home, then, this one question which must be answered, which I see evaded on all sides, and most of all by radicals themselves. That question is, Was Jesus of Nazareth really the 'Christ of God' in the New Testament sense of the words—yes or no? Christianity says yes; Free Religion says no; Protestant Christianity says yes and no. On the answer to that question will rest finally the fate of Christianity as a great historical religion and a great organized force in the world. It can not be dodged; it can not be evaded; it must be met fairly and squarely, and answered on its merits. I stand here, if I stand for anything, simply to say this one thing—that you must meet that question manfully and bravely, and no longer dodge it as it has been dodged heretofore."

Good and true! Surely this man is in earnest. He sees the issue clearly and means what he says. His utterance is a hopeful sign; it signals the beginning of an escape from scholastic confusion and the concentration of thought upon the main point, the great pivot-question of the present and the future. To this "core of the matter" the great controversy is coming in the last analysis, and we hail the announcement from our extreme opponents as a "thing in season" and so far beautiful; as fitted exactly to simplify religious discussion and clear away the fog from the field of theological conflict. Thanks be to God that a recognized leader in the realm of "Free Religion" has found out, at last, where the capital position is, and would rally his hosts there to meet "all comers." There is no mediæval murk or mist over that high ground, and we should be glad to see Mr. Abbot and the Radicals there in the broad daylight.

As Christians, especially as Baptists, standing up for the New Testament church, (saying, as we have through the ages, let us have that or none,) this simplification of controversy is welcome and refreshing. If Jesus of Nazareth be not the "Christ of God in the New Testament sense of the words," we have no particular religion that we care to propagate, to pay for, or fight for, or uphold in any way. We defend no church-state that we inherited from our parents as we inherited citizenship. We are what we are, religiously, because we, too, are really Free Religionists, freely believing, personally, in the Messiahship of Jesus. Disprove that and we have no right to be. We believe in him, and therefore study his word to learn what he means, and to realize that meaning in action. And thus believing, we turn to Mr. Abbot and his Radical friends with this appeal: If by a fresh study of the question you should see new proofs that Jesus is God's Messiah, will you at once acknowledge his supreme authority, obey his commands, be baptized in his name, and enter his kingdom as "little children," truly converted? Thus, and only thus, can any of us be "known of him," Christians indeed, "free indeed."

It is possible to mistake a palled appetite for a freshened conscience.

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Mrs. Caroline M. Severance, West Newton, Mass.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

The following circular has been recently issued, which we here reprint, to explain somewhat the practical work of the Association, and its present wants:

Boston, Nov. 1, 1869.

DEAR FRIEND:—The Executive Committee of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION desire again to call attention to the character and objects of that organization.

The Association was organized in May, 1867. Though its annual meetings are held in Boston, it is not a local organization. Its Executive Committee are chosen from various parts of the country, and it may hold meetings, at their call, in other places besides Boston. It is an American Association, and finds its constituency in all parts of the country. It was organized in the interest of religious freedom and progress in general; to note, collect, and report facts concerning the great progressive religious movements of the age; to bring into mutual acquaintance, through correspondence and opportunities for personal intercourse, those who, however diverse in their religious education and opinions, are interested in these movements; and to represent and express, in the freest possible way, the various tendencies that are everywhere manifesting themselves toward more rational and more humane views of religion, and toward freer and broader grounds of spiritual fellowship.

One especial feature of the Association is that it does not bound its membership by the limits of Christendom. It is content that religion and religious institutions should rest on the aspiring, truth-seeking, and truth-perceiving faculties of human nature, and seeks to disclose and develop the agreements that exist among all the religions of the world.

As to practical methods for accomplishing its work, the Association has thus far relied mainly on its Annual Conventions, the publication of a pamphlet Report of their proceedings, and on Correspondence. Reports of three meetings have been published, containing Essays and Addresses by some of the most distinguished religious thinkers of the country. Two other small publications have been issued: "The Worship of Jesus, in its Past and Present Aspects,"—an Essay by Samuel Johnson, of Lynn; and "A Discourse on Reason and Revelation," by Wm. J. Potter, of New Bedford. It should be distinctly understood that the Association will publish, not in the interest of any dogmas, but only in the interest of free religious investigation and progress; and therefore that it gives no official endorsement to any opinions it may help to print and circulate.

The expense of this work has been small. Yet it has never been met by the collections at the annual meetings. And, though the Reports and other publications have been kept on sale, they have also been distributed to a considerable extent gratuitously, and hence have not paid for their cost.

The Executive Committee would therefore make an earnest appeal to all persons interested in the objects of the Association to send their contributions yearly to its Treasury. Even the small sum of one dollar (the annual fee for practical membership) from every person in the country who has faith in the Association would furnish it with ample means, not only for meeting all present demands upon it, but for doing a much larger work in the same direction.

Will not, then, every reader of this Circular, who desires the continuance of the Association, send, if possible, at least one dollar with his or her name for membership? and hand the Circular to other persons also who may be persuaded to do likewise? And this request is made, not only that the Treasury may be supplied with funds, but that the Committee, in order that they may do their work more efficiently, may know who and where their constituents are. For the same reason correspondence is solicited by the Secretary with all persons interested in the aims and work of the Association.

Contributions with names for membership should be sent to the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. Larger contributions had better be sent to the Treasurer, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 98 Federal St., Boston, Mass., but may also be sent to the Secretary, when more convenient.

Very truly yours,
WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

The Free Religious Club was organized in Boston during the same Spring that the Free Religious Association was organized, and the two have sometimes been confounded together. To avoid this confusion the Club has now changed its name to the "Radical Club." It may be presumed that the members of the Club are more or less interested generally in the work of the Association, but there is no official connection between the two. The Club, which meets monthly in the hospitable parlors of Dr. Bartol, or Rev. J. T. Sargent, in Boston, is social and local. The Association, which in some particulars is aiming at the same things, has its members and interests in various parts of the country.

Among the liberal religious movements of the age, the new Protestantism which is rapidly developing in Italy presents some of the most interesting features. This new Protestantism, unlike the old, does not generally stop with opposing to the authority of the Romish church the authority of the Bible, but, true to the voice of the 19th century, declares for the complete authority of reason in matters of religion. A council of these liberal religious thinkers was summoned to meet in Naples, on the same day that the Papal council began its sessions in Rome, with a view to form some general Association; to organize, as the printed invitation expressed it, "a sacred League of the liberal thinkers of all nations, who will undertake to oppose, to the blind faith on which Catholicism is founded, the grand principle of free inquiry, and the grand fact of a vast association for disseminating truth." And, embraced in this general purpose, a more specifically practical purpose is announced as follows: "We, liberal thinkers, desiring before every other thing the general welfare, material as well as moral, will proclaim ourselves constituted in a Humanitarian Association with this expressive motto,—Charity and Education." Under the term charity, means for the advancement of labor are included.

Between this general movement and the Free Religious Association of America, there seemed to be so much in common that the Executive Committee of the latter, directed that the following communication should be sent to the council in Naples:—

BOSTON, U. S. A., Nov. 1, 1869.

The Free Religious Association of America to the Council of Liberal Religious Thinkers that is to assemble in Naples, Dec. 8, 1869:

BROTHERS:—We, the undersigned, in behalf of the Free Religious Association of America, and by direction of its Executive Committee, hereby send to you, in free and solemn council assembled, greetings of fraternal interest and good will. We have heard the call of the spirit of liberty that has summoned you together; and it has awakened a responsive echo in our own hearts. From our geographical position, did no other cause prevent, it will be impossible for us to be officially represented among you. Yet with our whole heart would we extend to you the hand of encouragement and brotherhood.

The Association that we represent was organized in 1867. We send, with this communication, printed reports, in pamphlet, of its three public conventions. Its objects, as expressed in its constitution, are "to promote the interests of pure religion, to encourage the scientific study of theology, and to increase fellowship in the spirit." Its name—"Free Religious"—indicates the liberality of its basis, and the breadth of its aim and fellowship. It allows no dogmatic test to exclude from its membership any person who has its objects at heart. It does not limit its constituency even by the "Christian" name, but aims to be as broad as humanity itself. It is in sympathy with all movements throughout the whole world, among whatever people, under whatever form of religion, that are inaugurated in behalf of the sacred rights of man. It is organized to work for the emancipation of mankind from bondage to superstition and ecclesiastical authority, and for the promotion of true spiritual progress. It would bring religion everywhere into harmony with reason and conscience, and submit it to the test of practical justice and fraternal love.

We believe, from the evidence of the call in which your Council originated, that you are, under another name, and by different methods, seeking substantially the same great ends that we seek. Free education, in the largest and highest sense of the term; free labor; fraternal sympathy and charity,—the principles conveyed in such a motto, faithfully applied in all their length and breadth, may be confidently relied on to regenerate the world.

Therefore most heartily do we congratulate you on the fact of your meeting, and on your contemplated organization. We congratulate Italy and the world on the new hope for human rights that dawns in your movement. We congratulate the cause of religious liberty and practical righteousness on the help that may rightfully be expected from your associated action.

We cannot doubt that your movement will prove a powerful aid in liberating men's minds and souls from the degrading shackles imposed by the papacy, and in educating the people to a safe trust in the divine voice that speaks through their own reason, conscience, and spiritual aspirations. Even here, in this land, we feel the baneful shadow of the Romish ecclesiastical despotism. The ignorance which it fosters renders many of our citizens the easy dupes and tools of intriguing politicians. The submissiveness to priestly authority which it enforces make a mischievous demagoguism possible. The Jesuitical arts it encourages open the way to corrupt and dangerous political combinations. Its claim to the entire control of the education of the young within its domain threatens to destroy the utility of our public-school system. And its principle of the supreme spiritual sovereignty of the pope, denying as it does, our cardinal doctrines of individual independence and of self-government, is directly antagonistic to the spirit and form of our democratic institutions. We, therefore, cannot but be interested in every movement that promises to hasten the removal of this marvelous practical anachronism of the nineteenth century.

Surely, this barrier to the world's civilization and progress must be removed. The truth must win at last. Priestcraft and superstition cannot always tyrannize over the souls of men. Reason shall come to its throne. Mankind shall yet be free; free to seek and acknowledge truth wherever it may be found; free to labor, irrespective of distinctions of class or race or sex, at whatever honest work their hands or brains or hearts can best perform; free to believe and worship according to the dictates of their better thought and conscience; free to enter the path of individual culture and development, and to advance towards the achievement of that grand destiny of which the prophecy is given in every human soul.

But, before this universal freedom can be gained, a vast work is to be done,—a terrible battle is to be fought. Human effort must cooperate with the divine forces that are working for this end in the natural progress of history. And Italy is to have a noble part in this contest; a part worthy of her ancient renown, and of the fresh hopes and enthusiasm that animate the believers in progress among her present people. Rome, the natural capital and the historical synonym of Italy, was once the military and political mistress of the world; then its ecclesiastical mistress,—which she still claims to be. The world now waits impatient to acknowledge and grant a still higher claim. Shall she not yet become the queenly champion of the world's liberties? The people of all nations, proud of her honor, press forward to bear her on their shoulders in triumphant procession to such a tribunship. And from the skies bend expectant the great shades of her historic heroes,—the famous men and women of her old classic days, an innumerable company of her Christian saints and martyrs, the shining hosts of her mediaeval apostles in science, art, philosophy, and reform,—eager to place upon her brow, with more than the ancient glory, the crown and seal of her office as defender of the sacred rights of universal humanity.

That your contemplated association may help thus to instate Italy, with Rome once more as the centre of its national life, in the van of the struggle against error, vice, and despotism, we most earnestly hope and believe. May you be united, strong, courageous, free; showing to the world how liberty may be combined with reverence, charity with vigor, self-confident prowess with self-forgetful devotion.

Heartily wishing that your deliberations may proceed in harmony, and be crowned with abundant success, we subscribe ourselves,

Most sincerely your friends and fellow-workers for truth, right, and human brotherhood.

OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM, Pres't.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, Sec'y.

To this letter the following gratifying response, dated before the meeting of the council, has been received from Count Ricciardi, the gentleman in Naples who has acted as head of the Local Committee in arranging for the meeting:

NAPLES, 26th November, 1869.

MY DEAR SIR:—It is with feelings of profound gratitude that I have received the expressions of brotherly sympathy and kind wishes of the Free Religious Association of America, conveyed to our Association of Free Thinkers, through a document of immense value to us, as it will guide and encourage us in our doubts and difficulties. Your example, as exhibited in your proceedings for the last three years, will have a powerful influence on our Committee and brotherhood. Your document shall be translated into Italian, presented to our Association, and printed in our public journals. I only regret that your Association is not officially represented at our Anti-Council, which will be numerous attended, having received already above five thousand adhesions.

Accept, my dear sir, my heartfelt thanks for your Committee and Association, and for yourself personally, and believe me ever to be,

Most truly yours,

G. RICCIARDI.

To WM. J. POTTER, Sec'y.

THE RADICAL FOR JANUARY.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.

In 1850—3,829.

In 1860—13,784.

In 1866—24,401.

In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 60,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of side-walks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

FIFTY AFFIRMATIONS.

RELIGION.

1. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself.
2. The root of religion is universal human nature.
3. Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root.
4. Historical religions are all different, in virtue of their different historical origin and development.
5. Every historical religion has thus two distinct elements,—one universal or spiritual, and the other special or historical.
6. The universal element is the same in all historical religions; the special element is peculiar in each of them.
7. The universal and the special elements are equally essential to the existence of an historical religion.
8. The unity of all religions must be sought in their universal element.
9. The peculiar character of each religion must be sought in its special element.

RELATION OF JUDAISM TO CHRISTIANITY.

10. The idea of a coming "kingdom of heaven" arose naturally in the Hebrew mind after the decay of the Davidic monarchy, and ripened under foreign oppression into a passionate longing and expectation.
11. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be a world-wide empire on this earth, both temporal and spiritual, to be established on the ruins of the great empires of antiquity by the miraculous intervention of Jehovah.
12. The Messiah or Christ was to reign over the "kingdom of heaven" as the visible deputy of Jehovah, who was considered the true sovereign of the Hebrew nation. He was to be a Priest-King,—the supreme pontiff or high-priest of the Hebrew church, and absolute monarch of the Hebrew state.
13. The "apocalyptic literature" of the Jews exhibits the gradual formation and growth of the idea of the Messianic "kingdom of heaven."
14. All the leading features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "kingdom of heaven," the "end of the world," the "great day of judgment," the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," the "resurrection of the dead," the condemnation of the wicked and the exaltation of the righteous, the "passing away of the heavens and earth," and the appearance of a "new heaven and a new earth," were definitely formed and firmly fixed in the Hebrew mind, in the century before Jesus was born.
15. John the Baptist came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." But he declared himself merely the forerunner of the Messiah.
16. Jesus also came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and announced himself as the Messiah or Christ.
17. Jesus emphasized the spiritual aspect of the Messianic kingdom; but, although he expected his throne to be established by the miraculous intervention of God, and therefore refused to employ human means in establishing it, he nevertheless expected to discharge the political functions of his office as King and Judge, when the fulness of time should arrive.

18. As a preacher of purely spiritual truth, Jesus probably stands at the head of all the great religious teachers of the past.

19. As claimant of the Messianic crown, and founder of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, Jesus shared the spirit of an unenlightened age, and stands on the same level with Gautama or Mohammed.

20. In the belief of his disciples, the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus would not prevent the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven." His throne was conceived to be already established in the heavens; and the early church impatiently awaited its establishment on earth at the "second coming of the Christ."

21. Christianity thus appears as simply the complete development of Judaism,—the highest possible fulfilment of the Messianic dreams based on the Hebrew conception of a "chosen people."

CHRISTIANITY.

22. Christianity is the historical religion taught in the Christian Scriptures, and illustrated in the history of the Christian church.

23. It is a religion in virtue of its universal element; it is the Christian religion in virtue of its special element.

24. The Christian Scriptures teach, from beginning to end, that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God,"—that is, the Hebrew Messiah. This, the Christian Confession, was declared both by Jesus and the apostles to be necessary to salvation or admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

25. The Christian church, from its origin to the present day, has everywhere planted itself on faith in the Christian Confession, as its divinely appointed foundation,—the eternal "rock" against which the "gates of hell shall never prevail."

26. The Christian Confession gradually created on the one hand the theology, and on the other hand the hierarchy, of the Roman Catholic Church. The process was not, as is claimed, a corruption, but a natural and logical development.

27. The Church of Rome embodies Christianity in its most highly developed and perfect form, as a religion of authority based on the Christian Confession.

28. Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of Christianity, whether regarded theologically or ecclesiastically, under the influence of the free spirit of protest against authority.

29. "Liberal Christianity,"—that is, democratic autocracy in religion,—is the highest development of the free spirit of protest against authority which is possible within the Christian church. It is, at the same time, the lowest possible development of faith in the Christ,—a return to the Christian Confession in its crudest and least developed form.

30. Christianity is the religion of Christians, and all Christians are believers in the Christ.

31. The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian Confession is the boundary line of Christianity.

FREE RELIGION.

32. The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion,—the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church.

33. The history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion at the expense of the Christian Religion. As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases.

34. The completion of the religious protest against authority must be the extinction of faith in the Christian Confession.

35. Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law.

36. The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.

37. The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man,—the race serving the individual, the individual serving the race.

38. The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous and universal education of man.

39. The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice of the private soul.

40. The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One.

41. Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion,—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend.

RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO FREE RELIGION

42. Christianity is identical with Free Religion so far as its universal element is concerned,—antagonistic to it so far as its special element is concerned.

43. The corner-stone of Christianity is faith in the Christ. The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in Human Nature.

44. The great institution of Christianity is the Christian Church, the will of the Christ being its supreme law. The great institution of Free Religion is the coming Republic of the World, the universal conscience and reason of mankind being its supreme organic law or constitution.

45. The fellowship of Christianity is limited by the Christian Confession; its brotherhood includes all subjects of the Christ and excludes all others. The fellowship of Free Religion is universal and free; it proclaims the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

46. The practical work of Christianity is to Christianize the world,—to convert all souls to the Christ, and ensure their salvation from the wrath of God. The practical work of Free Religion is to humanize the world,—to make the individual nobler here and now, and to convert the human race into a vast Co-operative Union devoted to universal ends.

47. The spiritual ideal of Christianity is the suppression of self and perfect imitation of Jesus the Christ. The spiritual ideal of Free Religion is the free development of self, and the harmonious education of all its powers to the highest possible degree.

48. The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of Free Religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face; Free Religion is erect on its feet.

49. The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake,—The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

50. Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.

WHAT IS FREE RELIGION?

[Read to the (then) Unitarian Society of Toledo, Sunday morning, July 13, 1869.]

"We shall not always set so great a price on a few texts, on a few lives.

Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind. Absolve you to yourself, and you shall have the suffrage of the world.

If any one imagines that this law is lax, let him keep its commandment one day. And truly it demands something godlike in him who has cast off the common motives of humanity, and has ventured to trust himself for a taskmaster. High be his heart, faithful his will, clear his sight, that he may in good earnest be doctrine, society, law, to himself, that a simple purpose may be to him as strong as iron necessity is to others."

Emerson, Essay on Self-Reliance.

Last Sunday I showed that Christianity, properly understood, is by no means whatever you or I may choose to define it, but, on the contrary, is the name of a great historical religion, which has been developed in strict accordance with historical laws. From the action of those laws it can never escape; its future must obey them, as its past has obeyed them. I showed that Christianity, as set forth in the New Testament, and as taught, beyond all reasonable doubt, by Jesus himself, has for its fundamental aim to establish on earth the so-called "kingdom of heaven;" that this "kingdom of heaven" is a great system of life and faith, a great system of government, both spiritual and temporal, based on the divinely authorized mission of Jesus as the Messiah or Christ of God; and that the most complete establishment of this "kingdom of heaven" which is possible under actual historical conditions, has been, and still is, the great Roman Papacy, including both its spiritual and temporal powers. In other words, the claim made by Jesus to be the Christ of God or universal Savior of the world logically involves, on the one hand, the orthodox theology, and, on the other, the Romish hierarchy or priesthood. From these premises I drew the conclusion that he is the most consistent "Christian" who submits to the theological and ecclesiastical rule of Rome.

It follows, therefore, that no one thoroughly imbued with the modern spirit of liberty is really a Christian; and ought not to claim the Christian name. For myself, I accept this logical consequence of what appears to me indisputable facts; and I regard myself as truly outside of Christianity as outside of Mohammedanism, or any other great religion. This does not mean that I reject either, as a whole. Whatever is good and true in any religion, I wish gratefully to accept and acknowledge; whatever is false or bad, I wish fearlessly to recognize and repudiate. All the great religions, however, which divide the world's allegiance at the present day, I see to be simply so many sects or parties, each advancing special and peculiar claims denied by all the rest. It is on account of this ingrained exclusiveness that no one of them can ever become the universal religion of man. Yet, in proportion as mankind come to perceive and assert their natural spiritual unity, I see that they must come to yearn for a faith which shall lift them above all differences of race, government, and creed, into the pure and sweet atmosphere of a universal spiritual fellowship. What shall be the nature of this all-comprehensive faith? What principles or ideas shall cement this great brotherhood of man? In very few minds has this question assumed anything like a definite shape; but to one who has distinctly grasped it, there is evidence on every hand that it is the real root of that wide-spread religious restlessness of which even superficial observers are aware. In vain have I looked for some adequate development of this question, some clear and full reply to it. Scraps and fragments of the truth lie all about us, in the various liberal periodicals and publications of the day; but nowhere has the master-mind appeared, to sweep the whole horizon with a glance, and report what he beholds. Blind and instinctive gropings after this universal faith of the human soul, all men seem to manifest; but it remains still veiled in clouds. It is, therefore, with an overwhelming sense of the vastness of my subject, and with sentiments of the profoundest modesty, that I venture this morning to seek an answer to the question,—"What is that great religion of the future, which, having its roots in no individual character or career, but rather growing out of the universal nature of man, shall unite all souls in spiritual equality and love? What is that deep and mighty faith which shall sweep away the barriers now dividing the race into hostile camps, and make possible that boundless brotherhood for which every noble spirit yearns to-day?" Once feel the flames of this transcendent faith, and you will find no warmth in any other. To-day, therefore, I ask your attention to the best statement of it that I can compass; and it may be compressed into two words, Free Religion.

In the first place, what is Religion? Men misconceive it in a thousand different ways; but I shall not now pause to criticise popular misconceptions. Religion, taken in its essence, is man's obedience to that something within him which ever impels him upward to the Better. The essential fact in all genuine religion is man's struggle after perfection, according to his own highest ideal of perfection. Divers names have been given to this something in man,—conscience, the ideal, the moral sense, the inner light, the Holy Spirit, the grace of God, and countless names besides. I care not what name is applied to it; he is religious who obeys this impulse to the Better, and no one is so who does not obey it. This aspiration and endeavor after perfection,—this unconquerable resolve to reach upward,—this hungering and thirsting after ideal good—is the very essence and central verity of all religion. The rational theist believes it to be the life of God in the human soul; the atheist believes it to be the result of impersonal forces and laws. But theist and atheist, so far as they aspire and strive to realize their own highest ideal, are religious men. It was one and the same spirit that dwelt in the heart of Fenelon, the saintly Catholic, and Holyoake, the saintly atheist. It is this pursuit of the ideal, this honest endeavor to realize it in character and life, which constitutes the soul of all religion; and although I feel convinced in my own mind that the spiritual ideal is the inward and highest possible revelation of the Infinite to the finite, I am unspeakably more anxious to help men obey their own ideals, than I am to convince them that I have rightly interpreted mine. Provided I can help men to the fact, I am perfectly willing to leave the philosophy an open question. On this point I wish to be clearly understood by all. As a minister of religion, I seek to increase religious life in the world,—to make men's consciences tenderer, and their wills stronger, and their ideals purer; and if I can accomplish this result in ever so slight a degree, I count my ministry successful. But while I myself believe in a conscious, intelligent, spiritual power as the indwelling cause of the universe, I do not feel called upon to defend any theological doctrine whatever. Doctrines are fair subjects of discussion and difference of opinion; but religion itself, the earnest endeavor to make life noble, beautiful, great,—this is the only end worthy to be lived for.

If I have not failed to make plain my thought, we shall agree, I think, that religion in all its forms must include earnest devotion to the ideal, a divine passion for the good and true, as each soul understands it; and that under all differences of form this is the one essential thing. The next inquiry is, "What is Free Religion?"

There are two kinds, and only two kinds of religious development,—artificial and natural. It used to be the fashion in the great palace-gardens of Europe (and it may be the fashion still) to train and cut trees into all sorts of fantastic shapes,—pyramids, arbors, heads, animals, birds. Place a tree tortured into the shape of a peacock, for instance, beside a tree as nature makes it,—and which of the two will appear to a cultured eye the more beautiful? An unperverted taste would at once pronounce the peacock-shaped tree a disgusting deformity. So it is with religion. The simple, instinctive love of the ideal has been trained by human systems into repulsive forms; and what should have served to make human life more sweet and fair, has been sometimes made a means of horrible distortion. An observant eye may behold all about us how religion has been made to rob men of their courage and sincerity and natural manliness. Dwarfed and twisted have thousands become under the influence of artificial religion. Now the difference between artificial and natural religion,—the difference between a character developed under constraint and one developed in freedom,—arises from the fact, that the former has been trained to reverence and obey an external law the latter an internal law. The one has suffered its ideal, or highest conception of goodness, to be made for it by others; the other has allowed its ideal to grow up freely in the soul itself. One man goes to some outward authority, the Bible, perhaps, or the Church, to learn what is duty, or what is truth; the other ignores all these outward authorities, and consults simple experience, reason, conscience, the light within. Hence the one conforms to a pattern made for him, and lets his soul be pruned and bent into the fashionable peacock-shape; while the other obeys the healthy instincts of Nature, and grows into the sturdiest form of vigor and beauty. Religion, if genuine, always produces obedience to the ideal; but artificial religion borrows this from without, while natural religion creates it from within. The Christian church, for instance, declares it the chief duty of man to believe in Christ, and accept passively the salvation bought by his blood; while Nature declares that the only salvation possible or needed comes from active obedience to the inward law of truth and right.

Free Religion, then, is, on the one hand, the inward Oracle commanding in its own name, the inward Ideal attracting by its own beauty, the inward Light shining by its own radiance; and, on the other hand, it is the free and willing obedience of the soul to laws which it perceives to be those of universal human nature. The human soul has written all the Bibles, organized all the churches, appointed all the prophets and Christs; and it asserts forevermore its own superiority to all of its own creations. Take an illustration. The Federal Constitution, framed by our forefathers, to some extent recognized and legalized human slavery; and when good men (as good men did) fell down and worshipped the work of men's hands, and declared that there was no "higher law" than the law of the land, brave old Thaddeus Stevens boldly affirmed the sanctity of the unwritten law of natural justice, and avowed his purpose of working "outside the Constitution." Here was a notable instance of Free Religion,—the soul proclaiming its own infinite superiority to whatsoever it had itself produced, and overthrowing all man-made idols from their bloody pedestals. Thus must it deal also with all other idols,—with the Church, with the Bible, with the Christ; thus must it ever affirm the sacredness of primal intuitions against the claims of everything besides, and plant its foot on every neck that rebels against its supremacy. He that makes can unmake as well; and human institutions, created at the mandate of the soul, must change or perish at its more enlightened mandate. Free Religion demands room and opportunity for all human development; it asseverates the right of all human faculties to unfold themselves in natural ways, subject only to the laws of nature; it predicts the destruction of everything that interferes with human progress, and the creation of everything that shall promote it. The bodies of men must be free, to labor for all material goods; and their souls must be free, to labor for all social and spiritual goods. Physical slavery is well nigh extinguished over the earth; but spiritual slavery still exists almost everywhere, even in free America. To the struggle for physical and political freedom succeeds to-day the vaster struggle for freedom of the soul; and Free Religion is the legitimate heir of Anti-Slavery. Free government, free trade, free religion—that is the creed of America, slowly writing itself on the page of history.

Religion, therefore, is man's earnest obedience to an ideal; and Free Religion is his obedience to his own ideal in its natural and unperverted state. Our answer thus far, however, is too general to meet our wants; and I propose to inquire further, what is the central idea of Free Religion? And what is the precise end it aims at? I will treat these questions in the order named.

1. The central idea and great inspiring sentiment of Free Religion, is faith in Man as a Progressive Being. It is this which lifts radicalism far above philosophy and mere speculation, and makes it emphatically a religion. It is this which has burned in the heart of every great reformer, filled him to the full with divine enthusiasm, and revealed to his raptured eye a better future for his race. It takes more than a theory, it takes a faith, to uphold men like Garrison and Phillips, Emerson and Parker. Yes, faith in man as a progressive being is the heaven-kindled flame which shines out in every heroic career, and sheds a forward ray on the path of mankind into the thick darkness of the future. But what do we mean by Faith in Man? Surely not faith in his present condition, in his actual performance. Of all disappointing sights, there is none so sad and disheartening as the prospect of society as it is, unless we see also, with spiritual vision, the prospect of society as it ought to be,—unless, furthermore, we believe that society as it is shall develop into society as it ought to be. This is what I mean by faith in man as a progressive being. Man as he is is little better than a compound of tiger, fox, and monkey; Man as he ought to be, and will be, is unspeakably nobler than that impossible fowl, the winged "angel" of the painters. It is the capacities of human nature, not the realities of human character, that feed the fires of a wise faith in man. If our ideal is so high above us as sometimes to fill us with despair, our actuals so far beneath us as always to fill us with shame. You and I are not what we ought to be,—not what we might be,—not, let us highly resolve, what we will be. The glorious dream of our ideal, ever floating above us and before us, creates as divine a faith in our possibilities, as it creates an indignant self-reproach for our present failures. The faith in human nature born of these great visions is, in my opinion, father of the only faith in God that cannot be shaken; for these are they that testify in our musing spirits of an Infinite Perfection above and beyond our ken. If man can dream such dreams, they must be the reflection of a Vast Reality diviner still. Impossible would be the sunset tints, painted on the river's surface, did not the beauty and the glory stream from the heavens on high. Enough—it is faith in Man as a being of unknown, yet magnificent destinies, that is the central idea and exhaustless inspiration of Free Religion.

And in the light of this great faith, how sickly and starved appears that form of radicalism which knows only how to deny! There are three kinds of radicalism, and one alone is genuine. There is the indifferent radical, who believes nothing, and cares for nothing, except the gross, visible, tangible things of sense. There is the iconoclastic radical, who delights in ruins and scoffs at all construction. But besides these, there is the believing radical, whose radicalism, destructive as it may seem, is only a stronger and mightier grasp of the everlasting rock, a profounder insight into universal ideas, a vaster comprehension of eternal laws. In him, radicalism is but a deepening, a strengthening, a purification of that living faith in human nature, without which a man, even in his lifetime, shrivels away into a mummy. Radicalism is worse than superstition, if it kindles no lofty enthusiasm, awakens no high motives, arouses no heroic purposes, creates no intense and earnest faith. The soul can no more thrive on pure negations, than the body can grow fat on a diet of soap-bubbles or arithmetical zeros; it needs the rich juices of strong moral convictions and universal ideas and unselfish aspirations, without which it loses all hold on life. Were it not for its faith in Man, radicalism would not be what it is,—the sheet-anchor of many a brave and gallant heart. The true radical believes not less, but incalculably more, than the churches that condemn him; for his faith, instead of narrowing itself down to a creed or a book, cleaves to the boundless truth. Let him bide his time; his unbeaten track through the wilderness is the future highway of the nations.

2. The precise end aimed at by Free Religion is the symmetrical development of Human Nature in all directions, the Perfection of the Individual and the Perfection of the Race. This is an end widely different from any immediately proposed by the great religions of the world. All these, moreover, have their theology, their fundamental or peculiar doctrines, to propagate. But Free Religion leaves the investigation of truth and the defence of ascertained truths to science, philosophy and criticism, reserving nothing to dogmatism; it trusts the free intelligence of Man to discover all that can be learned by Man, and has no postulates or favorite dogmas that dread the light of this nineteenth century. The creed of the Future is to be settled by science, not by theology,—using the word science to cover scientific investigation into the truth of things. Thought must have no bounds set to its free range by timid churchmen, whether by the open employment of despotic authority, or by the less arrogant but no less efficacious means of exciting holy horror at the attempt of "carnal reason" to probe the mysteries of the Church. Freedom of the mind, with all its faculties, to grapple with all questions that present themselves for solution,—this is a primary demand of Free Religion. Thought alone must settle the questions that thought can raise. Differing, therefore, from all historical faiths, in having no theological system to expound or defend, Free Religion aims simply at the growth and culture of human nature in all directions; and its activities are directed to every object that tends to enhance and perfect and spiritualize civilization. It includes all the commercial, industrial, social, political, and scientific movements of the age, quite as truly as movements more immediately moral and religious; but it lays peculiar stress on the latter, since all human development is miserably defective which overlooks or neglects the noblest side of human nature. And inasmuch as the desires of wealth, power, and fame are motives of themselves sufficiently powerful to stimulate progress in all material directions, it may be said that spiritual development is the especial province of Free Religion, provided that the old distinction of secular and sacred be forever abolished. All things are secular, all sacred, that in any wise help humanity forward in the path of progress.

Now human development has two aspects, that of the individual, and that of the race. The grand end of individual development is Character,—character for its own sake, in utter oblivion of rewards or punishments. To be noble and free and manly in character, is the only true object of individual ambition; and all success or prosperity in outward matters should be made subordinate and secondary. The heaven and hell of the church are not worth a moment's thought in comparison with the heaven of high character and the hell of low character here on earth. Religion, if truly free, comes thoroughly secularized, and emancipated forever from the thralldom of hope and fear. CHARACTER, then, great and beneficent character, is the goal which he must win, who worthily runs the race of life.

In like manner, the great end of all social development is the attainment of high social character, the achievement of the ideal social state. When freedom and tender regard for the rights of the humblest member of the human family have become the fundamental law of society,—when the attainment of universal human welfare is seen to be the attainment of the welfare of each human soul,—when all the energies and forces of society are directed to the one end of helping and perfecting the individual,—then will the race become developed in a high and noble way, and realize its own ideal. The spiritual unity of mankind, the brotherhood of all that bear the impress of humanity, is the great, inspiring end to be evermore held in view. The struggles now going on all over the face of the earth to break down the barriers of race, climate, government and sect, and to come into closer and more friendly relations, are struggles to realize at last the Unity of Man. The Pacific Railroad, the Suez Canal, the Anglo-American and Franco-American ocean telegraphs, the great lines of steamers and the countless fleets of merchant vessels, in short, all the means of quick communication which annihilate space and abolish time, are awakening in all nations the sentiment of a common nature, a common destiny, a common kinship in the spirit; and these, infinitely more than missionary societies, are hastening on the day when war shall be as obsolete as witchcraft, and the peace of universal brotherhood reign over all the countries of the globe.

Now these two sides of human development, these two great objects of individual and social aspiration, are really one and the same. Character can only be achieved by the dedication of self to universal ends which include the race; the spiritual unity of man can only be achieved by developing high character in every individual. The individual must serve the race; the race must serve the individual. Here, my friends, is the great idea of faith in man carried out to its widest application, and unfolded in its deepest and divinest meaning. "Each for all, and all for each"—that is the motto of Free Religion, the secret of the great future of mankind, the "E Pluribus Unum" of the divine fellowship of souls. He who lives for universal ends,—for justice, truth, freedom, progress, love,—lives for the highest good, not of himself alone, but of all men as well; and in thus achieving for himself the noblest character, he equally achieves for others the widest usefulness. "You are a citizen of the universe," says Epictetus, "and a part of it; not a subordinate, but a principal part. You are capable of comprehending the Divine economy, and of considering the connections of things. What, then, does the character of a citizen imply? To hold no private interest; to deliberate of nothing as a separate individual, but rather like the hand or the foot, which, if they had reason, and comprehended the constitution of nature, would never pursue or desire but with a reference to the whole." In like manner, when society shall have learned to care tenderly for its weakest and humblest member,—to dedicate all its vast powers and resources to the education, protection, and assistance of all its individuals,—then it will have secured all public objects; and realized the grandest ideal of the social state.

Oh friends, these great ideas, binding each to all and all to each, are the key-note of Free Religion; are they not also the key-note of all that promises peace and joy to man? Infuse the spirit of these ideas into all souls, and something better than the millennium will have dawned on earth. All the race will have become one vast Brotherhood and Fellowship, one immense Co-operative Union, devoted to the relief and prevention of the evils that now scourge mankind. Respect for equal rights, reverence for the individual conscience, heartfelt good-will to each and every man, woman, and child, shall yet become the organic law of human society; and devotion to the public good shall yet take the place of selfishness in the private soul. When that day comes, (as come it will, though you and I shall long before have vanished from the sight of men), then will come the universal reign of Free Religion. Shall we not count it a high privilege here and now to plant the seed that shall ripen into so glorious a fruit? To strengthen men's faith in themselves and in humanity, to break their spiritual bonds, to arouse the spirit of unselfish devotion to universal ends, to make men manlier, truer, and wiser,—that is the work of Free Religion, the great and divine object at which, I trust, all shall yet learn to aim.

"Every man has his price!" cried one who had sold himself. "True!" cries he who can be bought—and he alone.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Lucretia Mott regrets always that they did not subscribe for the Liberator until the second number. THE INDEX may turn out a Liberator. I shall be sorry if it does and I do not subscribe in good time. So here is the stamp for a year."

—"A few days ago the Prospectus of the forthcoming INDEX was received. On opening it, casually saw a Rev. to two names, and immediately laid it on one side, prejudged as being in opposition to my views on Priestology (a new word, perhaps.) But to-day it met my eye again—took it up, and read it carefully—and came to the conclusion that THE INDEX was intended to advocate my views exactly."

—"I consider your Prospectus worth the price of a year's subscription to THE INDEX, which I gladly enclose—though I am willing to accept the paper itself. A subscriber to the Radical from the start... I desire to have my name put down plain and strong on your subscription list.... I look eagerly for THE INDEX."

—"I still hold many of the great questions wide open—and am more afraid than ever of all sorts of pocket philosophies, however self-consistent, compact and complete. Yet, full of faith in the attainability of Truth—provided true men seek it,—I welcome all hearty, honest thought and speech. I hold to 'Christianity, in a sense wider than definitions, as a symbol of the noblest spirit and life of Religion, just as I hold to Republicanism (when we shall get it!) as the noblest style of Government, though Government is the larger term. And as I do not drop the name 'American' out of deference to Humanity, so I don't feel bound to disclaim the 'Christian' name, out of deference to Absolute Religion. But over words alone, why contend? I did feel a little rebuked when my threat to declare war against the current religion of the times, brought out from dear Mr. — the suggestion that it seemed more important to have a 'crusade against the irreligion of the country.'.... For all which I.... must at least keep an eye on your work, which I hope has also its vital practical aspects. So here's two dollars for THE INDEX."

—"I see that you propose to start a radical journal, to be called THE INDEX. I must have it, and you will please send specimen copies. There is a great need, I think, for such an organ of Religious Free Thought as you could edit. We stand in need of a new religion, the Religion of Humanity, that shall marry all the interests of man into one grand whole, the perfection of the human spirit. I should like to send you an article occasionally, and aid you in that way if I can. My abilities are not great, but I may be able to do something."

—"I rejoice, especially since the Liberal Christian has subsided into less liberal hands, that there is to be a periodical in America, catholic as the human heart, and broad and searching as the human intellect.... May God speed it and you!"

—"I hope this new religion will inculcate such principles as will necessarily lead to a higher morality than that which we have hitherto attained. Let us not be known by mere professions of godliness, but the exhibition of a spontaneous practical goodness towards our brother men. Let us claim no rights, no immunities for ourselves, that we do not concede to our brothers. Let us show our love of our brother by manifesting as much anxiety for his happiness as our own. Let every one have all the value he or she creates by his or her productive energies, and a state of human enjoyment will be the result, which will vastly transcend anything that can ever be affected by the preaching of mere theological dogmas."

—"I rejoice that free religion has been introduced in Ohio. I only wish I could meet and take you by the hand, and welcome you to my native State. When I have seen your paper, I hope to be able to get other friends to subscribe."

—"I am glad to know that there is to be a journal 'standing squarely outside of Christianity,' which will at the same time fairly represent the manhood and culture—not in the fold. The West needs such an influence. Wishing you entire success, I am, &c."

—"If you had only the right kind of agent,—some wiry Yankee whose heart was in the enterprise, and who could go, like Paul, afoot through the country, he would find thousands of people who would be glad to take the paper, and esteem it a God-send. These scattered forces ought to be brought into line of battle against the hosts of superstition. I am sure we can rout them; for we use ball in our warfare, while they can use only blank cartridges. It is amazing—the weakness of their defenses! The mad-dog cry of Infernal is their only potent weapon, and this is fast going into desuetude."

—"I should like very much to subscribe for your paper, but feel that I am too poor to venture at present, as I am but a laboring man, receiving 13 shillings per day, and have three children and their mother to keep house and home overhead; and what is worse, the works which afford us the means to that end are now standing still on account of dull trade. But you have my warmest sympathies in your up-hill work. I have done what I could for you among my friends, but they are all workingmen like myself, and cannot just now assist you. I have got one subscriber for you, and hope after a little while I may do better."

—"I am an old man, raised up in the Methodist Church from boyhood to old age. A few years past I changed my views, and adopted those held by some Unitarians. I am anxious to examine your position, as the Liberal Christian states it—'outside of Christianity.' I have no fear of Truth; it never does any harm, and never will. My means are limited. Anything you could send me will be carefully read."

[NOTE.—We have received letters from several persons saying that they would subscribe, if they were not so poor. If any generous-hearted friend will send money to be devoted to sending THE INDEX to such persons, it shall be scrupulously applied to that purpose.—ED.]

The following statistics of the Romish Church have just been published in Rome:—

Patriarchs and archbishops and bishops resident, 766; the same in partibus infidelium, 228, total 994. Of these 12 are patriarchs, 75 resident archbishops of the Latin Rite, 25 resident archbishops of other Rites, and 35 archbishops in partibus—185 archbishops. The resident Latin bishops are 609; bishops of other rites, 45; bishops in partibus, 193—994. Of the bishops three are 95 years of age, two are 90, and twenty from 80 to 85. Only twenty are under 38.—N. Y. Observer.

"Catholicism means that the soul has duties defined by the Church. Protestantism means that the soul has no duties which the mind does not confirm. Thus the right of private judgment is the core of modern history. But Protestantism is nothing in itself. The end of Private Judgment is to find Universal Reason—mental truth establishing moral law."—Mrs. Samantha Hunker.

MATINS.

Slowly the sun climbs up the amber east,
And from her mountain-altars broad Earth rolls aloft pale wreaths of curling mist,— Incense to God.

Hark to the anthem of the low-voiced sea!
Along the distant-dying strand
Whisper the billowy choir their symphony,
Vast, deep, and grand.

Through his wild forest-harp of piny strings
Soft breathes the wind melodious strains,
And piping birds pour forth their jargonings
In leafy fanes.

Earth, sea and air their sweetest notes employ
To hymn thy praise, O Holy One!
And chant perpetual songs of grateful joy
Before thy throne.

But my mute awe can find no voice or tongue—
Silent the waves of worship roll;
Yet poor, discordant, weak, Thou hear'st a song
Deep in my soul.

The Index.

JANUARY 15, 1870,

We have received several excellent communications, which will be printed as early as may be, our space being limited. We thank our friends for their favors.

Simultaneously with THE INDEX, there appeared a tiny and tidy sheet in Toledo, called The Young Enterprise, and edited by Masters Reed, Wagar & Co. It will be published monthly, at twenty-five cents a year. The two papers are twins; and THE INDEX wishes The Young Enterprise the most flattering success.

Nothing can be more racy than "Warrington's" letters in the Springfield Republican. There is no lack of seasoning,—the condiments are all there in person.

The Troy Daily Times is publishing a series of "epistles" by "A. Hunker, of Hunkersville," which have very considerable merit as satire. The irony is too apparent, and would be more effective if more subtle. But sharp hits abound; and Mrs. Samantha Hunker utters most excellent and solid sense. Mr. Hunker belongs to the genus "Nasby," but not to the species "mis-speller." We venture to predict that a career is opening before him.

We are privately informed that a State Woman's Suffrage Convention is soon to be held at Battle Creek, Michigan. The call is well and numerous signed. Mrs. Tracy Cutler, of Cleveland, Mrs. Cole, of Sidney, O., Prof. Crocker, Mr. G. B. Stebbins, and others will be present; Mrs. Livermore and Lucy Stone are hoped for. We trust that the Convention will be well attended, and exert a powerful influence in the State. Further particulars are promised, which we will promptly communicate to our readers.

It is said that Rev. Dr. Osgood, for about twenty years a Unitarian minister in New York city, has gone over to Episcopacy. The example of Bishop Huntington may have suggested the idea that Unitarianism might give to Episcopacy another bishop. But if he had waited a while longer, it is probable, judging from signs of the times, that his chance of a bishopric would be better in his old denomination.

The Protestant conscience begins to feel pricked at its long connivance in legal evasions of the "law of Christ." The Richardson assassination is calling attention to the contradiction existing at present between the profession and the practice of Christians in the matter of divorce. The following is from the Evangelist:

"The Christian minister is called upon to consider the validity of a divorce, when asked to recognize it in a subsequent official act. And in forming his judgment it is not human legislation, but the law of Christ, which must be his guide. California, for example, adds to those of Scripture four or five other causes as sufficient. If a minister then may shelter himself behind the authority of the civil courts, and marry again a man divorced on any one of these grounds, it certainly is not easy to see why the same rule will not justify him in marrying a party divorced on any ground at all under the law of Indiana, which leaves everything to the discretion of the judge. We may readily perceive where this would soon land us. We cannot overstate the strength of our conviction, then, that the times loudly demand that the Christian ministry should now be unanimous in adhering to the law of Christ on this subject."

THE TENDER MERCIES OF THE GALLOWS.

Rev. T. K. Beecher has cheerful views about capital punishment. He says:—

"To send a man out of this world to give an account of himself before the Judge of all the earth, has never seemed to us a very great hardship or cruelty. It is not conceivable that God treats any man well or ill because of what other men may have done to him. . . . Hanging a man is like sending a boy home from school to his father. It is a confession on the part of the school, 'we cannot manage him.' When a teacher turns a boy out of school, the boy's father does as seems to him best. Just so when a Sheriff hangs a man. God receives the expelled culprit and does for him and to him the very wisest and best thing that can be done. We do only the best that we know how to do. . . . Opposition to capital punishment seems distrustful of God—his wisdom or power, one or both. . . . We insist that no boy suffers wrong when sent from school to his own father, nor can man do harm to his fellow-man by sending him to 'Our Father in Heaven.'"

Does not Mr. Beecher perceive that the same argument which justifies him in hanging the criminal, justifies the criminal in killing his victim? Murder is only a blessing in disguise,—it sends a man home to his "Father in Heaven." Assassination is only the most thoughtful of kindnesses,—it saves a man from the blundering care of human friends, who "do only the best that they know how to do," and sends him to One who will "do for him the best that can be done." DeQuincey wrote a treatise on "Murder as a Fine Art;" Mr. Beecher will probably favor the world with a treatise on "Murder as a Christian Philanthropy." If he will pardon the suggestion, perhaps it would be well to print on the title-page of his new gospel, as a suitable epigraph, the anecdote of the little boy who came home from a revival meeting, and who, after watching a fly on the window-pane for a while, was heard to ejaculate, in a tone of the deepest commiseration,—“Do you want to see your God, little fly? Well! [punching it tenderly against the glass] You—SHALL!”

It is hard not to feel disappointed when they who ought to refine and elevate the public conscience, thus help to harden and brutalize it. Hanging the criminal—is that doing the "best that we know how to do?" Is that the deliberate confession of Christianity in the latter half of the nineteenth century? Is there no way by which society shall protect itself without imitating the very crime it punishes? Because there has been one murder, shall there always be two? Once more theology steps forward to defeat the ends of mercy, and perpetuate contempt of human life. Shame to America, if she shall not learn a "more excellent way!" Read the following:

ROCHESTER, Dec. 10.—Franz Joseph Messner, who was to have been hung in this city to-day for the murder of his wife, was granted a stay of proceedings this morning by Judge Grover, of the Court of Appeals, on the ground of irregularity in the proceedings of his trial. Three gentlemen left this city late yesterday and arrived at Judge Grover's residence in Angelica, about one o'clock this morning. After obtaining the order they started back and had the good fortune to catch the various trains which they had to take to reach the city before the execution. During the journey they were compelled to make eighteen miles each way in a road wagon and arrived at the jail just as Messner had dressed himself and preparations were being made to lead him to the gallows. The poor fellow had passed a restless night and looked fearfully care-worn when he received the communion at the hands of the priest. On hearing of the respite, by which his case will be carried to the Court of Appeals on the first Tuesday in January, he sank into his seat and endeavored to thank his benefactors, but for a few moments he was unable to utter a word. He finally recovered himself, and, taking one of the lawyers by the hand, exclaimed: "I am a stranger in this land, and I thought I had not a single friend in the world, but I have found friends in you, gentlemen. I trusted in God, and he has not abandoned me."—Toledo Blade.

If the attending priest had only made Mr. Beecher's ethical discovery, how greatly might he have comforted the unreasonable Messner! But the priest was still in the dark, and so the poor outcast lost his consolation.

Alas! how blind is inhumanity!

SECTS IN MEDICINE.

The spirit of bigotry and exclusiveness is not confined to theologians alone. Walls of separation divide physicians also into hostile camps, and create a caste-feeling as contemptible as priestly arrogance. Quackery, it is true, is a wide-spread evil in America, where patent medicines and nostrums of all sorts poison the foolish people that resort to them; but creeds in Medical Associations are no more a protection against quackery, than creeds in churches are a protection against rascality. Many a quack can boast his diploma and his regularly earned title of M. D., as the observation of every one will abundantly testify. That the public should be in some manner protected against the impositions of regular or irregular charlatans, is evident enough; but no safe-guard exists in the present regulations of the "faculty." Rigid examinations, not only in all the fundamental branches of medical science, but also in all the various methods of medical treatment, should precede the acquisition of medical degrees; whereas at present the student is trained as narrowly in the doctrines of a particular school of practice, as children are trained in the doctrines of a particular sect in religion. No man should receive the title of physician, except after thorough examination in the theories of all the various schools of practice, as well as in all the departments of medical science; otherwise he cannot intelligently choose among them. If Medical Associations should admit to membership competent physicians alone, without requiring any particular method of treatment, but leaving a free choice of treatment to each of their members, the public would feel greater confidence in them and resort less to the impostors who now fatten on its ignorance and perplexity. It is a cheering sign of the times that sectarianism begins to be felt as utterly incompatible with science as it is with religion. The subjoined letter, originally printed in the form of a circular, we commend to the attention of our readers, as a manly protest against the narrowness and exclusiveness among medical practitioners:

A Letter to the New Hampshire Homeopathic Medical Society.

GENTLEMEN:—The repeated kind invitation to attend your meetings, and become a member of the New Hampshire Homeopathic Medical Society, communicated by your Secretary, induces me to give this explanation. Allow me to state, with due modesty and respect for the members of the society, the reason why I do not join it.

It would be inconsistent with my convictions to become a member of any Medical Society with the names Allopathic, Homœopathic, Eclectic, etc., prefixed.

All these societies do some good, but they are apt to be sectarian, and their unreasonable oppositions and prejudices prove that no one of them has that which is essential to the highest welfare of humanity. Every honest practitioner will acknowledge that if we examine all the different modes of treatment, we find only small assurance of the cure of suffering humanity.

Do we increase the amount of our knowledge by these sectarian oppositions and feelings? Can a Homœopathic practitioner assume that before Hahnemann and his system, there was no curative method? Or can an Allopathic practitioner assume that after Galen and his system there was no improvement? Yet both of these absurdities seem to be implied in these unreasonable, vituperative oppositions. Our medical treatment is in the same condition as the theology of all the historical religions and sects. No one of them has arrived at the condition of science, but they all struggle for it. The seed of science is in all, but its development is impeded by these sectarian oppositions.

Masonry, that ancient and lasting fraternity, asks no man, if he is a Jew, Mohammedan, Christian, etc., but every Mason must be, or ought to be, a good man. This broad ground seems to me one cause of its success. Medical fraternities ought to ask no one, who wishes to join them, if he is an Allopathist, Homœopathist, Eclectic, etc., but every one should be fairly examined. Do we not have a better chance to ascertain whether a person is a physician, than Masonry has to ascertain whether a person is really a good man?

I never have found any remedy which acts so promptly to relieve certain pains as an allopathic dose of morphia, neither have I found a remedy which acts with such promptness in certain feverish actions as a homœopathic dose of Aconite. When I meet an allopathic practitioner and tell him that I gave the dose of morphia, and he knows nothing about my other treatment, he will call me an allopathist. When I meet a homœopathic practitioner, and tell him my treatment with aconite in the same way, he will call me a homœopathist. Does not common honesty compel me to tell them that I am neither an allopathist nor a homœopathist? But I will say to both of them that I am a physician, and administer remedies in accordance with my knowledge and judgment. If they dispute that, all I request of them is, to try me by a fair examination. Would it not be better for all honest practitioners to unite and form a society of physicians, with the principle—"To prove all things, and hold fast to the best?"

Therefore, gentlemen, let us hope that your society may be the first in the State of New Hampshire, to invite all those who have acquired the right to claim the name physician, without regard to difference of treatment, provided it is based on scientific principles, as much as possible, and rationally adapted to the present state of science.

With the sincere hope that you will assist in carrying out these liberal principles,

I am very respectfully,

CARL H. HORSCH.

LETTER FROM M. D. CONWAY.

51 NOTTING-HILL SQUARE,
LONDON, ENGLAND, Dec. 16, 1869.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—It has given me great pleasure to watch the bold stand you are making for an American Religion, and to learn that the Society at Toledo, whose earnestness and intelligence I so well remember, has resolved to sustain you in it. From this point your INDEX points from the sunset, but it points really to the sunrise, for every sunset is a dawn to people further on. It is really we over here who stand in the sunset of a declining faith; and our evening-star should be to America the morning-star, heralding Faith's rising day. Nothing is more certain than that what is called Christianity has ceased to be any standard of excellence whatever; instead of the danger, the fidelity, and sacrifices it implied to the peasant preacher of Jerusalem and the Galilean fishermen, it means cushioned pews, fat livings, hard conservatism, persecutions. They who bear the heaviest cross are the so-called infidels. If it were not for the low commercial advantages now involved with Christianity, the Saxon mind would throw it off; as it is, they look to America, uninvolved as yet in an established church, to fulfil that task of the English brain and heart. I entirely sympathize with your rejection of the name "Christian." The very fact that so many of our liberals hold on and struggle so furiously for it, is the argument against it; it shows that the word is an idol. It is to Unitarians what "Church" is to Catholics, "Bible" to orthodox Protestants; and all are what the Fetish is to its worshipper. Truly liberated minds will attach their devotion to the essence, not to a name. They tell us the name of Christian has prestige? It is præstigiūm—falsehood. The Christian name once implied great virtues and self-denials; it implies them no longer; its use is a sham. The task to which you are called is related to the age; in it is folded the Religion of Humanity!

Your friend,

M. D. CONWAY.

"Trust thyself," says Emerson; "every heart vibrates to that iron string."

LETTER FROM HENRY BLANCHARD.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Jan. 4, 1870.

REV. F. E. ABBOT—

MY DEAR BROTHER:—Enclosed please find two dollars, my subscription for the INDEX for one year.

I have read the first number, just received, with care. While ready to co-work with all men and women who desire to aid what you call free religion, I feel now, as I did when I made a very brief address at the first public meeting of the Free Religious Association, that many persons who disclaim the name, Christian, do not do justice to the great teacher Jesus of Nazareth. Allow me to present three points for your very earnest consideration:—

Jesus is probably reported imperfectly by the writers of the gospel; Jesus' own words show that he did not lay the stress on his Messiahship which Matthew and others undoubtedly did; since "as a preacher of purely spiritual truths, Jesus probably stands at the head of all great religious teachers of the past,"—and since, as I profoundly believe, men need an accepted standard for the guidance of life, why shall not we who believe thus, be ready to call ourselves followers, disciples of Jesus,—and since "Christ" means the anointed, why shall not we who believe that God anoints many great teachers, be ready to call him the anointed whom we recognize as the greatest teacher of spiritual truths?

I take the accounts of Jesus' life as honest, historical writings. They show me, under the guidance of James Martineau and William Henry Furness, a greater soul than the mere letter can fairly present. I see that Matthew labors to prove the Messiahship by many a quotation. I know that these are forced into a service for which they were not meant. But Jesus said, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister and mother." The apostles, doubtless, insisted on the Confession of Christ. The teacher in one passage may seem to justify the demand, but I read in those words only the statement of a profound spiritual truth. I can call him teacher, master, even redeemer, because I believe him to be the greatest teacher of "absolute religion" and its greatest example. And since I see the need of a passion to redeem the world,—the love of God and Man burning in men's souls,—and since Jesus is the historic prophet who introduced the great doctrine of united love for God and for Man, and is still the great historic illustration thereof, the one in history whose life and whose words quicken me, and many another like me, into devouter love of God and deeper love of man, I could easily, if there were pressing need, call him the Savior of the world.

I will co-work with you, my brother, as far as I can, but I am still a Liberal Christian. I believe that Liberal Christianity gives me Free Religion and—a great leader,

Cordially yours,
HENRY BLANCHARD,
Minister of the Unitarian Society.

[In reply we would say:—

1. Jesus is doubtless very imperfectly reported. But when all the reports agree throughout in representing him as claiming the Messiahship, and make this claim the key-note of his career, we must either accept the reports as correct on this point, or throw them aside altogether. If a single saying can be cited in which Jesus disclaims the Messiahship, we are still open to conviction; but on this subject the four gospels speak emphatically with one concurrent voice. The verse quoted above is no disclaimer.

2. Formerly we believed as strongly as Mr. Blanchard that Jesus "laid no stress" on his Messiahship, and even argued in the Christian Examiner that "Christianity is pure Theism." But since that day our cataract has been couched.

3. Men do not in our judgment, "need an accepted standard for the guidance of life," if this means an outward standard,—the Bible, for instance, or the New Testament, or the four gospels, or the words of Jesus. Does Mr. Blanchard accept the authority of Jesus as superior to that of his own conscience and reason, or not? We cannot tell. To us his authority is absolute zero, if it contradicts the inward authority.

We have tried to meet the "three points" fairly,—thanking Mr. Blanchard for raising them, and thanking him still more for the fraternal spirit in which he has done it. Most sincerely do we respond to that spirit, whether in Christian or pagan, theist or atheist. And we find it in them all.—ED.]

LETTER FROM M. WOOLLEY.

ODELL, Ill., Dec. 27, 1869.

TO FRANCIS E. ABBOT—Dear Sir:—I received your Prospectus of "The Index" in due course of mail. With regard to its purpose, I am at a loss, your language being somewhat enigmatical. "The Index," you say, "will have a two-fold object, positive and negative." Now, as these terms are antagonistic to each other, and both used to qualify a singular noun, I am led to suppose you mean to propagate irreligion as well as religion; that you will advocate right and wrong, good and evil, FREEDOM and SLAVERY, etc., etc., at the same time. My surmise gains additional strength from your assertion that you will aim "to increase FREEDOM," while "above all things you will aim to increase pure and genuine RELIGION." I he terms FREEDOM and RELIGION, as I understand them, are, and ever have been, if we can put faith in history, antagonistic, the one positive, the other negative—elements between which there is so small an affinity, that every attempt to unite them has ever been productive of war, famine and pestilence.—[Goodrich's History of All Nations, p. 56, and in fact all history.]

I have been, and am still, in the habit of taking the word Religion as synonymous with the word Ignorance, and Irreligion as synonymous with Science. In this my opinion I am supported by the highest authority in the world. First, history shows that as we progress, i. e. as knowledge increases, ignorance decreases, and as irreligion increases, so religion decreases. Of this incontestable truth, all teachers of religion are so thoroughly aware that we daily hear them deploring it as a lamentable fact; and well they may, for it presages "a good time coming" when Othello's occupation will be gone, and the people set free. Second, M. Comte's Law of the development of the human mind is a proof peremptory and will not down. By it the human mind in its development passes successively through three distinct stages—the Theological, i. e., the religious or fictitious, the Metaphysical, i. e., the discussional or transitional, and the Positive or Scientific. The proofs of this law, drawn as they are from all sources, are so copious, so almost intuitive, and so positive, that they defy contradiction. Every intelligent individual will be able to trace them in the acquisition of every scientific fact treasured up in his mind, and will yield his assent accordingly. Even the great scientist, Herbert Spencer, while strongly dissenting from it—[Classification of the sciences, p. 35], unconsciously adopts it. "Of the three phases," says he, "through which human opinion passes—the unanimity of the ignorant, the disagreement of the inquiring, and the unanimity of the wise—it is manifest that the second is the parent of the third"—[On Education, page 100.] And now, while claiming to have adduced positive and sufficient proof, and to have made out a clear case, I may observe that, if parentage depend on their order of sequence, the first must be father to the second, and grandfather to the third, thus proving what was long ago observed, that the offspring frequently more resembles the grandparent than the parent—clear in this case, for we have "unanimity" in both extremes.

In my way of thinking, then, FREE RELIGION, though a thing to be abhorred, and to be gotten rid of as soon as possible, is the best of all religions, because "standing squarely outside of Christianity," or fettered religion. Its nature is such that it may be soonest rooted out by the grubbing-hoe of reason; in which process no authority, whether derived from the "Bible, the Church, or the Christ," or any other source, would be spurned by me—the end attained, the means, if honest, would be matter of indifference. I believe in, and therefore will trust, "no revelation but that of universal human faculties." The Bible, as all now know, is of human origin, and contains the opinions then (at the time when written) entertained of physical phenomena as seen through the medium of a dark and mystical theology. Interpreted in the light in which it was understood when written, the Bible, in my opinion, will afford the most potent of weapons for the overthrow of all religion. "The more knowledge advances," says Baden Powell, [Essays and Reviews, p. 145], "the more it has been, and will be, acknowledged that Christianity, as a real religion, must be viewed apart from connection with physical things"—i. e., must be viewed as not of this world—as mere moonshine!

No nation has ever been without its priests. No class of men has ever had it in their power to do so much good as priests. No class of men has ever been so averse to doing good as priests. No class of men ever did so much harm as priests. These ugly truths stand proven on almost every page of history and are no where denied or contradicted, but are even confessed and gloried in.

"Of all the evils which escaped Pandora's box," says the learned and Christian author of "CELTIC DRUIDS," at the close of his splendid work, "the institution of priesthoods was the worst. Priests have been the curse of the world. And if we admit the merits of many of those of our own time to be as pre-eminent above those of all others as the esprit du corps of the most self-contented individual of the order may incite him to consider them, great as I am willing to allow the merits of many individuals to be, I will not allow that they form exceptions strong enough to destroy the general nature of the rule. Look at China, the festival of Juggernaut, the Crusades, the massacres of St. Bartholomew, of the Mexicans, and of the Peruvians; the fires of the Inquisition, of Mary, of Cranmer, Calvin, and of the Druids; look at Ireland, look at Spain; in short look everywhere, and you will see the priests reeking with gore. They have converted, and are converting populous and happy nations into deserts, and have made our beautiful world into a slaughter-house drenched with blood and tears."—[Celtic Druids, 4 to p. 299.]

If you feel like giving the above a place in "THE INDEX," you are at liberty to do so. In the mean while please send me a specimen or two of the paper, which, if I like, I will subscribe and pay for.

Respectfully, M. WOOLLEY.

[Mr. Woolley is unnecessarily troubled by our Prospectus. It defines its own terms. It explains itself to every one who would listen to an explanation. Our friend is at liberty to call religion ignorance, if he pleases; and he is at equal liberty to call a cow a cod-fish. This is a free country. But if he is unable to see anything in religion except the ignorance which too often accompanies it, and obscures its beauty, he must pardon us for thinking him switched off on the side-track of a prejudice. Science always discriminates and analyzes. It is ignorance which calls the ore all quartz, and with it flings away the gold.—ED.]

THE PRIMAL GOSPEL; OR, THE TRUTHS OF THE SOUL.

BY G. B. S.

We seem in a great tidal wave of that "agitation of thought," which has well been called "the beginning of wisdom." Paul said, "first the natural (or material), and then the spiritual," and changes in the one foreshadow coming changes in the other.

The steamship, the railroad, the telegraph, and a myriad of mechanical devices are grand results of effort and thought in that realm within fifty years, and the power-press comes like a giant with a hundred iron arms to answer man's demand for a swifter spread of his words. Life is quickened and thought has broad and free range; old land-marks are swept away; old political systems, ancient creeds in religion, and sacred and infallible books, no longer limit or satisfy, but the onward tide of thought gathers up their truths and flings aside their errors.

Verily it is true, even in the deeper and higher realms of man's religious life, that "old things are passing away, and all things are becoming new."

Mourning over this as many do, it is irresistible and inevitable, and it is better to learn what good it may herald, than to distrust by that mourning the Great Power ever guiding all to an upward tendency. The religious world is full of these signs of the new time. Among the Hindoos springs up a pure Theism, with the most cultured of that Oriental race for its advocates. Ecumenical Councils will fail to give its old power to the Catholic church; among Protestants, creeds are doubted, books are not held as infallible, the old sway of authority is growing weak, and thoughtful men and women are "proving all things" in a way more radical than of old, and "holding fast that which is good," according to the verdict of their own souls. Millions in our own country, and other millions in Europe do not and cannot accept a narrow creed or an infallible book as master. Those of thoughtful and reverent spirit are among them; their growing weight of mental and spiritual power is great, and their aim is for a wiser and truer life.

The spirit of this great revolution is not blindly destructive, not negative or mere skeptical criticism only, but a reaching toward something better, the building of a fairer home than theology gives.

Not by any organized concert, but by a common intuition, the result of spiritual growth and fit conditions, comes this constructive tendency and demands.

Again we say,—"Old things are passing away"—creeds, hierarchies, sacred books, all outward authorities are waning. What shall take their place?

The interior, the undying, the permanent, shall increase, as the exterior, the perishable and the transient decrease. The Truths of the Soul are The Primal Gospel, older than books and creeds, and chiefly to live and rule when these outward things of to-day may have perished. Justice, Freedom, Fraternity, Immortality and other universal ideas are in and of the soul, parts of its birthright and structure, for the spirit of man is made of the same substance with the Infinite Spirit.

Books may partly reveal and state these truths, outward facts may confirm them, gifted men and noble lives may help to illustrate and interpret them; but older than Genesis, later than Revelations, they grow through the ages.

The custom, or fashion, or etiquette of the day may pass away, but these never, for they are a part of the immortal spirit in man, and unfold with its unfolding. Jesus appealed to these when he said, "Why judge ye not even of yourselves what is right?" The best words of the Bible help us, because they partly reveal truths in the soul of some great Hebrew, and the waiting soul to-day finds its kinship there, but must be his own judge of that kinship.

The facts of "Spiritualism" may tell of the life beyond, and be beauty, strength, consolation and greatness to the rational believer, yet they but appeal to that primal truth of immortality within us, waking it to new life and power.

Clearly enough with man's spiritual growth, the interior life must more and more assert itself, and as reverence for the truth within grows, the sway of authority without must decrease.

Thus shall come fidelity to our own convictions, freedom of utterance, loyalty to the divine and immortal truth within us, which shall grow in power and beauty as superstitions decay and creeds and books are used as helps, but never accepted as masters. Thus our order of exercises, our form and ceremony, our methods of statement and speech shall keep what is good of the Past, add what is good of the Present, and be fitted to our day, and our religion shall be universal in spirit, yet American in form—"the discovery and application of truth" to our daily life, better far than all poor efforts to put the new wine into bottles of Jewish or Genevan model.

CHRISTIAN MORALITY.

[FROM MILL'S ESSAY ON LIBERTY.]

It may be objected, "But some received principles, especially on the highest and most vital subjects, are more than half-truths. The Christian morality, for instance, is the whole truth on that subject, and if any one teaches a morality which varies from it, he is wholly in error." As this is of all cases the most important in practice, none can be fitter to test the general maxim. But before pronouncing what Christian morality is or is not, it would be desirable to decide what is meant by Christian morality. If it means the morality of the New Testament, I wonder that any one who derives his knowledge of this from the book itself, can suppose that it was announced, or intended, as a complete doctrine of morals. The gospel always refers to a pre-existing morality, and confines its precepts to the particulars in which that morality was to be corrected, or superseded by a wider and higher; expressing itself, moreover, in terms most general, often impossible to be interpreted literally, and possessing rather the impressiveness of poetry or eloquence than the precision of legislation. To extract from it a body of ethical doctrine, has never been possible without eking it out from the Old Testament, that is, from a system elaborate indeed, but in many respects barbarous, and intended only for a barbarous people. St. Paul, a declared enemy of this Judaical mode of interpreting the doctrine and filling up the scheme of his Master, equally assumes a pre-existing morality, namely, that of the Greeks and Romans; and his advice to Christians is in a great measure a system of accommodation to that; even to the extent of giving an apparent sanction to slavery. What is called Christian, but should rather be termed theological, morality, was not the work of Christ or the Apostles, but is of much later origin, having been gradually built up by the Catholic Church of the first five centuries, and though not implicitly adopted by moderns and Protestants, has been much less modified by them than might have been expected. For the most part, indeed, they have contented themselves with cutting off the additions which had been made to it in the Middle Ages, each sect supplying the place by fresh additions, adapted to its own character and tendencies. That mankind owe a great debt to this morality, and to its early teachers, I should be the last person to deny; but I do not scruple to say of it, that it is, in many important points, incomplete and one-sided, and that unless ideas and feelings, not sanctioned by it, had contributed to the formation of European life and character, human affairs would have been in a worse condition than they now are. Christian morality (so called) has all the characters of a reaction; it is, in great part, a protest against Paganism. Its ideal is negative rather than positive; passive rather than active; Innocence rather than Nobleness; Abstinence from Evil, rather than energetic Pursuit of Good; in its precepts (as has been well said) "thou shalt not" predominates unduly over "thou shalt." In its horror of sensuality, it made an idol of asceticism, which has been gradually compromised away into one of legality. It holds out the hope of heaven and the threat of hell, as the appointed and appropriate motives to a virtuous life: in this falling far below the best of the ancients, and doing what lies in it to give to human morality an essentially selfish character, by disconnecting each man's feelings of duty from the interests of his fellow-creatures, except so far as a self-interested inducement is offered to him for consulting them. It is essentially a doctrine of passive obedience; it inculcates submission to all authorities found established; who indeed are not to be actively obeyed when they command what religion forbids, but who are not to be resisted, far less rebelled against, for any amount of wrong to ourselves. And while, in the morality of the best Pagan nations, duty to the State holds even a disproportionate place, infringing on the just liberty of the individual; in purely Christian ethics, that grand department of duty is scarcely noticed or acknowledged. It is in the Koran, not the New Testament, that we read the maxim—"A ruler who appoints any man to an office, when there is in his dominions another man better qualified for it, sins against God and against the State." What little recognition the idea of obligation to the public obtains in modern morality, is derived from Greek and Roman sources, not from Christian; as, even in the morality of private life, whatever exists of magnanimity, high-mindedness, personal dignity, even the sense of honor, is derived from the purely human, not the religious part of our education, and never could have grown out of a standard of ethics in which the only worth, professedly recognized, is that of adherence.

I am as far as any one from pretending that these defects are necessarily inherent in the Christian ethics, in every manner in which it can be conceived, or that the many requisites of a complete moral doctrine which it does not contain, do not admit of being reconciled with it. Far less would I insinuate this of the doctrines and precepts of Christ himself. I believe that the sayings of Christ are all that I can see any evidence of their having been intended to be; that they are irreconcilable with nothing which a comprehensive morality requires; that everything which is excellent in ethics may be brought within them, with no greater violence to their language than has been done to it by all who have attempted to deduce from them any practical system of conduct whatever. But it is quite consistent with this, to believe that they contain, and were meant to contain, only a part of the truth; that many essential elements of the highest morality are among the things which are not provided for, nor intended to be provided for, in the recorded deliverances of the Founder of Christianity, and which have been entirely thrown aside in the system of ethics erected on the basis of those deliverances by the Christian Church. And this being so, I think it a great error to persist in attempting to find in the Christian doctrine that complete rule for our guidance, which its author intended it to sanction and enforce, but only partially to provide. I believe, too, that this narrow theory is becoming a grave, practical evil, detracting greatly from the value of the moral training and instruction, which so many well-meaning persons are now at length exerting themselves to promote. I much fear that by attempting to form the mind and feelings on an exclusively religious type, and discarding those secular standards (as for want of a better name they may be called) which heretofore co-existed with and supplemented the Christian ethics, receiving some of its spirit, and infusing into it some of theirs, their will result, and is even now resulting, a low, abject, servile type of character, which, submit itself as it may to what it deems the Supreme Will, is incapable of rising to or sympathizing in the conception of Supreme Goodness. I believe that other ethics than any which can be evolved from exclusively Christian sources, must exist side by side with Christian ethics, to produce the moral regeneration of mankind; and that the Christian system is no exception to the rule, that in an imperfect state of the human mind, the interests of truth require a diversity of opinions. It is not necessary that in ceasing to ignore the moral truths not contained in Christianity, men should ignore any of those which it does contain. Such prejudice, or oversight, when it occurs, is altogether an evil; but it is one from which we cannot hope to be always exempt, and must be regarded as the price paid for an inestimable good. The exclusive pretension made by a part of the truth to be the whole, must and ought to be protested against, and if a reactionary impulse should make the protesters unjust in their turn, the one-sidedness, like the other, may be lamented, but must be tolerated. If Christians would teach infidels to be just to Christianity, they should themselves be just to infidelity. It can do truth no service to blink the fact, known to all who have the most ordinary acquaintance with literary history, that a large portion of the noblest and most valuable moral teaching has been the work, not only of men who did not know, but of men who knew and rejected, the Christian faith.

Victor Hugo and Louis Blanc have written letters respecting the death of George Peabody. Victor Hugo sent this tribute to the deceased in care of Colonel Berton, Chairman of the American Committee in London: "George Peabody was a happy man who suffered by all suffering; a rich man who felt the cold, the hunger and the thirst of the poor. Having a place near unto Rothschild, he found means to change it into a place near to Vincent de Paul. Like Jesus Christ, he had a wound in his side; that wound was the misery of others; it was not blood that flowed from it, but gold, gold from a heart. A single comparison I cannot avoid making: This day ten years ago, on December 2, 1859, I, a solitary supplicant, addressed a prayer to the illustrious American nation in behalf of the condemned of Harper's Ferry; now 'tis a glorification I send to it. Since 1859, great events have occurred; slavery has been stricken down; let us hope that misery, a twin slavery, will be abolished, too, some day, all the world over; and until this second progress completes the first, let us venerate its two apostles, coupling in one thought of gratitude and respect, John Brown, the friend of the slave, to George Peabody, the friend of the poor.—Liberal Christian."

Soon after the arrival of Cardinal Bonnechose, his Eminence went to pay his homage to the Pope, who inquired, "What do they say of our Council in France?" "They hope that its work will be for good?" "Yes, but tell us some details." "It is hoped that its work will be one of conciliation." "But more details!" "What does your Holiness mean by details?" "What do they say of our infallibility?" "Since, Holy Father, you have inquired so precisely," said his Eminence, "it is hoped that it will not be declared a dogma." The Pope, in a state of excitement, said, "Your Eminence has always been in opposition. I remember that on a former occasion you were opposed to raising the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception to a dogma, but, thank God, we willed that it should be so, and it was so; and we will that the Infallibility of the Pope shall be made a dogma, and it shall become one through the influence of the Council of 1869." His Eminence attempted to reply, but was prevented, and retired in a state of great agitation. They say that nothing is true in Rome, but this is on good authority.—Liberal Christian.

Department

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

Among the responses which have been received to the circular recently issued by the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association is a letter from Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N. Y., which shows such a correct and warm appreciation of the principles and objects of the Association, that, though not written for publication, we are very glad to be able to present the main portion of it to the readers of THE INDEX. We desire to print it also for the practical suggestion it makes with regard to holding conventions in various parts of the country. We extract as follows:

"I am in receipt this day of a circular in the name of the Free Religious Association; which I suppose is from you. I thank you. The objects so far as set forth in any publications I have seen are near and dear to me; and I wish to bid you and your associates God-speed! There seems to be nothing at present in the way of organization that answers to the requirements, religiously, of the present hour as does yours. This word needs to be carried to all ears; and it is well worth it. Depend upon it, it will be found full of inspiration and life for many souls when once brought before them. My own circle of action is limited, quite so; is what would seem to many a very small one. But such as it is, wherever I go, I find Simeons waiting for the child. There are multitudes abroad panting for the truths of life, tired of the old stuff, the humdrum and the juggle they have heard. There never was such a time of preparation and ripening for the final reformation as now.

Let me suggest. Why not hold meetings in various portions of our country? There should be one here, a good full convention; another at Rochester, at Cleveland, Chicago, St. Louis; still better, if also at Detroit, Cincinnati, etc. Then in the Eastern cities I think there is work that well might be done. The friends of Free Religion need something more of the apostolic spirit, as I think; more desire and eagerness to go out and abroad, proclaiming everywhere their glad word of life. Perhaps your answer to my question in reference to meetings is that there are no "sinews of war" at hand for carrying on this campaign. I suppose this is so; yet I think that, could an earnest appeal be made to all right-minded, genuinely liberal men and women in the land, something of a sum might be raised towards carrying on such an undertaking. My impression is that if yourself, Mr. Frothingham or Samuel Johnson, or some other good man, could visit the leading points of our country in behalf of the truths of Free Religion, much good would come of it. Should there not be at least some comparing of notes and looking over the ground in this regard?"

The question suggested in the latter part of this extract, of holding meetings in behalf of the objects of the Free Religious Association in different parts of the country, has more than once been a subject of consideration by the Executive Committee of the Association. One of the obstacles at present in the way of any attempt by the Committee to inaugurate such a series of conventions as is here indicated, the writer correctly conjectures,—the want of funds. Another obstacle, quite as formidable, is the difficulty of finding persons who are both fitted for this kind of service and able to undertake it. Those who could judiciously take the conduct of such a series of conventions are, in every instance perhaps, hard at work at their special posts, from which it is not easy for them to get away for any considerable length of time. Still, it is believed that both of these difficulties may before long be overcome. Local help in many places can be relied on both for meeting the expenses and sustaining the discussions of a convention. If in any city or town the local expenses of a convention could be met by its friends in the vicinity, and if there are two or three earnest persons among the residents who would manage the external arrangements as well as take an active part in the proceedings of the meeting, it might not be impossible for the Association to do the rest. Are there not places where these conditions exist? In any event, the matter is worthy of earnest consideration, and the Secretary invites correspondence upon it. If such a series of meetings could be held, there can be no doubt they would give an immense impetus to the cause of a rational and unsectarian religion. Perhaps one convention on a large scale, in some one of the Western cities (Cincinnati seems to us now the most favorable point during the present year), would be the most judicious beginning of the experiment.

In connection with what is said above on holding meetings in different parts of the country in behalf of the objects of the Free Religious Association, we desire to say here that the yearly meetings of the "Progressive Friends," and of the "Friends of Human Progress," held respectively at Longwood, Pa., and at Waterloo, N. Y., are arriving substantially at the same objects. They at least represent some of the phases of those free religious tendencies of the age which the Free Religious Association was designed to embrace as a whole. At the Waterloo meeting last June, Mr. Mills, of Syracuse, read an address which has been published in the Present Age, and is an excellent delineation of the principles of the free religious movement. We make from this address the following quotation. After speaking of the various signs of religious progress in modern times, he says,— "These things we view as omens of a new day, harbingers of the dispensation that is to be. Coming latest it must be the best of all history, a reformation greater than Protestant, greater than Christian. All the past shall pale before it, the highest prophecy hitherto be found but its faintest intimation. It must be the finest bloom of all civilizations, the ripe fulfilment and fruitage of every culture and piety. It shall plant upon nothing outer, no historic name, or any book or institution, but rest in the inner and living, worshipping the ideal possibilities. It shall recognize and use gratefully the symbolic, drawing from it its full worth and inspiration, but holding all subordinate to the higher—soaring from shadow to substance, from time to the eternal. It shall sanctify existence, make every hour hallowed, every work an inspiration and a song.

What shall be the mode of this life, what specific organization and institutions it shall take on, none can foretell. This belongs to the sealed volume, to be opened by time. It must be large as liberty, spontaneous as love, natural as speech, practical as character, high as truth, and grand as excellence. The spirit taketh on such form as pleaseth it. We may well leave the details and specific adjustments to the hour, to the spontaneous inspirations and promptings of the mind."

The Progressive Friend's yearly meeting at Longwood was also held last June, and was attended by the Secretary of the Free Religious Association. Its sessions continued three days and were deeply interesting. At some of the sessions the house literally overflowed with the people who came together from all the country around. This meeting passed unanimously the following "Testimony,"—which is another good statement of the principles of Free Religion.

TESTIMONY ON RELIGION.

"With a profound sense of the wisdom, love, and power of the Infinite Parent, in whom we live and move and have our being, and with an ardent desire for the welfare of our fellow-men, we renew our declaration of hearty allegiance to His will, and of cheerful acquiescence in His laws.

Believing that 'His word is Truth, and that the Truth will make us free,' we fearlessly welcome and freely seek the Truth in all its various expressions;

In the Bible, and in all other writings of holy and inspired souls;

In Science, which is the effort of the human mind to comprehend the methods of His ever-present activities;

In Art, which is our attempt to embody the Ideal of Beauty in material forms;

In Society, which is the endeavor of mankind to embody the Divine Laws in customs and institutions;

In the individual conscience, which is the faculty which distinguishes between Right and Wrong—"the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world,"—the perpetual revelation of God in the Soul.

We renew our emphatic protest against the popular error which confounds Religion with Theology, thereby creating sectarian distinctions, and sowing discord and division between the children of the same Heavenly Father.

We declare that intellectual belief has no merit, nor demerit; that intellectual doubt and disbelief are not legitimate subjects of censure; that Religion is compatible with the widest diversity of opinion; and that 'Error is harmless while Truth is left free to combat it.'

We are able and willing to commune with Catholic or Protestant, Trinitarian or Unitarian, Jew or Gentile, Mahometan or Pagan, Christian or Infidel, Deist or Atheist, upon the common ground of reverence for Truth, devotion to Duty, aspiration for personal Holiness, and an unselfish consecration of purpose to the highest good of our fellow-men.

We say with Jesus, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself; for upon these two commandments hang all the law and the Prophets;'—we say with James, 'This is true religion and undefiled—to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world.'

'A tree is known by its fruits.' Let us therefore, try to learn and obey the will of God, knowing that the 'wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein.' 'Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind,' and respect the honest convictions of his neighbor. For the promise is 'not unto him that sayeth Lord, Lord, but unto him that doeth the will of our Father who is in Heaven.'"

THE MAN OF THE OECUMENICAL.

His Early Reign, and its Difficulties—His Restoration and Protection by France—The Habits of the Pope and Cardinals.

From the New York Ledger.

Pius the Ninth was elected as a reformer, and on ascending the Pontifical throne, he made wonderful concessions to the demands of the liberal party. The Church had often been taunted with being an enemy to the progress of the race, and the Pope honestly endeavored to do something toward removing this impression. One of his first acts was to appropriate part of his own fortune to paying the debts of the inmates of the debtor's prison at Rome. He also distributed $14,000 in marriage portions to poor young girls. Three weeks after coming to the throne, he pardoned and released the whole body of political prisoners, some thousands in number, and this he did unconditionally. He next abolished some of the most oppressive distinctions between Jews and Christians which had existed for many centuries. Poor Jews were given the same claim upon public charity as poor Christians, and the Jews were no longer obliged by law to live in one quarter of the city. He introduced severe economy into his own household, abolished useless offices, taxed the priests and religious orders, and thus made the revenue less unequal to the expenditure. He founded some schools for mechanics, took measures for establishing a system of universal education, and promoted the culture of rice in the useless marshes of his dominions. Railroads, which Gregory the Sixteenth had prohibited in the Papal States, Pius the Ninth permitted and encouraged.

"I cannot tell you," wrote a gentleman in 1846, from Rome, to a French paper not friendly to the Papacy, "I cannot tell you how agreeable life is at Rome at this time. Concord, security, confidence in the future, beam in the countenance of all the people. Crimes and disorder are heard of no more. The example of the sovereign, the fear of displeasing him, have gained all hearts, and ameliorated the lot of all classes. It is impossible for me to say how good the Pope is, how benevolent, how just, how enlightened. No people, perhaps, has ever had the happiness of being governed with so much love, wisdom and paternal solicitude. Nothing can exceed the veneration and gratitude felt for the Pontiff."

Europe heard this wonderful intelligence with much amazement and some incredulity; and the astonishment of men was unbounded when they heard that the Pope wished to concede to his people an unshackled press.

The popularity of the Pope, however, was not of long duration. He found it infinitely easier to propose than to execute reforms. The Cardinals opposed his measures. The princes and nobility of the Papal provinces opposed them. Austria, especially, was a most determined enemy of the Pope's liberal measures, and he proved unable to carry out his views against an opposition so various and formidable. Nor were all the people of the Roman States satisfied. When the Pope's reforms were hindered by the Cardinals and their adherents, the cry arose, and was thundered into the ears of the Pope by the people as he passed, "No more priests in the government!"

Tumults arose. Ministers were appointed and removed, and one odious minister, Count Rossi, was assassinated in the streets of Rome.

The disorder at length rose to such a height that the Pope abandoned Rome, and went to Naples, where he asked an asylum from the king. From his retreat near Naples, he appointed a commission to govern the Papal States in his absence, but the Roman Junta refused to obey it, and declared "the Papacy fallen in fact and in right from the temporal power," and proclaimed a pure democracy under the name of the "Roman Republic." Never would he have returned to the Vatican as a Sovereign Prince but for the intervention of Louis Napoleon, who sent an army to restore and protect him. He has been maintained in power ever since by the arms of France.

Personally the Pope is extremely popular with almost all the classes of the people. He is a man of blameless life and the best possible intentions; but he adheres to the ideas of the past, both political and theological, with a tenacity most wonderful to witness, especially to his power as temporal sovereign. He is a man of the simplest manners and habits. A distinguished priest of the Roman Church, who spent several months at Rome, a few years ago, tell us that the Pope and Cardinals associate and labor together in the friendliest and most familiar manner. It is a custom of the confectioners at Rome to send presents of candies to the Pope, which he gives with his own hands to the Cardinals having charge of the schools to be distributed among the children. The same priest assured me that no body of men in the world were more laborious and self-denying than the Cardinals, who have upon their hands the affairs of the church, numbering more than 200,000,000 of people, and to whom complicated affairs and difficult questions are commonly referred for arbitration. He also asserted that the city of Rome is so well provided with schools of all kinds that no child can grow up uneducated except by the fault of those who have charge of it.

The Pope is now 77 years of age, and he has been Pope 23 years. Travellers describe him as a vigorous old man, of most benevolent and venerable aspect.

The man in earnest has no time to remember his own vanity.

We have been told that Catholicity is gaining ground in this country, and will in a few years gather the whole nation into its fold. This is a great error. Millions of Catholics, flying from misery in the old world, have taken homes in the new, and their millions of offspring cover all the land. But this is a loss to the Church, for two-thirds of them have lost their faith. We make a glorious number of conversions among learned and intelligent Protestants; but these conversions are nothing to the thousands which are lost. We make but few converts from infidelity, and that is the direction in which the masses are tending. --Western Catholic.

Our present losses by apostasy are not relatively ten per cent. of what they were twenty-five years ago, and of the children we save to the Church a large proportion. The conversions are more numerous than is commonly supposed, and amount yearly to many thousands. We are every year becoming better supplied with priests; and are building new churches and new school-houses; we have made ample provision for the higher education, and are rapidly providing for the common-school education. Our losses have been fewer than we had reason to fear, and our religion is more firmly rooted in the nation than we had reason twenty years ago to hope. We do not expect to convert the country in one or two centuries; but ultimately it will be effected. The battle with Protestantism, with heresy, is nearly over, and now we have to carry on a war with humanitarianism. We know not how long the war will be. The Church is not ruined; never was she fresher, more vigorous, or more powerful than she is now.—N. Y. Tablet (Catholic).

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

In 1840 was 1,220.

In 1850—3,829.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of Railroad and over 800 miles of Canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 60,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of side-walks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

RELIGION.

1. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself.
2. The root of religion is universal human nature.
3. Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root.
4. Historical religions are all different, in virtue of their different historical origin and development.
5. Every historical religion has thus two distinct elements,—one universal or spiritual, and the other special or historical.
6. The universal element is the same in all historical religions; the special element is peculiar in each of them.
7. The universal and the special elements are equally essential to the existence of an historical religion.
8. The unity of all religions must be sought in their universal element.
9. The peculiar character of each religion must be sought in its special element.

RELATION OF JUDAISM TO CHRISTIANITY.

10. The idea of a coming "kingdom of heaven" arose naturally in the Hebrew mind after the decay of the Davidic monarchy, and ripened under foreign oppression into a passionate longing and expectation.
11. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be a world-wide empire on this earth, both temporal and spiritual, to be established on the ruins of the great empires of antiquity by the miraculous intervention of Jehovah.
12. The Messiah or Christ was to reign over the "kingdom of heaven" as the visible deputy of Jehovah, who was considered the true sovereign of the Hebrew nation. He was to be a Priest-King,—the supreme pontiff or high-priest of the Hebrew church, and absolute monarch of the Hebrew state.
13. The "apocalyptic literature" of the Jews exhibits the gradual formation and growth of the idea of the Messianic "kingdom of heaven."
14. All the leading features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "kingdom of heaven," the "end of the world," the "great day of judgment," the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," the "resurrection of the dead," the condemnation of the wicked and the exaltation of the righteous, the "passing away of the heavens and earth," and the appearance of a "new heaven and a new earth," were definitely formed and firmly fixed in the Hebrew mind, in the century before Jesus was born.
15. John the Baptist came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." But he declared himself merely the forerunner of the Messiah.
16. Jesus also came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and announced himself as the Messiah or Christ.
17. Jesus emphasized the spiritual aspect of the Messianic kingdom; but, although he expected his throne to be established by the miraculous intervention of God, and therefore refused to employ human means in establishing it, he nevertheless expected to discharge the political functions of his office as King and Judge, when the fulness of time should arrive.

18. As a preacher of purely spiritual truth, Jesus probably stands at the head of all the great religious teachers of the past.

19. As claimant of the Messianic crown, and founder of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, Jesus shared the spirit of an unenlightened age, and stands on the same level with Gautama or Mohammed.

20. In the belief of his disciples, the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus would not prevent the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven." His throne was conceived to be already established in the heavens; and the early church impatiently awaited its establishment on earth at the "second coming of the Christ."

21. Christianity thus appears as simply the complete development of Judaism,—the highest possible fulfilment of the Messianic dreams based on the Hebrew conception of a "chosen people."

CHRISTIANITY.

22. Christianity is the historical religion taught in the Christian Scriptures, and illustrated in the history of the Christian church.

23. It is a religion in virtue of its universal element; it is the Christian religion in virtue of its special element.

24. The Christian Scriptures teach, from beginning to end, that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God,"—that is, the Hebrew Messiah. This, the Christian Confession, was declared both by Jesus and the apostles to be necessary to salvation or admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

25. The Christian church, from its origin to the present day, has everywhere planted itself on faith in the Christian Confession, as its divinely appointed foundation,—the eternal "rock" against which the "gates of hell shall never prevail."

26. The Christian Confession gradually created on the one hand the theology, and on the other hand the hierarchy, of the Roman Catholic Church. The process was not, as is claimed, a corruption, but a natural and logical development.

27. The Church of Rome embodies Christianity in its most highly developed and perfect form, as a religion of authority based on the Christian Confession.

28. Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of Christianity, whether regarded theologically or ecclesiastically, under the influence of the free spirit of protest against authority.

29. "Liberal Christianity,"—that is, democratic autocracy in religion,—is the highest development of the free spirit of protest against authority which is possible within the Christian church. It is, at the same time, the lowest possible development of faith in the Christ,—a return to the Christian Confession in its crudest and least developed form.

30. Christianity is the religion of Christians, and all Christians are believers in the Christ.

31. The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian Confession is the boundary line of Christianity.

FREE RELIGION.

32. The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion,—the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church.

33. The history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion at the expense of the Christian Religion. As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases.

34. The completion of the religious protest against authority must be the extinction of faith in the Christian Confession.

35. Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law.

36. The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.

37. The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man,—the race serving the individual, the individual serving the race.

38. The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous and universal education of man.

39. The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice of the private soul.

40. The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One.

41. Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion,—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend.

RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO FREE RELIGION

42. Christianity is identical with Free Religion so far as its universal element is concerned,—antagonistic to it so far as its special element is concerned.

43. The corner-stone of Christianity is faith in the Christ. The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in Human Nature.

44. The great institution of Christianity is the Christian Church, the will of the Christ being its supreme law. The great institution of Free Religion is the coming Republic of the World, the universal conscience and reason of mankind being its supreme organic law or constitution.

45. The fellowship of Christianity is limited by the Christian Confession; its brotherhood includes all subjects of the Christ and excludes all others. The fellowship of Free Religion is universal and free; it proclaims the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

46. The practical work of Christianity is to Christianize the world,—to convert all souls to the Christ, and ensure their salvation from the wrath of God. The practical work of Free Religion is to humanize the world,—to make the individual nobler here and now, and to convert the human race into a vast Co-operative Union devoted to universal ends.

47. The spiritual ideal of Christianity is the suppression of self and perfect imitation of Jesus the Christ. The spiritual ideal of Free Religion is the free development of self, and the harmonious education of all its powers to the highest possible degree.

48. The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of Free Religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face; Free Religion is erect on its feet.

49. The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake,—The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

50. Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.

CHRISTIANITY AND FREE RELIGION CONTRASTED AS TO CORNER-STONES.

[Read to the (then) Unitarian Society of Toledo, Sunday morning, July 25, 1869.]

"The Reformation itself, though the product of a deep consciousness of spiritual need, an emancipation of souls as well as mind, is nevertheless a special instance of the same dissolution of mediæval life, and must, therefore, be regarded as belonging to the same general movement of free thought, though not to that sceptical form of it which comes within the field of our investigation. For Protestantism, though it be scepticism in respect to the authority of the traditional teaching of the church, yet reposes implicitly on an outward authority revealed in the sacred books of holy Scripture, and restricts the exercise of freedom within the limits prescribed by this authority, whereas scepticism proper is an insurrection against the outward authority or truth of the inspired books, and reposes on the unrevealed, either on consciousness or on science."

A. S. Farrar, Bampton Lectures for 1862, "A Critical History of Free Thought," p. 9.

In my discourses of the last two Sundays, I have endeavored to render clear and positive answers to the questions, "What is Christianity?" and "What is Free Religion?" The mutual relations, however, which exist between the great fading faith of the Past, and the greater dawning faith of the Future, can only be made known by a close and conscientious comparison of their leading characteristics. To this comparison, therefore, I invite your attention in the present discourse and the discourse next succeeding.

1. The first great point of contrast which presents itself to a thoughtful mind concerns the basis or corner-stones of the two religions,—the fundamental ideas which support them as systems of faith and life. Described in the fewest possible words, these two corner-stones are FAITH IN THE CHRIST and FAITH IN MAN. All the faith of Christianity, as a distinct historical religion, centres in the person of Jesus, the Messianic King and universal Savior of the World. All the faith of Free Religion centres in Human Nature, as containing within itself the law of its own highest development and the fountain-head of its own highest life. On the one hand, the individual Jesus as the Savior of the race,—on the other hand, the race as its own Savior. I propose to dwell this morning on this first point of the contrast.

The history of Christianity is simply the development of the Messianic claim made by Jesus, under the natural conditions and natural influences of the ancient world. The great dream of a coming "kingdom of heaven" had been born in the heart of the Hebrew people; and Jesus claimed that, in a higher than the popular sense, this dream was fulfilled in his own divine mission. It is somewhat doubtful whether he himself so far enlarged the scope of his mission, as to conceive that it embraced the salvation of all mankind; but there can be no doubt, that, except for Paul, the Christians would have remained a narrow Jewish sect, and Christianity would never have achieved the conquest of the Roman Empire. Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, first preached the universal sovereignty of his Master, and made possible the subsequent triumph of his religion. Unless, however, the Greek philosophy had lent its aid to refine and subtilize the crude Jewish conception of the "kingdom of heaven," and, by introducing the doctrine of the Logos or Word of God, had developed the orthodox theology,—unless, furthermore, the organizing genius of Rome had lent its aid to unite the scattered churches of the apostles into a single magnificent and powerful fraternity, and thus gradually built up the vast Roman Church of the middle ages,—unless, I say, these foreign influences had come in to ripen the seed planted by Jesus in twelve honest, but narrow and ignorant, souls, Christianity would not be to-day the professed religion of the civilized world. Thus Palestine furnished the central idea of Christianity, Greece developed it into a coherent, philosophical theology, and Rome organized it into a vast and powerful church. The claim of the Galilean peasant to be the Messiah or Christ, the mustard-seed sown in faith, thus grew up into a mighty tree, in whose branches all the birds of the air found shelter for centuries. Read the New Testament in the light of these facts, and the "gospel of good news" is seen to rest on this pivotal proclamation of the early church,—"Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God." This is the Christian confession, the creed of all Christians, the corner-stone of Christianity; and when this is once clearly seen, it becomes clear as day. Why, even Dr. Hedge, the ablest and most scholarly man of the Unitarian denomination,—the author of that oft-quoted saying—"Reason or Rome—there is no middle ground,"—is yet forced to admit that Reason, to be Christian, must yield her right to debate the truth of the Christian confession.

A very brief reflection, I think, will convince any one that Dr. Hedge is correct. Some self-called "Liberal Christians" have become so deeply imbued with the spirit and ideas of Free Religion, although without perceiving their logical drift, that they are much more inclined to dispute Dr. Hedge's statement, than Evangelical or Catholic Christians. "Christianity," they say, "is simply love to God and man; and implies no confession of the peculiar divine authority of Jesus." Thus in a certain loose way they have dropped the special element of Christianity, and confine the name Christianity to its universal element, i. e. natural religion. I think the real absurdity of this can be made very plain by supposing a parallel case. Mohammed, as we all well know, claimed to be the greatest of the prophets sent by God on a peculiar divine mission; and the creed, therefore, in which all Mohammedans unite, is this,—"There is but one God, and Mohammed is his prophet." This is the Mohammedan confession of faith. Now suppose that a little sect of radicals should spring up in Arabia, calling themselves "Liberal Mohammedans," who should unqualifiedly reject the peculiar divine authority of Moammed, and proclaim that true Mohammedanism is simply love to God and man. If they should do this, they would occupy precisely the same position occupied by those Liberal Christians who unqualifiedly reject the authority of the Christ. Now if Liberal Christianity, on the one hand, and Liberal Mohammedanism, on the other, means simply love to God and man, then whoever really loves God and man, is at the same time, a Liberal Christian and a Liberal Mohammedan! In other words, judging by the test of simple love to God and man, Liberal Christians would properly be called Liberal Mohammedans! Does not this show very plainly, that, while love to God and man is perhaps enough to make us religious, something more is necessary to make us Christians? So, at least, it appears to me; and I regard radicals as greatly deceiving themselves, and unintentionally deceiving the world, when they refuse to admit the logical result of their ideas, and cling to the Christian name. Over and above love to God and man, which perhaps may in a certain sense be held to constitute religion, something additional is required to constitute Christianity, namely, faith in the Christian confession that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God." Whoever can honestly make this confession in the New Testament sense of the words, may properly call himself a Christian; although, if consistent, he cannot stop short of the Romish church. But whoever is unable to make this confession,—unable to admit that Jesus was in truth the Christ or Messiah, as those words are used in the gospels,—is not really a Christian, even if he claims to be so; unless, indeed, we are prepared to call him a Mohammedan, who denies that Mohammed was, in any peculiar sense, a prophet sent from God. The same principle must govern both cases; and, by placing the matter in this light, I think it becomes very clear that none is a Mohammedan, but he who believes in Mohammed,—none a Christian, but he who believes in the Christ.

The result of our reasoning, then, is this,—Christianity, as a whole, must stand or fall with the Christian confession. If it be true that Jesus is the Messiah in the gospel meaning of the word, then Christianity is true, and must stand forever. But if this fundamental Christian confession be erroneous, then Christianity loses its corner-stone as an historical religion, and must pass away, like the religions of ancient Greece and Rome, to make room for a better faith. It becomes a duty, therefore, which I cannot evade, to state distinctly why I believe the Christian confession to be erroneous, and how it conflicts with the nobler faith of Free Religion.

A. The whole conception of a "kingdom of heaven," to establish which was the essential mission of the Christ, rested on the conception of the Jews that they were a "chosen people," with whom God had made a peculiar covenant or bargain. In this chosen people, the "house of David" was a chosen family; and in this chosen family, the Messiah was a chosen prince. Nor, in the Hebrew idea and the New Testament teaching, was this "choice" of God, singling out in this manner a chosen nation, a chosen family, and a chosen prince, in any respect analogous to those natural differences of endowment or merit which everywhere meet us in history and human life; it was essentially arbitrary, the unreasoning preference of a partial God. The mode of government of the world, implied in the Hebrews' conception of their own destiny and expected to be perfectly realized in the "kingdom of heaven," is inconsistent with an enlightened idea of God. The belief that a single nation was selected to be the sole recipient of Divine favor, and to be entrusted with supreme dominion over the whole earth, was a dream of national ambition and spiritual pride, not a revelation from above. Yet this belief underlay the expectation of that "kingdom of heaven" which the Christ was to found; and it is incompatible with every worthy view of the character of God.

B. Furthermore, the conception of a "kingdom of heaven" to be established by a terrible manifestation of Omnipotence, with the Christ coming in the clouds of heaven in the midst of angels, and pronouncing judgment on the living and the dead, is such a tissue of wild vagaries as to need no refutation. For modern thought, the issue between miracle and law is no longer an open one. Unless the gospels must be summarily rejected, as devoid of every particle of historic truth, it is plain that Jesus expected his miraculous elevation to the throne to take place in the lifetime of his hearers. "The Son of Man," he says, in Matthew xvi, 27—28, "is to come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then will he render to every man according to his works. Truly do I say to you, There are some of those standing here who will not taste of death, till they have seen the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." The appearance of the Messiah upon the stage of history was not conceived as due in any sense to historical causes, but rather to a miraculous intervention of God in the affairs of men. This was the universal belief of the Jews, the plain teaching of Jesus in all the discourses attributed to him, and the conception of the church he founded from the earliest times down to the present day. The mission of the Messiah or Christ was, from beginning to end, a miracle; and to interpret it in any natural, non-miraculous manner, is to wrench the gospels from their obvious meaning without either conscience or reason.

Simply to state the Messianic idea, therefore, to any modern thinker, should be sufficient to dismiss it at once as a Jewish superstition, which has not become credible by being made the basis of the Christian Church. It is thoroughly unscientific. It sunders the great law of cause and effect which makes the unity of Nature and of history. Free Religion finds God in law—not in miracle. Every man, or else no man, has a "miraculous" mission; there is no exception to law in the arrival of the great soul at great historical crises. The Jewish prophecies of the Messiah were never fulfilled, for the miracle they expected never occurred. The Christ never came, and will never come; Jesus never accomplished the work of the Christ. Age after age has rolled by; the "heavens and the earth" have not "passed away," but many of his "words" have "passed away." The unspeakable good he has done to humanity is not what he expected to do; for, while he failed utterly as the Christ, his spiritual triumph has nevertheless outrun his wildest dreams. Free Religion ignores the King, but does homage to the moral greatness of the Man.

C. Again, leaving out of sight the injurious representation of the Divine character and the utter ignorance of the invariability of natural law implied in the idea of a Christ, let us look at this idea in its political aspect. The Messianic hope was essentially a political one. It was the dream of founding a great Empire on the earth, upon the ruins of the Greek and Roman powers. However little Jesus seems to have thirsted for political authority,—however scrupulously he abstained from the use of the sword, when he had but to speak the word to find himself in the midst of fierce enthusiasts for his cause,—he could not have claimed, as he did claim, to be the Christ, without perfectly comprehending that the Messianic throne must be both spiritual and temporal. The Christ was to be a Priest-King,—supreme pontiff and supreme monarch. But Jesus refrained from the use of violence, because his kingdom was to be established, not by human instrumentalities, but by Divine omnipotence. When God had once placed him on his dread tribunal in the clouds, he expected to wield the authority which he forebore to assume until that day should arrive. In the parables of the Tares, for instance, and that of the Sheep and the Goats, he appears enacting the part of an actual monarch; and in one passage, too often slighted by radical thinkers, he makes this remarkable promise to his disciples, showing that he intended to appoint them to high offices in his kingdom:—"Truly do I say to you, that in the renovation, when the Son of Man sitteth on the throne of his glory, ye who have followed me shall also yourselves sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one who hath left brothers, or sisters, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, or houses, for the sake of my name, will receive many fold more, and will inherit everlasting life." (Matt. xix, 28.) Even in the Beatitudes, he says,—"Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth." It was a kingdom, in the strict sense of the word, a kingdom both temporal and spiritual, which he conceived to be reserved for him by God; and nothing but the most unwarrantable twisting of his language, at least as attributed to him in the gospels, will permit any other interpretation.

It is the saying of John xviii, 36, be genuine—"My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight,"—it seemingly contradicts what I here maintain. But only seemingly. The word translated in this passage, world, is in Greek, kosmos; and Prof. Robison, in his "Lexicon of the New Testament," assigns to it in this very passage the meaning of "the present world, the present order of things, as opposed to the kingdom of Christ." It thus signifies, not the physical world as opposed to a spiritual world, but one period of the world's history as opposed to another period of it. The Messianic idea included the renovation of the earth as part of the expected "restoration of all things;" and the "new earth" was to be the scene of the Messiah's rule. Even admitting the genuineness of the passage, it is no disclaimer of temporal authority on the part of Jesus, but only an avowal that his reign would not be inaugurated until after the grand crisis of the last Judgment. After that crisis, he expected to reign on the earth; and this was the universal expectation of the early church, as it is still of those who believe the gospel as first preached.

It appears sufficiently evident, therefore, that Christianity, considered as the religion taught in the New Testament, is a system of faith and life based on the idea of the "divine right of kings,"—of monarchy as the form of government established by God for man. There can be no doubt that the New Testament uniformly represents the one great and absorbing object of Jesus to be the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven," in which he himself, by the grace of God, was to be King and Judge and Lord of all. "All things," he says, (Matt. xii, 27,) "were delivered to me by my Father; and no one knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom it is the will of the Son to reveal him." Here we find expressed both the temporal and the spiritual side of his mission. He was to be, not merely the King, but the Revealer of God to the private soul,—the visible Vicergerent of God and the Life, Truth, and Way to God; and the fundamental idea of his government was that of MONARCHY,—Authority pure and simple.

Now if Christianity had been based on any idea of government more advanced than that of Monarchy, its triumph would indeed have been almost marvellous enough to justify a belief in its miraculous origin; for at that time, and in that people, no idea more advanced could have found a foothold in the minds of men. Based as it was on the monarchical principle, Christianity did but reflect the universal sentiment of the Jewish nation; and thus demonstrates its own human origin. The political and religious ideas of any people must, sooner or later, come into harmony; and because Monarchy had become the dominant political idea of the ancient world (the republics of Greece and Rome having been in truth aristocracies and not democracies, and therefore having collapsed on account of their own inherent weakness), Christianity did but embody in higher form the spirit of the age, by proclaiming a Universal Religious Monarchy with its King in the heavens. Here we find one secret of its rapid growth. The race were not sufficiently educated to govern themselves in freedom; the Messianic Kingdom, philosophized by Greece and organized by Rome, became the spiritual counterpart of the vast Roman Empire, created the Romish church as its least inadequate practical embodiment on earth, and thus brought into harmony the world's highest political and religious life.

But, for modern civilization, the Christian Monarchy has outlived its day. "The Papacy," says Hobbes, "is the ghost of the old Roman Empire, sitting crowned upon its grave." The spirit of the world has changed. In America, at least, Monarchy is no longer the highest political idea. Democracy,—the "government of the people, by the people, for the people,"—has taken its place. I claim that, while Christianity is the highest spiritual development of the idea of Monarchy, Free Religion is the highest spiritual development of the idea of Democracy. Christianity introduces the "one man power" into religion; and I claim that this is as foreign to the spirit of American civilization, as is the "one man power" in politics. The verdict of the American people against the "one man power," however falsified by a corrupt Senate when sitting as a High Court of Impeachment, foreshadows its verdict in a more august case of usurpation. The world is rapidly educating itself out of the childish state of dependence on absolute authority. The Great Republic will, in the end, no more tolerate a spiritual, than it will a political monarchy; there is no room in America for Kings or Lords, whether temporal or spiritual. The effete idea of the Old World found expression in the claim of Jesus to be a spiritual "King by the grace of God;" but the New World not only repudiates "kings by divine right," but will not even endure "kings by popular election." It has adopted a new principle of government,—the divine right of the people to govern themselves, guaranteed in the capacity of the human soul, when developed, to take care of itself. When America comes at last to perceive the wide scope of this great idea, which lies at the basis of all her institutions, she will not shrink from applying it to religion. Free Religion, reduced to its lowest term, is simply the soul's "Declaration of Independence" in all spiritual matters. It is simply the logical result of the ideas which, less than a hundred years ago, humbled the British Empire, and, less than five years ago, crushed into atoms the Southern Confederacy. It implies no lack of veneration for Christianity, no lack of gratitude for the immense services it has rendered, and is still rendering, to the human race, to say, frankly and emphatically, that for all the advanced minds of to-day, it has done its work, and must give place to Free Religion. The true radical is full of grateful reverence for all that Christianity has accomplished in elevating man to higher levels; but none the less must be full of calm and resolute purpose to climb upward and onward while his being endures. The world is richer to-day than ever before, in aspiration and inspiration; and the truth of God, pointing ever up the heights, forbids the faithful soul to faint or falter, though the upward path is lost in cloud.

D. One more aspect of the contrast between Christianity and Free Religion, with respect to their corner-stones, demands our brief attention. Christianity, by the emphasis it lays on Jesus as the Christ or Savior of the World, has always tended to weaken the consciousness of God in the human soul,—to set up an idol of human shape in the Holy of Holies. This tendency is seen in the Romish Church most powerfully in operation. Jesus eclipsed God, until, by the process of deification, he practically took the place of God; but he also, in turn, having become thus invested with too imposing a majesty, was himself eclipsed by the Virgin Mary. Once admit the need of a Mediator, and a hierarchy of Mediators tends naturally to spring up. In the Protestant Church, Henry Ward Beecher betrays this tendency in the well-known saying—"The Father is to me a dim and shadowy effluence; Christ is the God I worship." Even among the conservative Unitarians, who stand on the extreme verge of Christianity, an observant eye may detect some faint manifestations of the same tendency. It is plain however, that pure religion can have nothing to do with idols of any kind. It cannot wait on any go-between, to get audience of the infinite; for it is itself the presence of the Infinite Spirit, making itself felt in the soul of man. Christianity is an attempt to filter Religion through a human personality; but it gets mostly spilled in the process. The religion which every soul needs, if it did but know its need, is that which forgets all mediators because it is immediate,—that which depends no more on Jesus than on Judas,—that which is inhaled at every breath, and fills the lungs with healthy, natural life. The great spiritual task of Free Religion is to prove the ability of each soul to draw its nutriment from its native soil, dispensing with mediators, and coming into primary relations with the All-Permeating Deity. The Messianic idea can never be naturalized in America; it is an exotic, breathing a less sweet perfume than the native flowers of our own meadows and woods. God is nearer to us in the wholesome, spontaneous affections of our own homes, than in the artificial love of one whose living touch never electrified our being with new vitality. Above all things we need to recognize the deep religiousness of common life,—the sanctity of all innocent emotions, all noble deeds and words, all private whispers of the God within. When we discern the guidings of the Universal Reason in all pure activity of the human intellect, the commands and reproofs of Infinite Goodness in all intuitions of unperverted conscience, the stirrings of Eternal Love in all generous and self-sacrificing affection,—then shall we realize that religion, truly free, which is indigenous in our souls, and consists in reverent obedience to the still small voice in human hearts. Life is lifted into heaven, in proportion as we repose in this embrace of the All-Encompassing Soul.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I agree with you in your estimate of the theological value of Unitarianism. Its inevitable tendency is toward disintegration, and you have only logically followed out the first principles of the system with which you began. Your present system seems to me to be at root pantheistic, and, as such, ultimately destructive of moral distinctions. I cannot but notice that in the nine "affirmations" in which you define free religion, God has no place. In every sentence, almost, in your essay on Christianity and Free Religion, I am struck with the opposition between your way of looking at things and mine. Take the point of "independence," of which you make so much. Your independence is in my vocabulary pride, the fatal barrier to the knowledge of God. Your position seems to be that of the men before Copernicus who made the sun go round the earth. The inhabitant of a dependent planet, I am content to be a dependent spirit, and I glory in that servitude which seems to you so base. The more sincerely I can worship a Being greater than myself, the nearer I approach the standard of true nobility. You may call this feminine religion, but I honestly believe that in our relation to God we need the trustfulness and dependent love that are the distinguishing traits of womanhood.

Then, too, your method of explaining the growth and past influence of Christ's religion seem to me.... lamentably insufficient. To me the dogma of the Incarnation is—as you admit that upon a certain supposition it would be to you—the simplest rationale of Christian history. If the development hypothesis be true, and our Saviour was only a great religious genius, the flower and fruit of past spiritual vegetation, why did not the race, especially when thus recruited in generative strength, bear in the course of another generation a still more glorious flower? Why this long gap of high two thousand years without a new and nobler Messiah? You put Socrates above Christ. Why has not the Socratic spirit begotten something better than Christianity? You answer, perhaps, that it has done so in finally making Free Religion possible. Very well; if Free Religion succeeds in giving me a type of character before which the world shall bow down in reverence as it has bowed down before the Christian type, I pledge myself to become a Free Religionist.

Nor am I better satisfied with your explanation of Christ's singular self-assertion, so much at variance with his own doctrine of humility. It may be a "bigot's worn-out dilemma," but I must still think either that Jesus Christ was grossly inconsistent, and untrue to his own teaching, in which case he is unworthy of our reverence, or else that he had a transcendent right to say—"Come unto Me; abide in Me." The Scriptures, history, my own heart, all become more intelligible to me when I admit the claim of Jesus Christ to my undivided allegiance. In choosing between Christianity and Free Religion, I am choosing between the worship of the God-Man and the worship of the Man-God. I infinitely prefer the first."

"The first number of THE INDEX is at hand, and has been read with great interest. You have struck the right chord exactly; and I am much mistaken if your paper does not meet with a fair degree of financial success at the outset. So far as my acquaintance goes, there are multitudes of minds in New England, and out of it, ripe for the truths of Free Religion. Your paper ought to be widely scattered,—the first number of it,—and I enclose $1.00, for which please forward me as many copies of No. 1 as you can afford, and I will act as 'colporteur' for you. And if the —is of too local a character to be of benefit to you as an exchange, we will advertise for you instead. —Allow me to express to you, though a stranger, my heartfelt thanks for the inspiration your paper gives me, and the hope that the flag you have unfurled may never be hauled down for want of pecuniary aid."

"I have just now read a review of your first number in the Liberal Christian, and from the tone of the article I think there must be something worth reading in your paper; and I herewith enclose 20 cents for a few numbers as they come out, including the first, and if it to me prove worthy, it may yet take the place of the Liberal Christian, which runs out in July, as I am tired of its conservatism since it changed hands."

"To combine the strength of preacher and editor is more than most men have strength to do. But if you give up either, let it be the pulpit. I question whether its function, with emancipated minds, is not nearly ended, and whether the editor is not the true successor to the power formerly wielded by the preacher."

"Being old (above seventy) and otherwise infirm, I am unable to make much effort for THE INDEX. In fact, this town is small and the settlement new, and the people are poor. However, I send you what I can." [The names of ten subscribers were enclosed.]

"Enclosed find $2.00—send me THE INDEX for one year. Miss Cobbe speaks the sentiment of all Free Thinkers when she says that the question of Immortal Life is the great question. We are all united in declaring the idea of a Revealed Religion to be nonsensical; but the great question—'Is there another existence?'—agitates the entire liberal world. I believe, in addition to pulling down this old superstitious fabric, we ought to make the other as inviting as is consistent with truth. Is there another existence after this life is ended? If you honestly believe it, you can do no nobler service than by proclaiming the arguments in its favor, weekly. It is a comparatively easy task to explode popular theology, but to build up a theory as a substitute, that will satisfy the soul of man, is one that will require our mightiest efforts. The universal cry, among those who have been emancipated from the creeds of their fathers, is, 'What assurance have I that I shall live again?' It is the only beautiful theory that the popular theology can boast of; and I believe many a one would rebel instantly, could he have an inward assurance that friends would meet again. As for me, it matters little, for nothing can possibly make me anything but a radical Free Thinker. If there is no other existence, it is a gloomy thought,—nothing more."

"The first number of the LITTLE INDEX has been received. Thank you. Enclosed I send you a P. O. order for it one year. Frankly, I am far from the road you travel, but I like your spirit, and shall read your journal, if not with 'Christ and God speed you,'—at least, I trust, with Christian kindness. Your frankness is refreshing; and I would that we had more of it in the Pulpit, Press, and World. Faithfully, if not fraternally, believe me yours."

"I have received the first number of THE INDEX. I am delighted with it.... You ought to get an Agent. You might as well have 10,000 subscribers as 1000. But they must be hunted up, for they are isolated. And if the first number of the INDEX is a specimen of what you are going to make the paper, it meets a felt want, and must succeed. All you want is a judicious Agent whose heart is enlisted in the cause."

"Your prospectus has the right sort of ring to it, proving that it is the genuine metal,—bold, frank, and free; and with many wishes for its success, I send you my name to be put on your subscribers' list. Earnestly yours, etc."

"If it is to be what I am told it is, probably several subscribers could be obtained here. The Liberal Christian has come to be a mere denominational journal of narrow scope, and something wider, more fearless and catholic, is required."

"Dr. — has shown me the first No. of your INDEX. The first page only have I read, and it pleases me much. Please send it to me."

A large number of females, it is stated, are entitled to vote at the municipal elections of the towns of England. At Lincoln, three hundred female voters are on the registry; at Stamford, one hundred and fifty; at East Relford, sixty, out of five hundred and fourteen voters on the list; and at Norwich, thirteen hundred out of a total of ten thousand. From these facts, it is argued that, in ten years time, the majority of the women in England will enjoy the right to vote. —Exchange.

Poetry.

THE BROOK AND THE LITTLE MAIDEN.

Thou wanton stream that sweepest by
In ever-changing mood,
Now tranquil as the unspotted sky,
And now with merry minstrelsy
Making the still groves loud!

Stay, cruel little trifier, stay!
The alders stoop their breast,
And stretch their arms across thy way,
And woo thee with a plaintive lay
Caught from the sweet South-west.

But with thy sober lovers thou
Coquettest in thy glee;
Thou fling'st on every amorous bough
A crystal kiss, and onward now
Art racing toward the sea.

Grave Ocean waits, thy bridegroom vast,
To wed thee at the brink;
Thy youthful pranks and frolics past,
On his strong, heaving breast, at last,
Thou, too, shalt swell and sink.

Thou witching sylph that, glad and gay,
Disportest by the stream!
Life seems to thee all mirth and play,
The sunshine of a summer's day,
The brightness of a dream.

On bubbles that incessant rise
Thou wagest mimic wars,
With flushing cheeks and merry cries,— Smiles showering from thy happy eyes
Like twinklings from the stars.

Thou laughest at all wooing hands,
Each soft, enticing tone,
And tender looks, and feigned commands;
Like some bright bird of eastern lands,
Thou hoverest—and art gone.

Thou teasing elf, thou sweet coquette!
With pulses like the sea,
Some giant soul lives for thee yet—
O greet like this wild rivulet
The Ocean waiting thee!

The Index.

JANUARY 22, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

All friends interested in getting new subscribers for THE INDEX are reminded that subscriptions should be secured at the beginning of the year. Back numbers will be furnished to all new subscribers for the present; but we cannot promise to keep a stock on hand permanently.

We are desired to state that the article on "Money," published today, was sent to us more than a fortnight ago.

We are indebted to the Woehentliche Express, of this city, for repeated kindly and generous notices. It is an ably-edited, liberal, and enterprising paper, which deserves the support of every German-reading citizen of Lucas county; and we are much gratified at receiving its good word. Germany has already laid the world under obligation through the labors of her great thinkers and profound scholars; but she is laying America under still greater obligation by sending to our shores her own liberty-loving sons. Such papers as the Express exert a powerful influence in fostering the love of freedom and human rights; and, wishing it increased prosperity, we do but wish well to all our fellow-citizens.

Although somewhat late in the day, we take this opportunity of thanking the Committee of the Humboldt Centennial Celebration in this city, together with their constituency, for the very handsome and valuable present with which they surprised us at Christmas, consisting of the complete works of Goethe, Schiller, and Lessing, in the original. Added to the twelve volumes of Grote's History of Greece, previously presented in the autumn, these thirteen fine volumes will stand on our shelves as a perpetual reminder of German generosity,—silent, but eloquent.

"THE DOUBLE-HEADED SNAKE OF NEW-BURY."

The poet Whittier published in the Atlantic Monthly, a few years ago, a poem with the above title, describing a snake which was superstitiously believed to haunt the quaint old town of Newbury, and to have a head at each end of its body. Whichever way it went, it was, of course, obliged to drag one of its two heads in the dust.

We are reminded of this fanciful legend by the following passage in the leading editorial article of the last number of the Liberal Christian :—

"We have pledged ourselves to two things, not merely to God and liberty, but to Christ and liberty! Either is easy alone, Christ without liberty, or liberty without Christ! We will have both or neither. We will have both together. That is our flag, that is our glory, the glory of the Father, freedom of thought, the sacred rights of reason, personal independence, absolute liberty of investigation, of question, held in perfect allegiance to God and His Christ, who is the very breath of soul-freedom! Let, then, those who use and abuse our name, speculate and vapor and caricature the truth as they will; let them involve us as they can and may in obloquy and suspicion, we will not violate the principles of religious liberty, or join that inconsistent kind of Protestantism which says, 'liberty only up to this line.'"

One might almost believe that Whittier had the Unitarian denomination in his mind, when he wrote his poem,—so apt is the parable, so keen the satire. Considering that the proprietors of the Liberal Christian have just turned adrift its recent able editor, confessedly because he gave to the paper a little too free a tone (although he was exceedingly careful never to step foot over the line of the Christian name), it is irony carried into broad burlesque to say that the Liberal Christian will not "join that inconsistent kind of Protestantism which says 'liberty only up to this line.'" You may have absolute liberty of investigation,—but be sure you come to my conclusions! You may use absolute freedom of thought,—but beware of calling into question a single word of Jesus! You may exercise the sacred rights of reason,—but your blood be on your own head, if you reason yourself out of Christianity! And thus, exalting the "Head of the Church," Unitarianism drags the head of reason in the dust.

It is impossible to have your cake, and eat it, too. It is impossible to serve two masters. It is impossible to have "Christ and liberty—both together." Free thought must be free to doubt, to test, and, if need be, to reject, the word of every thinker. We put the question directly to the Liberal Christian,—do you mean to assert that the human soul is at perfect liberty to set aside the teachings of Jesus, if they seem to it irrational or untrue? Some of his teachings seem to us both irrational and untrue, when scrutinized by the light of modern civilization. Do we not go beyond the liberty you allow? If we do not, how can you claim to have "pledged yourself to Christ?" But if we do, how can you claim to have "pledged yourself to liberty?" The liberty which sits as judge over the teachings of the Christ, is not "Christian" liberty.

The truth is, Unitarianism is a house divided against itself; and it must fall. We should respect it as we respect other forms of Christianity, if it ceased these ambiguous and contradictory utterances. Until it does cease them, it is not worthy of respect, either intellectual or moral. Nobody is deceived by them. They make the whole denomination ridiculous in the eyes of every intelligent and mirth-loving spectator,—worse than ridiculous in the eyes of every intelligent and truth-loving spectator. They cloud the mind or demoralize the conscience of every one who echoes them. To the world at large, they make Unitarianism fitly characterized by the biting sarcasm of Varnhagen von Ense:—"Herr von Humboldt was with me yesterday, and brought me the letter of the minister von Kamptz.... So inconsistent with his former principles, that I exclaimed,—'If he could only cut himself in two, he would clap one-half in jail!'" If Unitarianism says "Christ," let it stick to its text, and condemn free thought; if it says "liberty," let it stick to that text instead, and not profess faith in an infallible teacher. It is will that insists on "both together,"—reason must choose betwixt them.

We have spoken in no unfriendly spirit. We were born and nurtured in the Unitarian community, and we love the old homestead still. Many of our best and dearest friends are Unitarians; and they will never be less dear because of their Unitarianism. But Truth demands that these things should be plainly and unshrinkingly said; and we set her claims above the claims even of private friendship. No friendship ought to live, if its life must be purchased by suppression of the truth. We have spoken,—and will endure the consequences, be they what they may.

THE HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES.

The city of Boston, by pretty general consent, is given over to the tender mercies of radicalism. Only a few years ago, Theodore Parker fought almost single-handed against irrational conservatism in religion and in politics; but, like General Wolfe at Quebec, he died in the very hour of victory. To-day thousands of voices echo, uncontradicted, the truths which he thundered forth from the Music Hall platform, and which drew down upon his head the curses or maledictory prayers of every enemy of human freedom. In his lifetime he stood the recognized leader of religious reform. To-day religious reform has no recognized leader, living or dead. True to its nature as democracy in religion, it is completely emancipating itself from the vassalage of leadership. Henceforth radicalism is the message of no individual prophet, but the dignified self-assertion of universal man, arrived at his majority. Whatever bold thinker or eloquent orator, spurred on by unconfessed ambition, dreams of becoming the intellectual generalissimo of advancing humanity,—of wielding an autocratic influence over the mind of his time,—of stamping his own image and superscription on the current coin of the future,—is digging the grave of his own usefulness. Posterity will deal out to each servant of ideas the reward justly due to his character or his thought; but she holds no crown in reserve. The epoch of enslaving fames is past. Grave and self-sufficient, Humanity, however grateful for unselfish service, has only oblivion in store for him who hopes in days like these to mount up the steps of service to a throne. As physical science has been built up by countless contributions to the sum of human knowledge, so the religious philosophy of the future will be built up by the aggregated intellect of the race. Ideas, not persons, rule America. They will yet rule the world.

It is, therefore, altogether fitting that Boston should present to-day, as the true exponent of the religious tendencies of the time, a series of lecturers, instead of an individual successor to the Daniel Boone of American religion. The pioneer prepares the way for the multitude. The solo over, the chorus succeeds,—with its parts arranged to bring out the grand harmonies of freedom. A course of "Sunday afternoon meetings" was held last winter at Horticultural Hall, which made a deep impression on the public mind,—Mrs. Julia Ward Howe and Wendell Phillips calling out by far the largest audiences. We have been requested to announce that a similar course has been planned for the present winter, under general arrangements made by Mr. Edwin Morton. The following is the published list of lecturers and subjects:—

- Jan. 23—John Weiss. "False and True Sentiment for Nature."
 " 30—O. B. Frothingham. "The Revealed and the Hidden God."
 Feb. 6—T. W. Higginson. "The Sympathy of Religions."
 " 13—Samuel Longfellow. "Theism."
 " 20—Julia Ward Howe. "The Ethics of Culture."
 " 27—Francis E. Abbot. "Jesus and Socrates in the History of Religion."
 Mar. 6—John S. Dwight. "Music."
 " 13—William J. Potter. "The Buckle and Carlyle Theories of History."
 " 20—Ednah D. Cheney. "The Function of Art in Life."
 " 27—D. A. Wasson. "Providence and Progress."
 April 3—William Henry Channing. "The Church of Universal Unity."
 " 10—Wendell Phillips. (Subject not announced.)

The hour has been fixed at 3½ P. M., but may be changed.

The success of last winter's course is another proof that modern religion is migrating from the church to the hall.

THE SPIRIT OF FREEDOM.

A few months ago the Anti-Slavery Standard published the following correspondence:

A teacher at the Shaw Memorial School in Charleston has furnished the following interesting letters for publication:

LETTER FROM JOHN G. WHITTIER.

"AMESBURY, 28th, 4 mo., 1869.

"To the Sec. I. F. A.:

"Dear Friend: I cheerfully comply with thy request as respects the copy of a letter from a little black boy to whom allusion is made in my verses, 'Howard at Atlanta.' The letter was accompanied by one from Mary Withington, daughter of my dear friend, Dr. Withington of Newburyport, who is a teacher at Atlanta. She speaks of Richard in strong terms of commendation.

"Very truly, thy friend,

"JOHN G. WHITTIER."

WHAT THE NEGRO BOY WROTE THE POET.

"ATLANTA, GA., March 29th, 1869.

Mr. John G. Whittier:

"My dear Sir: I have heard your poem read and like it very well. I go to school to Miss Twitchell from Connecticut. I study Third National Reader, Davies' Intellectual Arithmetic, Walton's Written Arithmetic and Geography. I have a very good teacher. We have very nice Sunday and day schools. Our pastor, Rev. C. W. Francis, is to be installed this evening. He has been the cause of many coming to our Saviour and so it is with the teachers; they are very kind. I am a little miller boy and expect to go to work this week. You make a mistake in thinking that I said 'massa,' for I have given up that word. I thank you very much for your interest in our people.

"Very respectfully,
 RICHARD B. WRIGHT."

"You make a mistake in thinking that I said 'massa,' for I have given up that word!"

What a text is that! The negro boy unlearns to say master, the moment his chains are broken. Let America catch the spirit of freedom from the child of the slave! When she is as free in religion as in laws, she, too, will unlearn to say—Master!

M. ROCHEFORT ON RELIGION.

M. Henri Rochefort recently sent the following letter to the citizens of Lyons, which we copy from the Investigator:

PARIS, Dec. 7, 1869.

CITIZENS—If religions, of whatever nature they may be and whencesoever they may come, did not constitute a permanent outrage on all liberty and progress, tyrants would be less eager to restore those auxiliaries of absolutism as soon as they seized on power. We have sufficient shackles and chains on our feet in private and political life without forging others for our minds and ideas. The first duty of a nation which desires to be free—and when shall we obtain liberty if not at present?—is to cast off that restraint called religion, which leads fatally to slavery, when it does not conduct to madness. I congratulate you, therefore, with all my heart, citizens, on having had the happy idea of opposing to the processions and grimaces of our enemies the only communion we wish to employ, which is that of republican convictions and sentiments of fraternity. I clasp the hands of all the independent thinkers of the great city of Lyons.

Another pendulum swing. It is no wonder that, in countries where "religion" means an established church, and is made by despots to do to the mind what the sword does to the body, the very word grows hateful. We sympathize deeply with the spirit which protests against everything that even seems to be a "permanent outrage on all liberty and progress." But we would not pour out the baby with the bath. It is as unjust to charge religion with the despotism of the French Empire, as it is to charge republicanism with the excesses of the French Revolution. Radical prejudice is no more respectable than conservative prejudice. Prejudice is always unscientific. The strong thinker is strong enough to see the good in the evil, and distinguish the use of a thing from its abuse. We care nothing for the name of religion, if it does not cover the substance of it; but there is that in the truly religious spirit which is eternally and transcendently beautiful. In the times of the Salem witchcraft, the poor victims of the horrible delusion were sometimes squeezed to death between the door and the wall. We are as much in earnest for "liberty and progress" as M. Rochefort; but we do not propose to enter on a crusade against walls and doors.

He who would live the life of a god among men must be a non-conformist.

AN ARGUMENT FOR IMMORTALITY.

In considering the great problem of human destiny, I find but one sure foundation on which to build an absolute faith in immortality.

In the lower orders of life we discern that everything is created with reference to its use. No organ or faculty is provided, that does not contribute to a definite object. There is no unnecessary expenditure of means—no more outlay than is required to produce the desired result.

We cannot suppose Man created less wisely. The law of adaptation prevails with him also. If, then, he were designed to die at the close of his "three-score years and ten," he would be furnished only with those endowments necessary for this life in all its aspects. The highest law of his being would be,—seek every good attainable for the preservation and enjoyment of life here. "Eat and drink, for tomorrow ye die." But we find in the complex nature of man a power of such high quality, that he will resign all the gratifications of sense and even life itself, in obedience to some great idea,—some thought of his soul. Many even among those who had but faint hope of a life beyond, have thus gone down to death, in pursuit of noble living. Socrates, for example, would not preserve life at the expense of his integrity. "I know," said he, "that to do wrong is an evil; I do not know that death is an evil." Can a man so in harmony with eternal law,—so fitted for life,—die? What a useless expenditure of finest force were this! The wisdom of the Creator would be impeached in the creation of a being who, by the very law of his life, must, when occasion demands, voluntarily lay it down to go into nothingness.

Man's physical life is sustained by its ability to assimilate from his food the constituent elements of the body. So in the spiritual life. Its appetite is not for those things which "perish in the using." It is for Truth,—"every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." It lives in virtue of its power to assimilate these eternal verities. It is created of the same spiritual substance. It has taken deep root in Life, and cannot die.

This argument, I fear, will not apply to the immortality of all men. There are others which point to that,—with hope, not with assurance.

It may be that the immortal man is only the flowering or fruitage of the tree of Humanity.

There may also be a "Struggle for Life" in the spiritual, as in the physical world; it may be that those only "who lay" vigorous "hold on eternal life" win.

BREVITY.

LETTER FROM "BEZA."

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I have received the first two numbers of THE INDEX and have read them with interest and profit. I am delighted to notice two things in the conduct of the paper,—boldness, and a reverent spirit. In this age of simulacra it is refreshing to the spirit of an honest man, to see investigators of science, whether moral or natural, thoroughly courageous and obedient to their convictions. Connected with an orthodox church, and renowned in my narrow sphere for soundness in the faith, I nevertheless am and always have been an advocate of free thought and free speech; for I know that, whatever of disaster may happen to our church creeds, the truth of God is eternal, and must, like pure gold, come out of the hottest fire purer and more beautiful than ever.

I say I like your reverent spirit, too. You seem to remember the weakness of human nature, and that persons hold to their religious opinions, which they have inherited with their acres from their fathers, with the same tenacity that men of sense hold to their convictions, which are only the result of careful and candid investigation. Although the fact is not creditable to us, it is yet true of us; and hence in the work of enlightenment in which you are engaged you must take it into your calculations. It requires patience, I know, to practise this virtue; but remember how many men of honest minds, all over the country, are in the condition of those once blind persons we read of in the Gospels, who, as the scales begin to fall from their eyes, "see men as trees walking."

However far I may be from you in your theology, I propose to give you a hearing; and therefore hail with pleasure the bright star that has appeared in the West, as an Index to the spirit of the nineteenth century.

MONEY.

Among the many "dogmas" that seem deep rooted in the human mind, there is probably none which has so small a substratum of common sense as the generally accepted theory in regard to money,—namely, that "a return to specie payments is desirable." The principal newspapers and periodicals in the country contain many labored articles to prove that "a circulating medium (money) not convertible into coin on demand is an evil, etc., etc." Can there be anything more certain than that some future generation will profit by the universal acknowledgement that metal of any kind (unless cheaper than paper) is as absolutely superfluous for conducting the exchanges of the world as was the second or return wire for the purposes of telegraphy? It is indisputably true that every dollar's worth (so called) of specie-metals ever obtained from California, or elsewhere, cost on the average at least fourteen shillings ($1.75), or subtracted that amount from the accumulated products of previous useful labor,—to say nothing of the loss of life and the untold sufferings occasioned by the mad rush to seek for this almost worthless stuff. The continued use of coin as money by civilized nations may be likened to the folly of the rustic who "placed the corn in one end of the sack, and a boulder in the opposite end to preserve the equilibrium;" or again, to that of a farmer (say in Ohio) who, refusing to profit by the various modes of cheap transportation by which he might be surrounded, should persist in reserving a considerable portion of the yearly products of his farm to be hauled to New York in his wagon. If he could start with enough to subsist himself and team both ways, and have besides even so small a portion as one-tenth to exchange for articles that would be of use to him, he would thereby effect quite as economical an exchange of his labor as is now done by nations through the use of gold and silver. "But," says one, "gold and silver constitute the measure or standard of value." Do they necessarily do so? Would not international notes—being the promise of half a dozen or more leading nations who agree to receive them in settlement of all claims whatever—answer the same purpose? Unquestionably they would; and nine-tenths of the labor now used (and wasted) in procuring gold and silver would be diverted to some useful purpose.

It being conceded (as it is by all reflecting persons) that the sole good accomplished by money is the facilitating the exchange of the products of each kind of useful labor for all other useful or desirable things, it follows that that material should be used which will accomplish the desired end with the least waste of labor.

Owing to the astonishing credulity of a large portion of the human race, coin gets the credit of performing vastly more than it has done for years; but this credulous number is diminishing yearly; and the delusion that a circulating medium must possess intrinsic value, in the sense that coin is supposed to possess value, will ultimately be "numbered among the things that were." If a depository were provided large enough to contain all the coin in the world (O that it were all irrecoverably sunk in the depths of the ocean!) and arrangements were made by and between half a dozen or more leading commercial nations to issue, under proper regulations, certificates representing the value of any coin offered for deposit,—and if a further arrangement were made to have the keys (to one or more locks for each nation represented) in the keeping of its trustworthy officers, so that no coin could be withdrawn without the knowledge of all,—it may well be questioned if all, or nearly all, the coin now used as money would not eventually find its way there for deposit. Does any one doubt that such certificates would perform all international exchanges and pass the same as coin among all civilized nations? To my mind it is clear they would; and that, so far from any considerable portion of coin being retained in circulation, the certificates would command a premium on account of their greater convenience for transmission. If such a plan were successfully carried out (and it seems to me it only lacks the trial to make it successful), many nations would annually save, in addition to all expenses, millions of dollars in labor which is now wasted in transporting coin to and fro. I suppose no intelligent person will dispute the assertion that all labor is wasted which does not add to the supply of necessities of animal existence, having in view the highest possible development of the human species,—and the surrounding of each moral and useful member thereof (of course providing proper discipline and care for all others) with all that will make life agreeable and cause one and all, from the least unto the greatest, to "glorify their Creator and rejoice in the day they were born."

LETTER FROM JOHN GRAY.

GLENWOOD, MILLS CO., IOWA, }
Dec. 22d, 1869. }

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, ESQ..

Lock-Box 19, Toledo, Ohio.

DEAR SIR—The Prospectus of THE INDEX is at hand, and its contents have had my best attention. The aims of THE INDEX are high and noble, and I hope it will be a success.

I have just perused a report of a lecture delivered by the President of the Free Religious Association, Mr. Frothingham, in New York, on the 12th inst., with much satisfaction. The tenets of what is called FREE RELIGION, I have never heard advocated, but from the laudatory notices I have occasionally read in the "Boston Investigator," I infer they are very liberal.

If it be needful to have a religion, we want one that will increase the amount of knowledge in the community. Much of the information which is diffused abroad is to be attributed to the influence of religion, directly or indirectly. It may be made an important part, or branch, of knowledge. An acquaintance with Nature's God, and Nature's truth, includes the most of that which needs to be known,—the essence, the consummation of that which is called scientific knowledge. Science has been defined to be "nothing else than the investigation of the divine perfections and operations as displayed in the economy of the universe." When God and his works are known, so as to move the affections and control the conduct, we realize the just application, and attain to the true end, of all knowledge. The fact that the mind has been awakened to know itself and the truth shows its appetency for truth wherever truth may be found. I must say that the religious world has supplied its full quota of scholars. It has furnished some of the very highest in the gifts of mind. Witness Miltons, the Newtons, the Lockes, the Cuviers, the Tholucks. The love of glory, as the supreme motive, has excited the intellectual efforts of others and raised them to distinction. The great leading principles of the Grecian education, and especially the Athenian, seem to have been to improve the faculties by exercise; to regulate that exercise by a settled rule, ascertained to be an infallible guide to the end proposed; to stimulate exertion by the love of glory; and to excite that love by the honors of pre-eminence. The operation of these principles carried Athens in literature and the arts (not in science as now cultivated) to a height that has never been surpassed. Could not the same distinction have been attained, had the great men of that city been influenced by the holier motives of a religious conviction? If so, by retaining the exercise and the rule above referred to, "the infallible guide," they could have dispensed with the love of glory, and the honors of pre-eminence, except as these worldly motives might have had a subordinate agency. Lord Bacon has taught that "all works are overcome by amplitude of reward, soundness of direction, and conjunction of labors;" and a commentator on this precept has observed that "the greatest of these three, by far the greatest, is soundness of direction." That Athens had in perfection, and it achieved everything for her, but in the lapse of ages the "infallible guide" has been lost. From the few accounts which have reached us we can scarcely comprehend the agencies which were employed in producing her immortal works. Certainly the moderns have no knowledge of a rule which is as unerring in its results as that which guided Athens to the rank which she holds in the scale of intellect. It must be created anew, if we are to possess it. But give us in this country such a rule, or that soundness of direction of which the great English philosopher speaks, and should we want aught else but the holier motives of a pure religion accompanied by that degree of love of fame and pre-eminence, perhaps, natural to humanity, to excite us to distinction in every species of intellectual improvement?

We live in eventful times. Even the beloved Zion of our orthodox neighbors begins to be shaken with the noise of fierce disputation. Christian brethren disagree, and in their contests about unessential points are wasting energies that, according to their own doctrine, ought to be consecrated to the more vital purposes of holy living.

Knowledge, Mr. Editor, combined with habits of reflection, should lead us to self-examination to see our errors and defects, to teach us humility, the folly of pride and of haughty and supercilious tempers, which are productive of much mischief and unhappiness, both in the higher and the lower spheres of life. Pride is uniformly the offspring of self-ignorance. For if a man will but turn his eyes within, and thoroughly scrutinize himself, so as to perceive his errors and follies and the germs of vice which lodge in his heart, he would see enough to teach him humbleness of mind and to render a proud disposition odious and detestable, and inconsistent with the relations in which he stands to his fellow-creatures and to the universe at large. Such mental investigations would also lead to self-possession under affronts and injuries, and, amid the hurry and disorder of the passions, to charity, candor, and moderation, in regard to the sentiments and conduct of others, to the exercise of self-denial, to decorum and consistency of character, and to a wise and steady conduct in life. But how can we ever expect that an ignorant, uncultivated mind, unaccustomed to a regular train of rational thought, can enter with spirit and intelligence on the process of self-examination? It requires a certain portion, at least, of information and a habit of reflection before a man can be qualified to engage in such an exercise, and those qualifications can only be attained by the exercise which the mind receives in the acquisition of general knowledge. If, then, it be admitted that self-ignorance is the original spring of all the follies and incongruities we behold in the character of men, and the cause of all that vanity, censoriousness, malignity and vice, which abound in the world; and if self-knowledge would tend to counteract such immoral dispositions, we must endeavor to communicate a certain portion of knowledge to mankind, to fit them for the exercise of self-examination and self-inspection, before we can expect that the moral world will be renovated, and "all iniquity, as ashamed, hide its head, and stop its mouth."

JOHN GRAY.

CONUNDRUM.—Figby inquired the other day,—
"What is the difference between interest on seventhrees and Jonah in the whale's belly?" After a moment's cogitation we replied,—
"One is a profit on bonds, while the other is bonds on a prophet." "Very good," quoth F., "but not quite right. One is a clean profit, but the other isn't!"—Seaside Oracle.

Among the progressive religious movements of the world, none is more interesting than that which is going on among the native Hindus in India, under the name of the Brahmo Somaj. This is an organization on the basis of pure Theism. Those who belong to it have given up the idolatrous faith and practices of their countrymen, and are zealously striving to reform the social and moral condition of the country. They appear to be devoutly religious, with a good deal of the missionary spirit. They accept no authority in religion other than the truth of nature and intuition. One of their principles reads thus: "Although the Brahmos do not consider any book written by man as the basis of their religion, yet they do accept, with respect and pleasure, and truth contained in any book." They will not call themselves "Christians."

The present chief apostle of this movement is Keshub Chunder Sen, of Calcutta; and we here reprint the letter sent by him to the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association in 1868. It was printed in the report of that meeting, but it deserves, for its noble thought and sweet spirit, a wider reading than it has yet received.

LETTER FROM KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, OF THE THEISTIC CHURCH IN INDIA.

THE BRAHMO SOMAJ OF INDIA,
21st February, 1868.

To Rev. Wm. J. Potter, Secretary of the "Free Religious Association," United States of America.

BROTHER:—Gladly do I accept your kind and affectionate greeting, and the sentiments of true love and sympathy contained in your welcome message of the 24th of October last. I forget the great distance between us, and feel that our hearts are near each other, bound in the ties of spiritual fellowship. Your brotherly call has found a response in the hearts of thousands in this part of the world, and cordially do we join our hands with yours, as children of the same Father, to co-operate in the blessed work of advancing the cause of true religion. How consoling, how encouraging to us is the thought that the great movement of religious reformation, which we have humbly carried on in India for more than a quarter of a century, has met the sympathy and support of an associated body of our brethren on the other side of the globe, and that India and America, the East and the West, are to sing henceforth with united hearts, and in one harmonious and swelling chorus, the glory of the Supreme Creator!

In compliance with your request, I beg to give below, for the information of the "Free Religious Association," a brief sketch of the gradual development of our church, its aims and achievements.

Thirty-eight years ago, when English education had just opened the minds of some of my countrymen to the errors of Hindu idolatry, the late Rajah Ram Mohun Roy, the great religious reformer of India, whose name is probably known to you, established a church in Calcutta for the worship of the Supreme Being under the name of the "Brahmo Somaj," or the Assembly of the worshippers of God. His direct object in founding this church was to persuade his countrymen to forsake idolatry and become monotheists; and the more successfully to accomplish this object he made the Vedas, the earliest scriptures of the Hindus, the basis of all his teachings. In other words, he professed simply to effect a revival of the unitarian faith and worship of ancient Hinduism. But he had also a higher and more comprehensive object. He invited "all sorts and descriptions of people without distinction," to unite in the worship of their common Father, the Supreme God of all nations; and to this end he proved by appeals to the texts of the Bible and Koran, as he did in the case of Hinduism, that Christianity and Mohammedanism were both essentially monotheistic. He accordingly directed that the service to be held in his church should always be of such a catholic character as to "strengthen the bonds of union between men of all religious persuasions and creeds." Practically, however, the Brahmo Somaj became simply a Hindu unitarian church, and the latter object was altogether lost sight of. The congregation slowly increased in number, till the Somaj fell into the hands of my respected friend and coadjutor, Babu Debendro Nath Tagore, who gave it a new life, and immensely extended its operations. He converted this body of mere worshippers into an association of believers, by binding them to a few articles of belief, and to a covenant enjoining moral purity of life. He also started a religious journal, appointed teachers, and published several doctrinal and devotional treatises; and he succeeded in the course of a few years in enrolling hundreds of followers, and helping the formation of several branch Somajes in different parts of Bengal, on the model of that founded by Rajah Ram Mohun Roy. All this time, however, the Vedas were regarded as the sole foundation of faith, and the members of the Brahmo Somaj were known as Vedantists. It was not till about twenty years ago that the Vedas ceased to be viewed in the light of infallible scriptures, and made room for a more catholic and unexceptionable basis of faith, viz: God's revelation in nature and the religious instincts of man. The Brahmo Somaj has since become a purely Theistic church, and now stands precisely in the same relation to its old creed as the "Free Religious Association" does to Unitarian Christianity. But its progress did not stop here. It is true, its fundamental principles of belief were then definitely settled, and have continued unchanged hitherto. But in their application to life and in the practical development of their catholic and pure spirit, great struggles and movements have gone on for some years past. It was found that as most of the social and domestic customs of the Hindus were interwoven with the evils of idolatry and caste, it was incumbent on every true and sincere Brahmo to discountenance such customs, even at the risk of being excommunicated and otherwise persecuted. The majority kept aloof from this bold undertaking, effecting a safe but unscientific compromise between the enlightened convictions of a Theist and the idolatrous social life of a Hindu. A small number however came forward at last, and began the great work of reforming the social and domestic economy of Hindu society on the basis of true religion, which has been developed more fully year after year, and has lately resulted in a variety of practical reforms, such as the abolition of caste distinctions, the marriage of widows, intermarriage (between members of different castes), the education and emancipation of women, &c. With a view to render our church wholly free from the narrow spirit of Hindu sectarianism and the evils of Hindu social life, and to establish it firmly on a catholic and pure basis, by incorporating into its membership theists of all nations, and bringing its social life into harmony with the pure dictates of conscience, the advanced Brahmos organized themselves into a society, in November, 1866, under the name of the "Brahmo Somaj of India." This society also seeks to establish closer intercourse and more active co-operation than hitherto existed among all the Brahmo Somajes in India, and to propagate our faith more extensively and systematically throughout the country. Our church is thus at present an organized Theistic church, Indian in its origin, but universal in its scope, which aims to destroy idolatry, superstition, and sectarianism, and propagate the saving truths of absolute religion and the spiritual worship of the one true God, and likewise to promote the intellectual, moral, and social reformation of individuals and nations, and thus make Theism the religion of life.

It is impossible to calculate the exact number of the members of our church, as there is no ceremony of initiation amongst us; nor is such ceremony possible or desirable in so rational and spiritual a faith. Nearly two thousand have subscribed to the covenant above alluded to, or have signed some other simpler form of declaration; the names of such have been registered. But there are many thousands more among my countrymen who in their hearts deny Hinduism and believe in the fundamental doctrines of our creed, but who do not care to join formally the membership of our church. The fact is, the tendency of the age here, as I believe it is in other parts of the civilized world, is towards Theism. All who receive liberal English education renounce idolatry; of these some embrace Orthodox Christianity, some become skeptics, the rest glide into the Brahmo Somaj, and become Theists in some form or other.

There are at present upwards of sixty Brahmo churches in the different presidencies and provinces of India, where the local Brahmos assemble once every week for the purpose of worship, divine service being conducted in the vernacular language by persons previously selected from among them for their superior wisdom and piety. Hymns, sermons, prayers, meditation, and the reading of theistic texts from the Hindu and sometimes from other scriptures, compose the service held in our churches. On special occasions service is conducted in English.

For the more extensive diffusion of our religion several books on speculative and practical Theism have been published from time to time in the vernacular language, as well as in English, and also some periodicals which have a large number of subscribers and readers all over the country. A fortnightly English paper, "The Indian Mirror," is published in connection with our mission, which discusses political, social, and religious subjects. We have also about a dozen Missionaries, men who have of their own accord given up worldly pursuits, and, depending upon the voluntary contributions of the Brahmo community for the bare necessities of life, go about the country visiting the Brahmo Somajes, and preaching the truths of our holy faith to the educated natives, and sometimes also to the lower orders of the people. The disinterested and zealous exertions of these missionary brethren exert a very powerful and living influence, both in sustaining and quickening the moral life of the Brahmos scattered over the country, and in increasing the number of our adherents.

For a full exposition of the doctrines of our creed, I beg to refer you to the two sets of English publications which I have already forwarded to your address. I may, however, only observe here that, professing as we do the universal and absolute religion, whose cardinal doctrines are the "Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man," and which accepts the truths of all scriptures and honors the prophets of all nations, we heartily sympathize with you and the other members of the "Free Religious Association" as brethren in a common faith and co-workers in the same holy cause.

Therefore with the deepest joy, and with all the fervor of brotherly love, do I welcome your kind message, and, in the name of thousands of fellow-theists in India, reciprocate the affectionate regards of the "Free Religious Association." Believe me, it is no mere formal exchange of compliments. To India, at this moment, such sympathy of the American nation is inestimably valuable, and she receives it with the enthusiasm of national rejoicings. Long and anxiously had we labored and prayed for the light of truth amidst the awful darkness of idolatry and corruption, struggling with hardships and difficulties, and encountering opposition and persecution of no ordinary kind, the Merciful God alone helping us onward. And now that we are rejoicing in the light vouchsafed by Him, we have begun to feel the heavy responsibility attached to it of extending its blessings to other lands. At such a time, the cheering intelligence communicated by you of similar labors and achievements in America serves to strengthen our hands, and increase our joy and faith and hope a hundred fold. We now feel, as we never felt before, that God's religion shall spread throughout the length and breadth of the world, destroying all false creeds and sects, and uniting all nations in one universal brotherhood; and it affords us inexpressible delight that the noble American people have come forward to co-operate with us in paving the way for the future Church of the world. May God help us in carrying out this great work.

Trusting you will kindly keep us informed of the proceedings of the Free Religious Association, and offering our best wishes and prayers for its welfare and success,

I remain heartily yours in Theistic fellowship.

Miscellaneous.

It is a sad thing to think that there are probably many innocent men in prison for the crimes of others. A case of that kind was fortunately recently discovered in the Massachusetts State Prison. A man was imprisoned for life for highway robbery. Another prisoner, there for some other offence, confessed that he committed the crime, and gave such undoubted evidence, that the man under the life sentence was promptly discharged by the Governor and Council. But suppose that this man had been convicted of murder on the same testimony, and he had paid the penalty attached to this crime. An innocent man would have been hung, and it would have been impossible to have remedied the mistake. Such mistakes are as likely to occur in murder cases as in the punishment of lighter crimes.—Cardiner (Me.) Reporter.

The number of women studying medicine at the university of Zurich increases steadily in geometric progression. Four years ago there was but one, the next year there were two, the next year four, last year there were eight, and there are now sixteen. We are assured, it is true, by a partizan of the movement, that none of the inconveniences which it was feared might arise from women being allowed to share the school with men have at present been experienced. The classes are as large as ever, and the dean reports that the innovation has undoubtedly improved the discipline of the school.—Exchange.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 60,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of side-walks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

FIFTY AFFIRMATIONS.

RELIGION.

1. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself.
2. The root of religion is universal human nature.
3. Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root.
4. Historical religions are all different, in virtue of their different historical origin and development.
5. Every historical religion has thus two distinct elements,—one universal or spiritual, and the other special or historical.
6. The universal element is the same in all historical religions; the special element is peculiar in each of them.
7. The universal and the special elements are equally essential to the existence of an historical religion.
8. The unity of all religions must be sought in their universal element.
9. The peculiar character of each religion must be sought in its special element.

RELATION OF JUDAISM TO CHRISTIANITY.

10. The idea of a coming "kingdom of heaven" arose naturally in the Hebrew mind after the decay of the Davidic monarchy, and ripened under foreign oppression into a passionate longing and expectation.
11. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be a world-wide empire on this earth, both temporal and spiritual, to be established on the ruins of the great empires of antiquity by the miraculous intervention of Jehovah.
12. The Messiah or Christ was to reign over the "kingdom of heaven" as the visible deputy of Jehovah, who was considered the true sovereign of the Hebrew nation. He was to be a Priest-King,—the supreme pontiff or high-priest of the Hebrew church, and absolute monarch of the Hebrew state.
13. The "apocalyptic literature" of the Jews exhibits the gradual formation and growth of the idea of the Messianic "kingdom of heaven."
14. All the leading features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "kingdom of heaven," the "end of the world," the "great day of judgment," the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," the "resurrection of the dead," the condemnation of the wicked and the exaltation of the righteous, the "passing away of the heavens and the earth," and the appearance of a "new heaven and a new earth," were definitely formed and firmly fixed in the Hebrew mind, in the century before Jesus was born.
15. John the Baptist came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." But he declared himself merely the forerunner of the Messiah.
16. Jesus also came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and announced himself as the Messiah or Christ.
17. Jesus emphasized the spiritual aspect of the Messianic kingdom; but, although he expected his throne to be established by the miraculous intervention of God, and therefore refused to employ human means in establishing it, he nevertheless expected to discharge the political functions of his office as King and Judge, when the fulness of time should arrive.

18. As a preacher of purely spiritual truth, Jesus probably stands at the head of all the great religious teachers of the past.

19. As claimant of the Messianic crown, and founder of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, Jesus shared the spirit of an unenlightened age, and stands on the same level with Gautama or Mohammed.

20. In the belief of his disciples, the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus would not prevent the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven." His throne was conceived to be already established in the heavens; and the early church impatiently awaited its establishment on earth at the "second coming of the Christ."

21. Christianity thus appears as simply the complete development of Judaism,—the highest possible fulfilment of the Messianic dreams based on the Hebrew conception of a "chosen people."

CHRISTIANITY.

22. Christianity is the historical religion taught in the Christian Scriptures, and illustrated in the history of the Christian church.

23. It is a religion in virtue of its universal element; it is the Christian religion in virtue of its special element.

24. The Christian Scriptures teach, from beginning to end, that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God,"—that is, the Hebrew Messiah. This, the Christian Confession, was declared both by Jesus and the apostles to be necessary to salvation or admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

25. The Christian church, from its origin to the present day, has everywhere planted itself on faith in the Christian Confession, as its divinely appointed foundation,—the eternal "rock" against which the "gates of hell shall never prevail."

26. The Christian Confession gradually created on the one hand the theology, and on the other hand the hierarchy, of the Roman Catholic Church. This process was not, as is claimed, a corruption, but a natural and logical development.

27. The Church of Rome embodies Christianity in its most highly developed and perfect form, as a religion of authority based on the Christian Confession.

28. Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of Christianity, whether regarded theologically or ecclesiastically, under the influence of the free spirit of protest against authority.

29. "Liberal Christianity,"—that is, democratic autocracy in religion,—is the highest development of the free spirit of protest against authority which is possible within the Christian church. It is, at the same time, the lowest possible development of faith in the Christ,—a return to the Christian Confession in its crudest and least developed form.

30. Christianity is the religion of Christians, and all Christians are believers in the Christ.

31. The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian Confession is the boundary line of Christianity.

FREE RELIGION.

32. The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion,—the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church.

33. The history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion at the expense of the Christian Religion. As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases.

34. The completion of the religious protest against authority must be the extinction of faith in the Christian Confession.

35. Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law.

36. The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.

37. The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man,—the race serving the individual, the individual serving the race.

38. The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous and universal education of man.

39. The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice in the private soul.

40. The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One.

41. Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion,—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend.

RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO FREE RELIGION

42. Christianity is identical with Free Religion so far as its universal element is concerned,—antagonistic to it so far as its special element is concerned.

43. The corner-stone of Christianity is faith in the Christ. The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in Human Nature.

44. The great institution of Christianity is the Christian Church, the will of the Christ being its supreme law. The great institution of Free Religion is the coming Republic of the World, the universal conscience and reason of mankind being its supreme organic law or constitution.

45. The fellowship of Christianity is limited by the Christian Confession; its brotherhood includes all subjects of the Christ and excludes all others. The fellowship of Free Religion is universal and free; it proclaims the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

46. The practical work of Christianity is to Christianize the world,—to convert all souls to the Christ, and ensure their salvation from the wrath of God. The practical work of Free Religion is to humanize the world,—to make the individual nobler here and now, and to convert the human race into a vast Co-operative Union devoted to universal ends.

47. The spiritual ideal of Christianity is the suppression of self and perfect imitation of Jesus the Christ. The spiritual ideal of Free Religion is the free development of self, and the harmonious education of all its powers to the highest possible degree.

48. The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of Free Religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face; Free Religion is erect on its feet.

49. The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake.—The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

50. Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.

CHRISTIANITY AND FREE RELIGION CONTRASTED AS TO INSTITUTIONS, TERMS OF FELLOWSHIP, SOCIAL IDEAL, MORAL IDEAL, AND ESSENTIAL SPIRIT.

[Read to the (then) Unitarian Society of Toledo, Sunday morning, Aug. 1, 1869.]

"The first dawning sense of human progression was inspired by Christianity, which, by proclaiming the superiority of the law of Jesus to that of Moses, gave form to the idea of a more perfect state replacing a less perfect, which had been necessary as a preparation. Though Catholicism was in this simply the organ of expression of human reason, the service it thus rendered entitles it not the less, as all philosophers will agree, to our eternal gratitude. But, apart from the mischief of the mysticism and vague obscurity which belong to all applications of the theological method, such a beginning could not possibly suggest any scientific views of social progression, for any such view was barred at once by the claim of Christianity to be the ultimate stage at which the human mind must stop."

Auguste Comte, Positive Philosophy (Miss Martineau's translation), p. 410.

Last Sunday we compared Christianity and Free Religion with reference to their foundations or corner-stones,—the great fundamental ideas which constitute their bases as systems of faith and life. We found that the corner-stone of Christianity is Jesus the Christ,—that the corner-stone of Free Religion is universal Human Nature; in other words, Faith in Christ, Faith in Man. Various reasons were given why these two fundamental ideas could not be reconciled with each other. The Christ-idea on the one hand, was shown to be inconsistent with an enlightened idea of God,—to rest on belief in miracle and disbelief in law,—to involve the recognition of monarchy as the ideal form of government,—to weaken the consciousness of God in the human soul by deifying a man. Faith in natural humanity, on the other hand, is the only basis of a faith in God which shall meet, at the same time, the demands of philosophy and religion,—which shall accept law and ignore miracle,—which shall carry the idea of democracy into religion as well as into politics,—which shall develop in the highest possible degree the spiritual nature of man. The two ideas, therefore, which constitute the foundations of the old and the new faiths, cannot be harmonized until partiality for a chosen nation can be reconciled with impartial justice to all mankind,—until miracle can be reconciled with law,—until monarchy can be reconciled with democracy,—until idol-worship can be reconciled with pure and enlightened worship of God. If, then, we are satisfied that Faith in the Christ and Faith in Man are indeed the two bases or fundamental ideas, and that these ideas are essentially incompatible with each other, we are prepared to continue our comparison of them and trace them in their historical and spiritual development. I propose this morning to touch very briefly on the five chief differences between Christianity and Free Religion which inevitably result from the difference of their primary ideas.

1. The first and most obvious point of contrast is the character of the Institutions built up on these primary ideas. Making due allowance for the necessary imperfectness with which institutions embody ideas, it is safe to select, as expressions of the inherent tendencies of Christianity and Free Religion, the Roman Papacy on the one hand, and the American Republic on the other. The principle of authority always tends to create absolute despotism, temporal and spiritual; the principle of freedom always tends to create an absolute democracy, temporal and spiritual. In the Roman Papacy we behold that complete union of Church and State which is demanded by the Christian idea of the Messianic Kingdom, namely, a society ruled by the Christ in his double capacity of High Priest and King, Supreme Pontiff and Absolute Monarch. Judge Parsons, having occasion once to define the legal relation of husband and wife, with a certain grim wit thus expressed the despotic conception of our common law on this subject:—"In the matrimonial condition, the man and the woman are one,—and the man is that one." It is in a somewhat similar way that, according to the Romish conception, the State and the Church are one,—for the Church is that one. Rome completely merges the State in the Church, wielding the entire political and civil power in the interest of the Christian priesthood. All distinctively Christian institutions, whether Catholic or Protestant,—from the Spanish Inquisition and the College of Jesuits to Bible, Tract, and Missionary Societies, and Young Men's Christian Associations,—betray more or less clearly the inherent tendency of Christianity to regard the State as a mere servant of the Church. The significant fact that a definite movement already exists to insert into our Federal Constitution a recognition of Christianity as the State Religion, sufficiently illustrates this tendency, and is only a feeble manifestation among Protestants of the same spirit which makes all true Catholics devoted upholders of the Pope's temporal power. The meaning of this fact and similar facts which I cannot here pause to recount, I think to be that Christianity, being a religion based on the principle of Authority, cannot at heart be friendly to religious, intellectual, or civil Liberty. The day for persecution by fire and sword has perhaps gone by; but whoever watches narrowly the signs of the times, must discern, even among Unitarians (the most liberal, or, to speak more accurately, the least illiberal of Christian sects), abundant evidence of hostility to spiritual freedom. The open proscription of Theodore Parker, only a few years ago, has been succeeded by a proscription of younger heretics which is less honorable because less open. The lesson taught by facts like these is plain—Christianity cannot long be the faith of men or of nations who know what freedom is, and have courage to maintain it.

The American Republic, as already stated, is the institution which best embodies the essential and fundamental idea of Free Religion, i. e. Faith in Man. What ever concessions have been wrung from reluctant kingcraft and priestcraft by the spirit of liberty,—whatever steps in the progress of the race have been due to man's increasing respect for his own nature and increasing faith in his own possibilities,—whatever institutions have been founded on the great principle of a free chance for each and equal rights for all,—are so many triumphs of Free Religion; for what is Free Religion, but faith in human nature and human possibilities overcoming all obstacles and abolishing all slaveries? Of all human achievements, the establishment of the American Republic is the grandest and the most fruitful of good to mankind; and because it is the most magnificent institution yet built up on faith in man, I claim that it is thus far the typical embodiment of Free Religion. Now mark the result. It is often said, (and what is said is true as meant), that the theory of our government is the complete separation of Church and State. But this implies a shallow view of the relation between religion and life. Christianity aims at the absolute union of Church and State; and unless Free Religion did the same, it would be an arrant impostor. Let me explain the seeming paradox. No union of Church and State can be permanent as a simple alliance of two equal and independent powers. Society could not long exist on so rotten a basis as that. The Papacy has been so tremendous a power for over a thousand years, because the Church utterly absorbed the State, and commanded every energy of the community in the service of one great idea, the establishment of a universal empire of Christ. The lion and the lamb lay down in peace, because, as has been well said, the lamb was inside of the lion. Now Free Religion aims as directly as Christianity at the union of Church and State; but it reverses the order of absorption. The State must utterly absorb the Church. When America is homogeneous in politics and religion, everything will be thoroughly secularized. The profound discontent with churches and church ministrations, felt by every deeply thoughtful and earnest spirit of our time, means simply this,—Christianity cannot be the religion of a free State. The Christian Church must indeed be kept rigidly separate from the American State; and this is what people usually mean who protest against any union of the two. But the American State and the American Church must be indissolubly one, because they must aim at one and the same object. The Christian Church is an excrescence in America. Based on un-American ideas, it is supported by those who are but partially Americanized; and it is useful to-day for no other reason than because we have so many believers in kings and priests still among us. How Free Religion will unite Church and State in a new fashion,—in a union which shall be the thorough secularization of the Church and its utter absorption in the State,—I must forbear to explain until my next discourse. I turn now to the second point of contrast between Christianity and Free Religion, arising out of their fundamental ideas.

2. Since faith in Christ is the central and controlling idea of Christianity, what must, in the nature of things, be the limit of Christian fellowship? Manifestly the Christian confession, the avowal of faith in Christ as the Savior of the world. Christians are slowly learning to ignore all minor differences, and to cease their quarrels over non-essentials; but they can never overstep the limits of the Christian confession without thereby stepping outside of Christianity. They, and they alone, are Christian brothers and sisters, who acknowledge the same Lord and Master, and drink at the same fountain-head of Christian life. The ancients used to marvel at the strength of the bond which bound the early Christians together, and exclaimed, "Behold, how these Christians love one another!" But those who forget the limitation of this love, fail to understand the spirit of the primitive church. Read, for example, the first epistle attributed to John, the beloved disciple, the apostle whose name is almost synonymous with "Christian love;" and it is evident, in almost every verse, that, in laying down the law of love, John has in mind only the company of believers. "Who," he asks (I, 22—23), "is the liar, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? This is the antichrist, who denieth the Father and the Son. Whoever denieth the Son, the same hath not even the Father; he that acknowledgeth the Son hath also the Father." Here we see the essential idea of Christianity brought out with perfect distinctness: whoever acknowledges that Jesus is the Christ, enjoys the favor of God; but whoever denies this, is a liar and Antichrist, is deprived of God's favor, and, of course, is outside the pale of Christian love. What is meant, therefore, in the following words (I, 7), is perfectly plain:—"If we walk in the light, as he [God] is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin." From that day to this, the same limitation of Christian fellowship has existed; Christian love is simply the love of Christians for each other; and the Christian confession is the organic bond of union in every Christian church.

But the fellowship of Free Religion is wide as humanity itself. All who are born of woman are brothers and equals, in virtue of their common nature; and, with impartial tenderness, God loves them all. Christian and Pagan, spiritualist and materialist, theist and atheist, high and low, male and female, white and black, rich and poor, wise and foolish, the sinner and the sinned against,—all are the children of the Good Spirit, and welcome to the fellowship of Free Religion, if they will but consent to accept it. No creed, no Christian confession, no spiritual pride, should separate those who are conscious of a longing for better life. The bond of union in the great brotherhood of man is the consciousness of a common nature, the yearning and the effort to convert ideal goodness into real character, the hunger and thirst after righteousness, truth, and love. There is no right of spiritual primogeniture, no monopoly of inspiration, no precedence of creed; despite pretensions and delusions, all men are, at the best, but seekers after truth, and can attain it by natural means alone. The impartial God sends his sunshine and his rain to all.

"Now there bubbled beside them, where they stood,
A fountain of waters, sweet and good;
The youth to the streamlet's brink drew near.
Saying, 'Ambrose, thou maker of creeds, look here!'
Six vases of crystal then he took,
And set them along the edge of the brook.

"As into these vases the water I pour,
There shall one hold less, another more,
And the water unchanged, in every case,
Shall put on the figure of the vase.
O thou who would'st unity make thro' strife,
Can'st thou fit this sign to the water of life?"

When Ambrose looked up, he stood alone,
The youth and the stream and the vases were gone;
But he knew, by a sense of humbled grace,
He had talked to an angel, face to face,
And he felt his heart change inwardly,
As he fell on his knees beneath the tree."

These beautiful lines of our own American poet breathe the true spirit of Free Religion,—a deep humility in presence of infinite truth which forbids any to despise another's earnest faith. How all dogmatic arrogance fades away, when reverence for our own souls begets equal reverence for the souls of others! Fearless and faithful let us be in the avowal of our own insights into truth; but if we are ever tempted to utter a harsh or bigoted or contemptuous word, when our neighbor fails to see what to us seems plain, let us lay our hand upon our mouth, nor measure all vision by our own. 'Charity, good will, and respect for the equal rights of all, are a bond of union that cannot be broken. These, then, are the two contrasted fellowships,—the brotherhood of the Christian church limited by the Christian confession, the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

3. The third point of contrast concerns the social ideals held up as the great practical ends to be realized in action. The supreme ambition of the Christian church is to christianize the world; for this, according to its theory, is the necessary condition of salvation in the world to come. Its efforts are directed to the one aim of bringing all men within its fold,—of making its brotherhood universal on the basis of the Christian confession,—of absorbing the world into itself, and thus including all mankind under the sceptre of its Lord. In the prime of its glory, the mediaeval Papacy went far towards accomplishing this object. Since the Reformation, the Christian church has become shattered into fragments; but each separate piece or sect endeavors to accomplish the same object anew, and devotes itself to zealous propagandism of its own peculiar tenets. "Church-extension" is thus the primary aim of all denominations; devotion to this aim, and success in it, are the evidence and measure of all denominational life. The ideal end of all Christian activity, therefore, the "practical work" on which it must concentrate itself, is to evangelize or christianize the world; and this means to make the kingdom of Christ co-extensive with the globe.

But the supreme ambition of Free Religion is to humanize the world. It aims to liberate, to educate, to spiritualize,—in one word, to develop the race. To bring out of man the best that is in him,—best in thought, in feeling and sentiment, in moral action, in social, political, intellectual and religious life,—this is the beneficent "practical work" it proposes. Whatever inward or outward conditions favor the symmetrical development of human nature, it strives untiringly to secure; and thus all high philanthropies, all noble endeavors in any way to better society, become profoundly religious. But propagandism, that is, the dissemination of particular doctrines rather than the establishment of universal principles, becomes proportionally trivial. Man does not need to be christianized,—he does need to be humanized. For to humanize him is to make him human in the best and highest sense of the word,—to cultivate not merely his lower faculties, but also his higher ones, and make him free, rational and unselfish. Human welfare, largely interpreted, with no squandering of energy on needless salvation from imaginary hells, is the true object for which every noble and self-sacrificing and enlightened spirit will toil. How worse than wasted are the labors spent, and the treasures poured out, in the "conversion" of the heathen, the printing of tracts, the erection of large and costly churches in which no poor man is able to rent a pew! Turn into wise philanthropic channels the great streams of power which thus run annually to waste,—and within fifty years the poverty, ignorance, and crime, which to-day curse society, would vanish like the miasma of unhealthy districts, when redeemed by the remedial measures of modern science. If Gen. Butler could save New Orleans from the yellow fever, could not the combined efforts of society, if wisely and vigorously directed, at least check the contagion of intemperance, prostitution, and social corruption? If Free Religion promised merely a reform of philosophical or theological errors, I should not be here to-day; my earnestness for its spread comes from a deep conviction that it is able to make character cleaner and grander, home happier and purer, society more high-toned and energetic in the suppression of public evils. Let Christianity aim forever at its social ideal of a "kingdom of Christ," and realize it, too, if it can but accomplish these divine ends at the same time. But because it has labored almost in vain these two thousand long years, I look rather to Free Religion, with its social ideal of a Commonwealth of Man, in which none shall be a King or Lord, but all shall be free and equal citizens, bending with combined strength to lift off the heavy burdens, and let the oppressed go free. The Kingdom of Christ, the Commonwealth of Man,— which dream kindles the more splendid hopes, and makes our hearts beat the higher with courage for the battle of life? Choose for yourselves,—I have long since made my choice.

4. A still profounder contrast arrests our thought, when we contemplate the two spiritual ideals held up before the private soul. The highest possible exhortation of Christianity is this,—“Be like Christ!” Its highest possible eulogy is to say,—“He is Christlike.” By laborious self-examination and prayer to model the character after the pattern of the great exemplar, is the crowning achievement of the Christian saint. A little work of Thomas a Kempis, entitled “The Imitation of Christ,” is said to have passed through more editions than any other book, with the single exception of the Bible; and, although written by a Catholic, is cherished as a priceless treasure by thousands of Protestants. What is it? A devoutly passionate outpouring of the Christian aspiration for the character of Jesus, to be realized by absolute union with him and absorption of his spirit. It is the spiritual ideal of the Christian mystic to suppress the stubborn individuality and completely reproduce the Master's likeness; and the heroes of the Christian church are precisely those who, like Fenelon, have most perfectly attained it.

But the spiritual ideal of Free Religion is to develop each soul naturally, to cultivate all its powers, and scrupulously to heed the hints given by Nature herself in the individual temperament and capacities. In the old Greek fable, Procrustes used to lay all the travellers he could capture upon his own bed. If they were too short, he would violently stretch them out; if too long, he would chop off their extremities. In either case, he was determined to bring them to his own standard of human stature. Christianity becomes a Procrustes, just so far as it enjoins the imitation of Jesus. All imitation is mutilation. The successful imitation of Jesus by all mankind would extinguish individuality, make vigor and independence of character impossible, and thus destroy the very roots of all civilization. Society demands the widest variety of character, without which its development would be fatally one-sided. What should we gain, if the churches should succeed in making every man in Toledo exactly like Jesus? I fear we should sigh for a few publicans and sinners, to break up the horrible monotony. The character of Jesus, beautiful and exalted as it was, exhibits but one out of an infinite number of spiritual types, and can be an ideal to no one who has an ideal of his own. Free Religion proclaims the servility, nay, the utter irreligion, of spiritual imitation. The law of variety in temperament and organization among men involves a kindred law of variety in their individual ideals. The ideal of each soul must be determined by the equilibrium of its powers, the nature of its surroundings in the world, the degree of its spiritual culture; and as the soul grows, so also must its ideal evermore enlarge. There can be no one, fixed ideal for all men, nor for one man at all times. It is mischievous, therefore, to inculcate imitation of Jesus as a wise rule of action. Fac-similes of him are impossible; good copies of him are rare; caricatures of him are altogether too common. Another man's ideal, like a die stolen from the mint, can only make me a counterfeit. This, therefore, is the highest exhortation of Free Religion,—“Be thyself!” And this is its highest eulogy,—“He was true to himself, and therefore true to humanity and to God.”

5. But the profoundest contrast of all lies in a fundamental unlikeness of spirit. The spirit of Christianity, as manifested in the chief saints of Christian history, has always been that of self-abnegation, self-distrust, self-aborrence,—prostration before the Christ and submission to his will. To be obedient to Jesus, and to find this obedience made easy by a divine passion of love for his person and character, has always been, and must always be, the secret aspiration of every Christian heart. The supreme motive to holy living is always, in the deeply devout Christian, absorbing love for his Savior; and this love always produces the suppression of self, the extinction of the private will, that the will of the Master may be done in life and heart. Meekness, patience, humility, endurance, resignation, passive obedience, absence of self-will, complete surrender of the whole soul to a will outside itself,—these are the peculiar virtues and graces of the Christian character, and determine the type of the Christian spirit.

But the spirit of Free Religion is fundamentally different, supplying that masculine element which Christianity has always lacked. The free soul will soar to as lofty a height of self-sacrifice as the Christian soul; but in obedience to an inner, not an outer, impulse. The one condemns, the other reverences, human nature. It is Christianity which teaches Total Depravity, Despair of Man; it is Free Religion which teaches the dignity of human nature, Faith in Man. The same self-consecration to God which, in the Christian soul, produces self-surrender and self-contempt, produces in the free soul self-poise and self-respect,—fosters the heroic and manly virtues,—strengthens rather than weakens the private will, but identifies it with that will which is the omnipresent force of the universe, and dedicates it to eternal justice. God in Christ is God outside of self, and devotion to him must be self-suppression. But God in Humanity is God in every soul; and devotion to him becomes supreme self-reverence and self-trust. The spirit of Free Religion, as the name implies, is the spirit of freedom, of manly and womanly self-respect, of deep religious faith in the God whose highest manifestation is in the soul; and because its faith in self is at bottom faith in God, it is the perfect blending of sturdy self-reliance with true humility and serene trust.

We have thus concluded our proposed comparison of Christianity and Free Religion. Let me sum up the results we have reached. God in Christ is the spiritual centre of Christianity; in Christ himself, therefore, Christianity must ever have its basis or cornerstone,—in the Christian church it must ever have its peculiar and characteristic institution,—in the Christian confession it must ever have its limit of fellowship,—in the universal extension of the Christian church it must ever have its social ideal,—in the imitation of Christ it must ever have its moral ideal,—in the suppression of self and submission to the will of Christ it must ever manifest its essential spirit. But God in Humanity is the spiritual centre of Free Religion, which thus has its cornerstone in universal human nature, its characteristic institution in a free and republican commonwealth, its fellowship in the great brotherhood of man, its social ideal in the complete development of society, its moral ideal in the complete development of the individual, its fundamental spirit in a self-respect which is at once profound faith in man and profound faith in the indwelling God. Am I not right in calling this the higher and diviner faith? From our comparison of the two, it has become plain, I think, that, until the principle of authority can be reconciled with the principle of freedom, there must exist a deep spiritual antagonism between them. The one must wane as the other waxes. The one must die that the other may live. I recognize the great services done to man by the Christian religion, I appreciate the peculiar beauty of the Christian character, I feel the mighty power of the Christian spirit; but I cannot conceal from myself that Christianity belongs to the childhood of the race and grows daily more out of harmony with advancing civilization. A deeper, broader, and higher faith is silently entering the heart of humanity.

If, out of all the sayings attributed to Jesus in the New Testament, I were asked to select that one which most profoundly utters the spirit of his religion, I should select these beautiful, gracious, and tender words:—“Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.” How many aching hearts and wounded spirits have taken upon them the easy yoke of Jesus, and found the promised rest! And how many more will find repose and peace in the same gentle bondage! If the free spirit could indeed wear a yoke,—if it could indeed purchase rest on such terms without forfeiting that spiritual independence which is its very life and breath,—then might it wear the easy yoke of Jesus. Once I rejoiced to wear it; but I can wear it no longer. The rest I need comes no longer from spiritual servitude, but must be sought and found in the manly exercise of spiritual freedom. It is to those who feel this Anglo-Saxon instinct of liberty stirring in their hearts, that my words are addressed,—not to those who feel no galling pressure from the easy yoke.

Long must it be before mankind as a whole shall emerge from the state of infancy, and assume the grave and earnest responsibilities of manhood. But a rapidly increasing number begin to be conscious that the mother's tender care of her child cannot last forever,—that the submission of discipleship, even to the wisest and holiest Master, is unworthy of the greatness of mature humanity. It is easier to accept the law of another than to be a law to myself. Yet until I dare assume the sovereignty of my own mind and heart,—dare to reign as undisputed monarch in the empire of my own soul,—dare to trust the insights of my own conscience, in utter forgetfulness of other insights and other voices,—I must remain an unweaned infant in all spiritual things. Manhood must endure cares and doubts, sadness and isolation, from which the happy dependency of childhood is still exempt; but growth is the universal law of life, and it ill befits the man to cling too fondly to the guiding hand. Guides to ourselves, lords of our own souls, law-givers and judges in the court of our own conscience, must we consent to be, on pain of lingering in the nursery when God summons us to put on our harness in the great battle of life.

These, my friends, are the reasons why, in no defiant or reckless spirit, I am inwardly constrained to announce the higher truth and diviner life of Free Religion.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—“I notice to-day that the Liberal Christian is down on THE INDEX. As usual, it blows hot and cold—chiefly cold. It manifests fear of THE INDEX. THE INDEX is just what a large class are in need of. . . .

P. S. —lost the first number of THE INDEX. His brother took it from the office, and his wife burned it. I let him have mine. Can you send me one?”

—“Right glad am I of the opportunity to subscribe for your paper. I fully sympathize with its purpose, as expressed in your Prospectus.”

—“I feel that it is my duty to encourage the dissemination of the principles contained in your Prospectus; they are grand.”

—“Your topics for discussion are live and vital ones. Let us stop this sentimentalism about Jesus and this leaking-out of conscience through ‘double senses!’ Welcome to your weekly.”

—“I received last week, from somebody, a Prospectus of THE INDEX. I am greatly pleased with it. It promises almost my ideal of a religious paper. Let me quote some points of the Prospectus that especially meet my approval: ‘It will put faith in ideas and work for them openly.’ ‘Its only policy will be strong thought and plain speech.’ ‘It will neither seek nor shun to shock the religious nerve.’ ‘It will aim to be just to Christianity.’ ‘It will pay no deference to the authority of the Bible, the Church or the Christ.’ ‘Every phase of earnest thought shall have a fair chance to be heard.’ ‘No pains will be spared to make the paper strong and scholarly, yet intelligible and interesting to all earnest minds.’

I trust that you will not fail to make the paper one to which the adjectives I have underscored shall be applicable. . . . I want to take this opportunity of telling you of my grateful appreciation of the manly position you have taken in regard to Christianity; a position so valuable as an example to the timid and truckling, and so encouraging to us who are a little oppressed and overborne by the riches and respectability, the number and clamor of those ‘who stand up for Jesus.’”

—“I am glad to know of your intended publication. Your position is the advanced one of the times. Our American sun shines bright as of yore, and its rays have as much warmth and light as ever. The everywhere-present God gives us light and joy. The old Stage Coaches have done us good service in our past travels. Our telegraphs remind us of a subtle power in Nature. Steam gives us quick communication. Pastoral Palestine has had our youthful thoughts; Republican America now claims our attention. Religion and Government are as nearly allied as the sexes. All the forces in nature retain their potency. Human nature needs not the embodiment of all its virtues in one man, as a sampler. A diffused humanity is the best preserver of society. Education of head, heart, and hand is necessary to the full development of Man.”

—“Please send me some Prospectuses of THE INDEX. I have long known you by reputation, and feel in full sympathy with you, and my heart is in the cause of the liberal religion you preach. There is a field ripe for such reapers in this great Northwest, and I hope, now that you are nearer than formerly, your influence here may be more felt; and, if you can, send some liberal teacher up this way. I will try and raise a club for THE INDEX; have the promise of one subscription besides my own already. May the success you deserve attend you in all your efforts in this direction.”

—“I need hardly say that my heart goes out to you; that I rejoice in your welcome to Toledo, and that I believe you are going to help a great deal in the work of reorganizing Religion and Theology. We are in Chaos now; how the Cosmos is to be built, nobody seems able to say. I suppose it never will be built; it will grow. It will not be architecture, but organism. I try to grow myself, to be plastic to the organizing spirit, and comfort myself for my lack of ability to construct.”

—“I have just opened my December Radical, which tells me that you are about starting a new weekly paper, and, judging from what I have read of your writings in the Radical, I know it will be just what I want. Your address before the Free Religious Association expresses my sentiments fully, and I feel very thankful that such teachers as you are raised up to give light and comfort to darkened minds.”

LOCAL NOTICES.

On Sunday next, at 10½ A. M., Mr. Abbot will deliver his concluding lecture on SOCRATES at the church of the Independent Society. The public are invited.

On Monday evening, at 7½ o'clock, the Radical Club of Toledo will meet in the same place. Subject of discussion:—“Should the Legal Oath be abolished?”

Mrs. M. J. Barker has kindly consented to act as Agent for THE INDEX, and will call on our city subscribers in person to receive their subscriptions.

A CARD.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

I.
ON THE WING.

Through silent realms of upper air
I wing my tireless flight;
I laugh at weariness and care;
I triumph in my might.

On pinions broad, with sinews strong,;
I soar through azure space;
To me these boundless fields belong,—
The birth-right of my race.

O'er vale and mountain, land and sea,
I sweep with piercing sight;
I bathe in sunshine full and free,—
I hail the morning light.

Earthward the gathering lightnings flash,
The surly thunders growl;
I see the storm-clouds charge and crash,
I hear the tempest's howl.

I brave the fury of the blast;
I mark its breadth and length;
And when the whirlwind wrath has passed,
Still glory in my strength.

My castle is the beetling crag;
My home the dizzy height;
My firm wings never tire nor lag,—
My birth, my kingly right.

With lofty scorn I downward gaze
On creeping man and beast;
With Jove I share his golden days
And his ambrosial feast.

II.
SURSUM CORDA.

On wings of faith and prayer and love
I speed my upward flight;
The earth beneath, the heavens above,
Hail the sweet morning light.

Through realms of earnest, lofty thought,
Which seers and sages knew,
I seek the Trine that Plato sought,
The Lovely, Good and True.

I greet the silence deep and grand,
The solitude profound,
The mystic, breezy Upper-Land
With Peace and Beauty crowned.

Beneath,—the war of angry sects,
The clash of hostile creeds;
Above,—the joy that love perfects,
The rest that strife succeeds.

Earth-bound, the millions toil and creep
Neath shadows cold and dense;
Spell-bound, earth's weary children sleep
Enthralled by brutish sense.

No more Tradition's husks and shells,—
The solemn altar's gloom,—
The ancient forms, the mystic spells,
The darkness of the tomb.

The truths that seers and prophets saw
Are choked by bigot-schools;
The majesty of righteous Law
Defied by Mammon's tools.

No more for me the weary strife,
The chains by fashion wrought;
Not here the soul's perennial life,—
The springs of happy thought.

Up, Heart! and seek the shining rays
That flood the azure height,—
God's mountain-tops and golden days,
Freedom and Strength and Light!

FOES OF SOCIETY.—The most deadly of all the foes that society has is the pharisee, the man who thinks himself, believes himself, and calls himself good; the church-member, the man of supreme piety, the elect person, the particular friend of Christ and of God, who claims a private interest in the Father above, and believes that he has been singled out for the choicest place in the Kingdom of God. He is the believer; he knows; he is in God's secret; he has made his calling and election sure. He keeps the law; he is perfect in the commandments; he never fails, or falters, or slips; he is a judge on the earth.—O. B. Frothingham.

The Index.

JANUARY 29, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

The "Fifty Affirmations" were intended to occupy our first page during the publication of the present series of discourses, of which two remain to be printed. They will then be discontinued. Presenting as they do a bird's-eye view of the entire ground covered by these discourses, it was thought best to retain them in each number, in order to give chance-readers a fair conception of the argument as a whole. They explain, and are explained by, the single discourses.

Mr. William H. Herndon, of Springfield, Illinois, the law-partner and intimate personal friend of President Lincoln for twenty years, has very kindly promised a communication to THE INDEX, describing Mr. Lincoln's religious views. No man in the country is so well qualified as Mr. Herndon to speak authoritatively on this most interesting subject. We await his testimony with great interest and expectation.

To-day is the one hundred and thirty-third anniversary of the birth of THOMAS PAINE,—a man to whose memory America and the world owe a debt of unspeakable gratitude. Theological hatred has too long covered with obloquy a name that is synonymous with love of liberty and unselfish devotion to human welfare. In another column will be found a statement of his religious opinions, given in his own words; and next week we shall publish extracts from the writings of eminent men, showing that the sedulous slanders so widely disseminated have not wholly succeeded in their malicious ends.

The New York Independent sharply and deservedly rebukes the "clerical editors" of the Liberal Christian for their recent assault on the reputation of a brother clergyman. If there is a man in this country utterly above the suspicion of proclaiming or entertaining "free love" sentiments, that man is O. B. Frothingham. But let the Independent speak for itself:—

"We would not set down aught in malice against them; but, really, we can't help thinking that when, without taking a moment's time for investigation or inquiry, they attributed to Mr. Frothingham (a man personally known to them all for the purity of his life and the nobleness of his aims) the demoralizing and disgusting sentiments described in the words 'free love,' upon no better evidence than a bungling Bohemian newspaper report of a sermon, they allowed themselves to do an act so unbrotherly, that it is difficult to account for it without suspecting the presence of an unfriendly motive. If, instead of Mr. Frothingham, it had been some eminent conservative minister whose sermon was thus misrepresented, we believe the Liberal Christian, instead of 'eagerly' assuming the truth of the report, would have promptly stigmatized it as a slander."

Solitude is to the soul what sleep is to the body,—a season of revival for exhausted energies.

Conscience is the soul's looking-glass. If you would be beautiful in your own eyes, keep it clean.

ROMISH AND AMERICAN EDUCATION.

Mr. Lecky, in his admirable "History of European Morals," refers to "the contrast between the system of education usually adopted by the Catholic priesthood, which has for its pre-eminent object to prevent sins and for its means a constant and minute supervision, and the English system of public schools, which is certainly not the most fitted to guard against the possibility of sin, or to foster any very delicate scrupulosity of feeling; but is intended, and is popularly supposed to secure, the healthy expansion of every variety of capacity."

The profound contrast, briefly stated but not fully developed by Mr. Lecky, between the system of education which aims negatively at the prevention of sin, and the system of education which aims positively at the integral culture of human nature, lies at the bottom of the present controversy respecting the reading of the Bible in our public schools. The one system is Romish, the other is (or will be) American. Between the two we are called upon to choose. The one aims at saintliness, the other at manliness. The one proposes to fit children for heaven, the other proposes to fit them for earth. The one seeks to make angels, the other seeks to make citizens. Which shall it be?

That is the question, reduced to its lowest terms.

Romanism schemes to confiscate all the resources of mankind to the Church; and the Church means to use them in fitting mankind for heaven. There is a terrible sincerity about Catholicism which is the secret of its terrible power. It is professed, doubtless, by many ecclesiastics for the sake of their personal pride, luxury or ambition; many of the leaders are unquestionably corrupt. But the great body of the Catholic clergy are as unselfish as they are earnest. Thorough belief in the everlasting perdition of sinners necessarily creates such terror of the consequences of sin,—nay, such horror at the intrinsic heinousness of sin,—that to escape sin becomes the supreme object of human life; and this thorough belief exists in the mind of every honest priest. The Catholic conception of the dreadfulness of sin is strikingly expressed in Newman's "Anglican Difficulties," quoted by Mr. Lecky:—"The Church holds that it were better for sun and moon to drop from heaven, and for all the many millions who are upon it to die of starvation in extremest agony, so far as temporal affliction goes, than that one soul, I will not say should be lost, but should commit one single venial sin, should tell one wilful untruth, though it harmed no one, or steal one poor farthing without excuse." With this conception of the unutterable enormity of sin, and belief in the eternal agony it causes, the Catholic Church necessarily makes avoidance of sin the great object of life,—singularly enough, thus reproducing the negative ideal of the heathen poet Horace, who wrote,—"Virtue is to shun vice, and the chief wisdom is to be without folly." (Epist. I, I, 41.)

These earnest and deep convictions are the cause of the hostility of all thorough-going Romanists to our system of free schools. They are seeking to demolish it,—no doubt about that. Salvation from sin and its consequences after death being the chief end of man, and salvation being impossible outside the pale of the Church, "godless schools" (i. e. all schools in which the Catholic faith is not dogmatically taught) are an abomination in Catholic eyes. The only schools they can consistently favor must be the direct feeders of the Church. It is idle to blame the priests for this, or to charge them with evil motives,—the fault is not in them, but in their system. They do but carry out, with an energy that puts to shame the milk-and-water-ism of Protestant Christianity, the fundamental principles of their faith. They cannot, and will not, if they ever get the power, tolerate a free and unsectarian school on this continent. All the efforts of the Roman priesthood are bent to the one object of destroying, root and branch, the American system of education.

The American system of education, however, which aims at the complete development of the mind, is not yet perfected, because it is still partially based on Protestant ideas. It ought to be unsectarian,—but it is not. It ought to be undogmatic,—but it is not. The Bible is the flag of the Protestant sects, the symbol of Protestant dogmas; and so long as its public reading is enjoined in the schools, they are sectarian and dogmatic to that extent. The real issue is between ecclesiastical education and secular education,—between schools based on submission to priestly authority and schools based on the necessity and right of free mental development. Protestant schools recognize each of these contradictory principles in part, encouraging unreasoning faith in the Bible and unfettered thought on all other subjects. They build up with one hand and tear down with the other. They enslave the mind in half its faculties, and emancipate it in the rest. They bind the intellect down to fixed conclusions in certain directions, and bid it roam unshackled in all others. Hence there is no clean issue between the Catholic and Protestant systems of education. The only real issue is between the Roman system as it is and the American system as it will be. Either train the mind to accept truth absolutely discovered, or else teach it to discover truth for itself,—either sell the whole soul to the Church, or qualify it to work out its destiny freely in the world. There is no alternative between these two courses that will stand the test of reflection or of experience. It is, therefore, no “question” at all whether we shall keep the Bible in the schools or not. The question is, shall we make education ecclesiastical or secular? If we are to make it ecclesiastical, let us do this thoroughly, and adopt the Romish system. But if we are to make it secular, let us do this with equal thoroughness, and perfect the American system. Haul down the flag of Protestantism at all events, and raise the flag either of Romish Authority, or American Freedom.

We are amazed that any clear mind should be in doubt as to the justice or injustice of keeping the Bible in the schools. Judge Stallo, in his masterly argument before the Superior Court of Cincinnati, has shown that the compulsory reading of the Bible in the public schools is as much a symbol of Protestantism as the compulsory making the sign of the cross would be a symbol of Catholicism. In a country like ours, inhabited by citizens of all beliefs, the essential injustice consists in retaining any such symbol in schools supported by the equal taxation of the whole population. This is the real grievance. The enjoined use of the Bible in the schools lends the moral influence of the State to the Protestant faith; and that is why Protestants contend for it. They are loth to part with power, whether justly or unjustly theirs. Catholics and Jews protest against a State favoritism shown to a creed not their own; intelligent free-thinkers protest against a State favoritism shown to any creed whatever. The State is secular, and must have nothing to do with creeds, beyond securing to all believers perfect freedom to enjoy their individual belief. This is the answer to the following specious plea of a Presbyterian clergyman of Cincinnati, Rev. W. C. McCune;—

“The infidel’s child is not wronged by the Bible being read to him, for his child by the rule is excused. The infidel is not wronged—his child is not wronged by Bible reading, because neither is compelled to hear. How are the rights of his conscience invaded? Let us carefully inquire, how? By the Bible being read to his Christian neighbor’s child in the Common Schools. His conscience decides that it is not enough that his child be excused, but, further, the Bible shall not be read to any child. Here is tenderness of conscience for you. The infidel’s conscience decides not merely that he has a right to control his own child, but that he has a right to control my child, too, in this business. Call that a decision of his conscience if you will, but do not call it a right of his conscience, I pray you, in this land of civil and religious liberty.”

Yes,—that is the grievance, well stated in the words we have italicized. To read the Bible, as an exercise prescribed by law, IN THE COMMON SCHOOLS, is to give the countenance of the State, to that extent, to the Protestant faith. It is the violation of a great principle, not the actual amount of oppression, which constitutes the grievance. A penny tax on tea was the cause of the American Revolution; was it no grievance? Who would not rather lose ten dollars than be cheated of a cent? It is the consciousness of a public injustice that calls forth the protest of the free-thinker, while it is a conscientious objection to the free-school system that calls forth that of the Catholic. For different reasons, enjoined Bible-reading in free schools is a grievance to both; and therefore they have united in denouncing it. But when the Catholic calls for a division of the school funds, and an appropriation of public money to his own sectarian institutions, he will find himself sternly confronted by his late ally. The issue is between sectarian schools and free schools,—make it a clean one by wiping out the last stain of sectarianism from the American system. Clear the decks for action, and then let the conflict come. The sooner, the better. Rome is attacking America on her own soil,—but only to conquer the invader’s grave. Feeble, vacillating and particolored Protestantism will best consult her own interests by getting out of the way of the real combatants,—WHICH ARE CHRISTIANITY AND FREE RELIGION.

PROGRESS.—The doors are beginning to open. At last, the Michigan State University, located at Ann Arbor, has voted through its regents to admit women to its halls on precisely the same terms as men, and thus settle a question that has been long pending. Before Ex-President Haven left for the Northwestern University he recommended that the experiment be tried. The matter has been discussed very generally throughout the State of Michigan by the journals, and in all the circles which take an interest in educational matters, widely different views being put forward. Michigan University is the first large and really first-class institution in this country which has opened its doors to women. “It is the first step that costs.” We shall be much mistaken if this movement do not prove to be the removal of the key-stone from the arch of a false system, and our first-class colleges will no longer bar women from their halls, and the whole system of exclusive male colleges will speedily crumble. “Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time,” etc.—Woman’s Journal.

LETTER FROM T. A. BLAND.

INDIANAPOLIS, Jan 18, 1870.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—You cannot know how much I rejoice at the establishment of THE INDEX. Having spent my whole life in the West, I appreciate the wants of its people, and know that just such a paper as yours has long been one of them. At this time it is among the imperative needs of the country. The religious element was never so active as now; the conscience of the people under the guidance of reason is asserting its prerogative as never before; but along with this growth comes the protest of individuality against the despotism of theology, and the tyranny of the priesthood with their sectarian organizations. The earnest, thinking men and women of the West are ready for the free religious movement, and will give it a cordial support, wherever its standard is raised. There are thousands still in the churches who are as radical as any outside, too radical to fall in with “Liberal Christianity,” which they justly regard as a kind of cowardly compromise between slavery and freedom. I am personally acquainted with quite a number of this class who say, “I remain in the church for social reasons, and because the authorities do not interfere with my freedom of conscience, though they know I do not believe the creed of the sect. When the social advantages I enjoy here are offered by an organization based upon common sense, I shall gladly walk out of the narrow portals of the old on to the broad platform of the new society.” There are other thousands who for years have felt called upon to bear the cross of individual freedom, who yet feel the need of association, if association can be had without impinging upon personal freedom. To this class, I belong; and I speak from personal experience in saying that it is not pleasant or good for men to stand alone. Human sympathy is most delicious food for the soul, without which it cannot have a complete and harmonious development. I therefore congratulate the people of Toledo on the establishment of a free society, and thank them and you for sending forth THE INDEX.

Yours, Fraternally,

T. A. BLAND.

THE RELIGIOUS BELIEF OF THOMAS PAINE.

We are near the anniversary of the birth-day of Thomas Paine, which was the twenty-ninth day of January in the year 1737. It would be a pleasant task to review briefly his career as author, statesman, and philanthropist, and especially to dwell with grateful eulogy upon his distinguished services to the cause of American liberty, and thus of mankind. Let us hope that the inestimable value of these services will be more and more widely and appropriately recognized and remembered as year after year shall bring the twenty-ninth of January. My purpose, however, is to call attention to the religious belief of Thomas Paine. While most intelligent persons understand what he did not believe, but denied, too few know what he did believe and affirmed, as to matters of religion. In a broad, general way, his political and religious opinions were indicated by the noble words, “The World is my Country; to do good my Religion.” But that he also held a belief in God and immortality, and deduced therefrom the moral duty of man to do good, and that only, to his fellows, the following extracts from the “Age of Reason,”—the first part of which was written while Paine was imprisoned in a French dungeon, and in peril of his life,—will show:

“But some, perhaps, will say,—‘Are we to have no word of God—no revelation?’ I answer, yes; there is a word of God; there is a revelation. The word of God is the Creation we behold; and it is in this word, which no human invention can counterfeit or alter, that God speaketh universally to man.” (page 30.)

“It is only in the Creation that all our ideas and conceptions of a word of God can unite. The Creation speaketh in universal language, independently of human speech or human languages, multiplied and various as they be. It is an ever-existing original, which every man can read. It cannot be forged; it cannot be counterfeited; it cannot be lost; it cannot be altered; it cannot be suppressed. It does not depend upon the will of man whether it shall be published or not; it publishes itself from one end of the earth to the other. It preaches to all nations and all worlds; and this word of God reveals to man all that is necessary for man to know of God. Do we want to contemplate his power? We see it in the immensity of the Creation. Do we want to contemplate his wisdom? We see it in the unchangeable order by which the incomprehensible whole is governed. Do we want to contemplate his munificence? We see it in the abundance with which he fills the earth. Do we want to contemplate his mercy? We see it in his not withholding that abundance even from the unthankful. In fine, do we want to know what God is? Search not the book called the Scripture, which any hand might make, but the Scripture called the Creation.” (pages 30, 31, 32.)

• “Could a man be placed in a situation, and endowed with the power of vision, to behold at one view, and to contemplate deliberately, the structure of the universe; to mark the movements of the several planets, the cause of their varying appearances, the unerring order in which they revolve, even to the remotest comet; their connections and dependence on each other, and to know the system of laws established by the Creator that governs and regulates the whole; he would then conceive far beyond what any church theology can teach him, the power, the wisdom, the vastness, the munificence of the creation; he would then see, that all the knowledge man has of science, and that all the mechanical arts by which he renders his situation comfortable here are derived from that source; his mind, exalted by the scene, and convinced by the fact, would increase in gratitude as it increased in knowledge; his religion or his worship would become united with his improvement as a man; any employment he followed that had connection with the principles of the creation,—as everything of agriculture, of science, and of the mechanical arts, has,—would teach him more of God, and of the gratitude he owes to him, than any theological, Christian sermon he now hears. Great objects inspire great thoughts; great munificence excites great gratitude; but the grovelling tales of the Bible and Testament are fit only to excite contempt." (page 198.)

"The Almighty lecturer, by displaying the principles of science in the structure of the universe, has invited man to study and to imitation. It is as if he had said to the inhabitants of this globe that we call ours,—I have made an earth for man to dwell upon, and I have rendered the starry heavens visible, to teach him science and the arts. He can now provide for his own comfort, and learn from my munificence to all be kind to each other." (page 41.)

"It is certain that, in one point, all nations of the earth and all religions agree; all believe in a God; the things in which they disagree, are the redundancies annexed to that belief." Adam, if ever there was such a man, was created a Deist. (pages 71, 72.)

"The only idea that man can affix to the name of God, is that of a first cause, the cause of all things. And, incomprehensible and difficult as it is for a man to conceive what a first cause is, he arrives at the belief of it, from the tenfold greater difficulty of disbelieving it. It is difficult beyond description to conceive that space can have no end; but it is more difficult to conceive an end. In like manner of reasoning, everything we behold carries in itself the internal evidence that it did not make itself. Every man is an evidence to himself that he did not make himself; neither could his father make himself, nor his grandfather, nor any of his race; neither could any tree, plant, or animal, make itself; and it is the conviction arising from this evidence, that carries us on, as it were, by necessity, to the belief of a first cause, eternally existing, of a nature totally different to any material existence we know of, and by the powers of which all things exist; and this first cause man calls God." (pages 32, 33.)

"Religion, therefore, being the belief of a God, and the practice of moral truth, cannot have connection with mystery. The belief of a God, so far from having anything of mystery in it, is of all beliefs the most easy, because it arises to us, as is before observed, out of necessity. And the practice of moral truth, or, in other words, a practical imitation of the moral goodness of God, is no other than our acting towards each other as he acts benignly towards all. We cannot serve God in the manner we serve those who cannot do without such service; and, therefore, the only idea we can have of serving God, is that of contributing to the happiness of the living creation that God has made. This cannot be done by retiring ourselves from the society of the world, and spending a reclusive life in selfish devotion." (page 63.)

"The moral duty of man consists in imitating the moral goodness and beneficence of God, manifested in the Creation towards all his creatures. . . . Seeing as we daily do the goodness of God to all men, it is an example calling upon all to practise the same towards each other; and, consequently, everything of persecution and revenge between man and man, and everything of cruelty to animals, is a violation of moral duty." (page 71.)

"I trouble not myself about the manner of future existence. I content myself with believing, even to positive conviction, that the power that gave me existence is able to continue it, in any form and manner he pleases, either with or without this body; and it appears more probable to me that I shall continue to exist hereafter, than that I should have had existence, as I now have, before that existence began." (page 71.)

I add, in conclusion, the words of Joel Barlow:—"As to his (Paine's) religious opinions, as they were those of probably three-fourths of the men of letters of the last age, and of nearly all those of the present, I see no reason why they should form a distinctive character in him." X.

MONEY.

It is doubtless very generally believed, especially by those who have given the subject but little thought, that an abundant supply of money is very desirable—for instance, a farmer who gets $3 per bushel for wheat imagines himself better able to pay $12 for a pair of boots than he would be to buy the same boots at $4 and sell his wheat for a dollar, and other things in like proportion. Of course, this is a delusion, because the cheapest money costs something, and the waste of labor is consequently about three times as much, in supplying a community with money enough to effect the exchanges upon the basis of $3 per bushel for wheat, as it would be if the price were $1. Every one who produces anything to sell necessarily contributes something towards paying the cost of the money used; therefore the most economical quantity is the least that will readily accomplish the various exchanges of the products of labor without creating a necessity for very small and inconvenient notes to use in payment for minor articles.

The object aimed at by our financial legislators—at least by those of them who favor a return to specie payments—is unquestionably a good one, i. e. "stability," "an unchangeable measure of exchangeable values." Does it follow that the medium of exchange must consist of a metallic currency? Would it not be just as consistent to say that, because a yard of our measure consists of an unvarying length (36 inches), the business of measuring cloths, calicoes, and muslins could be best and most economically done with a yard stick made of gold or silver? It is certainly high time that civilized nations recognized the fact that intelligent laborers work not for the money they expect to receive, but for some article for which they expect to give the money in exchange, such as a coat, a hat, or any of the almost innumerable things that help to make up the list of real or imaginary necessities of civilized human existence. It is plain, therefore, that the question of intrinsic value in money is not considered by laborers at all. If the marketable value of a day's labor, and a bushel of wheat, is one dollar for each; and other things bear corresponding prices—as they necessarily must do if the regulation of prices is left to be governed by supply and demand,—it is evident a laborer will readily accept in payment for his work anything (a paper dollar, for instance) that will exchange for a bushel of wheat or equal value of other articles. Nearly all domestic exchanges have been made for a number of years past, with paper money, drafts or checks; they would continue to be so made if there were not an ounce of gold or silver in the country. Our National Bank law is nearly perfect. Break up the present monopoly of circulation which the Banks have, authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue U. S. notes in unlimited quantity to any one who deposits the required security (which should doubtless consist of U. S. bonds bearing not more than 3 per cent. interest—such notes being exchangeable at par for such bonds at the option of the holder); add a clause or two authorizing free trade in banking and it is difficult to see what improvement could be made thereon. The currency would then contract or expand to meet the varying wants of commerce. What folly to suppose that a community will long keep in circulation more money than is needed to transact its business!

Having shown, as the writer thinks, that metal of any kind is not needed in effecting domestic exchanges; he fails to see why International notes—such as were mentioned in his former article—may not be exclusively used to adjust the comparatively small trade balances due from the citizens of one country or nation to those of another.

It is passing strange that an International Congress, composed of delegates from all civilized nations, has not ere this become a permanent institution of the nineteenth century. Certainly such a one is needed,—the delegates to hold office for life, unless removed for cause. Proper officers, chosen by such congress, might, if necessary, issue, in addition to certificates spoken of in the former article, 500 or 1,000,000.00 of international notes and distribute the same equitably among nations, in proportion to the population and commerce, to be exclusively used for adjusting balances of trade.

I must add a word in reference to the present supposed necessity for the issue of an additional 50,000,000 of currency to accommodate the wants of the South and West. If the people could but be made to realize the damaging effects to the legitimate business of the country occasioned by the illegitimate transactions in Wall St., and kindred sinks of iniquity, and give our representatives in Congress no peace until gambling contracts of all kinds were prohibited, they would be in better business than when urging the issue of more currency,—there is now plenty, if it were only properly used. But at present those engaged in legitimate pursuits are forced to take the financial leavings of the most reckless and dishonorable set of gamblers that ever any country was cursed with. No matter how good security is offered by a tradesman who wishes to borrow money for some specified time, a stock or gold gambler usually has preference in the market because he borrows on call,—the ring-leaders well knowing that they can so manipulate the financial wires (so called) as to squeeze an extra per centage out of the weaker ones. The result is that thousands of men, possessing the very best business talent in the country, are enticed away from useful occupations and join the already large number who produce nothing valuable, but are thenceforth, with very few and rare exceptions, absolutely supported in extravagant style, dined and wineed at the expense of useful labor for the remainder of their pauper lives, unless some of them commit forgery or other crime and, fortunately for society, get into the Penitentiary.

Demonetize metals, pass and rigidly enforce laws imposing severe penalties upon all gambling contracts, (chief among which sales of gold and stock, as now usually made at commercial and financial centres, may be classed) and the world will have made two long progressive strides in social science.

The New York Independent of January 13 says:—"Sir John Lubbock, in a paper presented to the Statistical Society, in 1865, showed that about 70 per cent. of banking transactions were settled through the London Clearing House without any use of money; that about 24 per cent. were settled by checks and bills, equally without the use of money; that nearly 5½ per cent. were settled by the use of bank notes, and a little more than ¼ per cent. settled in coin. This estimate was based upon the statistical history of 23 millions sterling which had passed through his bank in a few days; and was, moreover, submitted as a fair average of a general fact." Is it not greatly to be regretted that so many thousands of energetic hard-working men are literally wasting their lives to obtain an article which answers so few of the needs of humanity, and performs so very small a fraction of the exchanges of the products of labor?

J. STUART MILL'S TRIBUTE TO HIS WIFE.

Hon. S. S. Cox, in one of his letters to the New York World, thus describes the tomb which Mr. Mill had erected over the remains of his wife:—

"Through avenues of pine trees, hedged paths of arbor vite and roses, we walk toward the grave. Over it is a white marble sarcophagus, so pure it was of itself an emblem. There is perfect seclusion here. The tomb is hid in a covert of red and white English roses and honeysuckle, creeping over the pine trees, whose shade is dense. Some cypresses stand sentinels outside, in a loftier hedge of solemn green, and protect the tender flowering plants from the harsh winds. An orange tree and a palmier are on either side of the tomb; and on the right, under the umbrage of roses, is a rustic seat. Two gravelled paths, which lead to and from the tomb, and whose margins are enameled with flowers, are never disturbed save by the quiet walk of the philosopher and his step-daughter, or that of the pilgrim who makes it a shrine of kindred worship. The box and myrtle grow along these paths, and the pines and cypresses shield them, while the willow droops gracefully like a veil over the tomb. Fragrant with magnolia, eglantine, and honeysuckle; full of sweet music from many birds in the groves; solemnized by the many inscriptions denoting our mortality, and the love which survives it; and with a voice speaking of the 'resurrection and the life' in the hush of the holiest repose of the awed heart; this beautiful home of the wife of Stuart Mill is full of all that could reconcile life with death, and lift the soul above the sacrifices of time into the clear white light of eternity."

The tomb bears the following inscription:

To the Beloved Memory of HARRIET MILL,
the dearly beloved and deeply regretted wife of John Stuart Mill; her great and loving heart,
her noble soul,
her clear, powerful, original, and comprehensive intellect made her the guide and support, the instructor in wisdom,
and the example in goodness, as she was the sole earthly delight of those who had the happiness to belong to her;
as earnest for all public good as she was generous and devoted to all who surrounded her.
Her influence has been felt in many of the greatest improvements of the age, and will be in those still to come.
Were there even a few hearts and intellects like hers, this earth would already become the hoped-for heaven.
She died,
to the irreparable loss of those who survive her, at Avignon, November 3d, 1858.

THE UNITARIAN CRISIS.—The dismissal of the radical editor of the Unitarian paper in New York, followed up as it has been by several acts of equal significance, intimates the approach of a crisis in the history of that denomination. Long-suffering and forgiving as Dr. Bellows has seemed, his righteous indignation has burned the while, and at last it flames forth consumingly. He has looked on for three years and seen the reputed organ of his sect in New York carrying itself and its cause over into Rationalism. Though often sharply protesting, he has generally been believed to have a Pickwickian amiability, that, in the final trial, always got the better of his wrath, and converted what promised to be a rupture into a season of mutual congratulations. But his good nature was presumed on too far. He does really mean, it seems, not to be legislated nor editorialized out of Christianity. Under his management the paper has turned a square corner. In every department the tone is changed. From being a semi-official organ of the Radicals, it takes the lead as a champion of Christian Unitarianism. In the number for Dec. 18, is a long and elaborate statement of "The Unitarian Belief"—a creed of nine articles. With the exception of the article on Retribution—which, in a truly accommodating spirit, gives both the Universalist and the Partialist the benefit of its doubts—it is a very clear and unequivocally Christian confession of faith. In the next number is a warm, almost passionate, appeal from the Rev. Geo. H. Hepworth, for a "carefully prepared statement of our Unitarian faith." He wants a creed, and wants it ratified by "a large convention of our ministers and laymen." In his judgment the Unitarian Church languishes for lack of just this thing. These are remarkable manifestoes. If they can be trusted to mean what the same things would mean in any other church, the Unitarian body has begun to divide. If Dr. Bellows and his party in New York hold their paper to the line thus far indicated, the Radicals must inevitably go out from their communion. For the sake of the cause of Christ, shamefully dishonored by many recent acts of that church, we trust this will be the fact and the result. The novelty and difficulty of the task lends a special charm to it. What finer stoke of poetic justice than that Radicalism should be slain in the Unitarian temple!—The Universalist.

FREE RELIGION IN INDIA.

In last week's issue we reprinted a letter of Keshub Chunder Sen, the present able and zealous apostle of Hindu Theism, giving some account of the rise and development of that native reform of Hindu religion. This week we propose to extract, from the publications of this reformed sect, certain passages which will show its theological and religious status. The sect does not have any formal creed, and does not lay down any doctrinal test of religious fellowship; yet the following synopsis of belief has been drawn by one of the members of the sect from various preachers and writers, and has been published in one of the Theistic tracts at Calcutta:

"I. The Book of Nature and Intuition form the basis of the Brahmaic faith.

II. Although the Brahmoes do not consider any book written by man as the basis of their religion, yet they do accept with respect and pleasure any truth contained in any book.

III. The Brahmoes believe that the religious condition of man is progressive, like the other parts of his condition in this world.

IV. They believe that the fundamental doctrines of their religion are at the basis of every religion followed by man.

V. They believe in the existence of One Supreme God,—a God endowed with a distinct personality, moral attributes equal to His nature, and intelligence befitting the governor of the universe,—and they worship Him, and Him alone. They do not believe in His incarnations.

VI. They believe in the immortality and progressive state of the soul, and declare that there is a state of conscious existence succeeding life in this world, and supplementary to it as respects the action of the universal moral government.

VII. They believe that repentance is the only way to atonement and salvation. They do not recognize any other mode of reconciliation to the offended but loving Father.

VIII. They pray for spiritual welfare and believe in the efficacy of such prayers.

IX. They believe in the Providential care of the Divine Father.

X. They avow that love towards Him, and performing the works He loveth, constitute His worship.

XI. They recognize the necessity of public worship, but do not believe that they cannot hold communion with the great Father without resorting to any fixed place at any fixed time. They maintain that we can adore Him at any time and at any place, provided that time and that place are calculated to compose and direct the mind towards Him.

XII. They do not believe in "pilgrimages," but declare that holiness can only be attained by elevating and purifying the mind.

XIII. They do not perform any rites or ceremonies, or believe in penances, as instrumental in obtaining the grace of God. They declare that moral righteousness, the gaining of wisdom, divine contemplation, charity, and the cultivation of devotional feelings, are their rites and ceremonies. They further say, govern and regulate your feelings, discharge your duties to God and to man, and you will gain everlasting blessedness; purify your heart, cultivate devotional feelings, and you will see Him who is unseen.

XIV. Theoretically, there is no distinction of caste among the Brahmoes. They declare that we are all the children of God, and therefore must consider ourselves as brothers and sisters."

We extract the following from a little

Manual of the Brahmo Somaj, entitled "TRUE FAITH:"—

"Faith is direct vision; it beholdeth God, and it beholdeth immortality.

It is no dogma of books, no tradition of venerable antiquity.

It neither borroweth an idea of God from metaphysics nor a narrative of God from history.

It adareth the ever-living and ever-present Reality. The God of faith is the sublime I AM. In time He is always Now, in space always Here.

Hence faith has a short creed which owns no pilgrimage to distant age or clime, for nearer than aught can be is God, the immortal Spirit.

When the heart is fixed on God and immortality, and perceiveth its relation to both, it devoteth itself to the one and prepareth itself for the other.

Thus faith ever striveth after righteousness, for righteousness is the true service of God and the provision of immortality.

And as the law of righteousness is absolute and immutable, even as the will of the Supreme Governor, Faith upholdeth it in its integrity and fulness.

It despiseth compromise and hateth fractional religion, which divideth its service between God and Mammon.

And with the unswerving fidelity of a covenant, it followeth in all circumstances that which is right and abjureth what is wrong.

Faith rejoiceth in the All Blissful God, and findeth joy immeasurable in His service.

It is ever calm, and is not ruffled by the fluctuations of fickle fortune.

It is the deep full ocean of peace, and doth never ebb.

Though midnight gloom surrounds it, it enjoyeth within meridian sunshine.

With forbearance and resignation it blunteth the edge of sorrow.

With hope and patience it converteth the bed of thorns into the bed of roses.

It is impervious to the darts of penury, for its riches are the treasures of grace.

Even on death-beds it looketh bright and cheerful as an angel, and besetting clouds do but add to its beauty and glory.

Faith is the surrender of self to God.

It selleth all that it hath and followeth God, and reserveth naught for self.

It dedicateth the whole life, heart and soul, mind and body, unto Him, and saith, Not my will, but Thy will be done.

But the maturity of faith is love; for love completeth the union which faith beginneth.

Then duty and desire harmonize.

Then the soul saith, The Father and I are one."

The following "Congregational Prayer" shows that "Theism," at least in India, can pray:—

"We thank thee, O beneficent God, that thou hast gathered us again in this sacred place of worship to glorify and adore thee. * * * O thou Light and Love, thou art everywhere; thou art before our eyes in all the objects we behold, thou dwellest in the inmost recesses of the heart. Everywhere is thy benignant face, and thy loving arms are around us all. Help us so to concentrate our souls in thy all-pervading spirit, so to feel thy holiness and purity, that each corrupt desire, each worldly craving may perish, and all the sentiments and feelings of the soul may be brought at thy feet. May not the pleasures we now enjoy in thy company be transitory; may they sweeten our whole lives, and continue to endure thee to us everlastingly. Vouchsafe to keep us always under the shadow of thy protection, and guide our steps in the thorny paths of the world. Amidst the woes and sufferings of the world be thou our joy; amidst its darkness be thou our light; amidst its temptations and persecutions be thou our shield and armor. Promote amongst us good will and affection, sanctify our dealings with each other, and bind us into a holy brotherhood. May we aid each other in doing and loving that which is good in thy sight. Teach us, O Lord, to spend all our days in thy service, and aspire to be partakers of the rich blessings and lasting joys of the next world. Be with us always, thou affectionate Father, and enable us to grow steadily in thy love. Bring all men under the protection of true faith. May thy dear name be chanted by every lip, and mayst thou find a temple in every breast. And unto thee we ascribe everlasting glory and praise."

The Brahmo Somaj not only represents religious, but social and moral reform. It is working for the abolition of the caste distinctions which have so many centuries fettered and depressed Hindu civilization. It encourages and solemnizes intermarriages between persons of different castes; throws away the badges which distinguishes the Brahmin from the Sudra (the high-born from the peasant-born); labors earnestly for the elevation of women, and for the intellectual and moral education of the young; and studies generally to show its faith by good works. The following testimony on this point is taken from a brief sketch of the Brahmo Somaj, printed in Calcutta:—

"The exertions of Keshub Chunder Sen and his friends have been also directed towards the amelioration of the much deplorable condition of the women of Bengal. Many a gentle woman has been already unshackled from the thralldom of debasing superstition and idolatry. These ladies, instead of spending their time like their sisters and mothers in idle gossip, childish amusements, or in slandering people, now devote their leisure hours to reading, writing, needle-work, and such-like useful employments. Some of them have already composed (in Bengalee) admirable poetical lines and beautiful sentences in prose.

The Brahmoes have conferred another moral advantage on their countrymen. They direct the attention of many youths coming out from colleges and schools, by Sunday lectures, to the highest interests of man, and thus try to save them from the path of vice and corruption, to which, alas, their wayward brothers are not unfrequently led."

There are two journals published in the interest of this reformed faith, the Indian Mirror at Calcutta, and the Hindu Reformer at Bombay. In a recent issue of the latter paper is an earnest article deprecating the increase of the vice of intemperance, which has been brought into the country with the "Christian civilization" of great Britain, to the over-coming of the native sobriety of the people. The article discusses very intelligently the remedies for the evil, but expects no aid from the State, since "alcohol and its compounds are by national habit and social customs far from being obnoxious articles to our rulers, and consequently they cannot be expected to set aside their free-trade principles in order to put down the traffic in these articles."

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

VOLTAIRE'S CONFESSION OF FAITH.

EXTRACTED FROM HIS LETTER TO J. J. ROUSSEAU.

"I adore one God, the Creator, a being of infinite wisdom that will punish and reward. A universal God, and not the God of one particular nation, province, or sect. I love him and serve him as well as I am able, in men, my fellow creatures, and his children. But I do not believe that he prefers one people or sect to another. His true temple is the heart of a good man. We are more concerned to imitate his goodness and mercy than to assemble on certain days for the purpose of informing him in a song that he is good and merciful. Every one who loves mankind and his country, who cherishes his wife, who educates his children wisely, and does justice, who comforts the miserable, who relieves the poor, who is no bigot, serves God as he himself requires, and fulfils the law. Vice, knavery, and slander are the only impieties I know of. I firmly believe that every just man believes in God. I believe that God is a good king who desires his subjects to be honest men, and nothing more. I steadfastly believe that our common Parent will save honest Catholics, honest Protestants, honest Turks, and honest Indians. I admit of final causes in the system of Providence. And I humbly believe that for some good end, of which I profess myself to be entirely ignorant, highwaymen are permitted to rob, and wasps to sting. I am of opinion that it is my privilege to examine, with modesty, what is called Revelation. And I pity those Governments that burn either men or books. I believe in God with all my soul, and in the Christian religion with all my might.
"Man, who seems the most unhappy being in creation, is born, lives, and dies in pain. Priests and doctors corrupt his infancy, embitter and delude his manhood, and besiege him in his old age; they make him die in a sneaking, cowardly way, and pursue him even in the other world. Some call this religion; for my part I call it madness. Priests are not calculated to make us happy in this world or the next. I hope to die nobly and with confidence. None but a vile slave would fear to meet a good master. I esteem mine too highly to fear his presence. No external expiation can justify the sinner, though he were plunged over head and ears in consecrated water, or covered with cow-dung like the Indians about the Ganges, or stuck with nails like the Brahmins. But a good man shall see God and be happy, though he have worshipped all the amulets of the Negroes, or the divine marmots of the Bonzes. Oh God! who seest my heart and understanding, pardon my offences, as I pardon those that offend me; and grant that I may always serve thee in my fellow creatures. Finally, I believe that the sun may shine at noon-day, and a blind man know nothing about the matter."—Investigator.

EDWIN M. STANTON.—The Boston Transcript publishes the following letter from Mrs. Anna Griswold Bolling:—

"My son, Col. Griswold, of the 56th Massachusetts, had perished in the terrible battle of the Wilderness; and his favorite officers, who were mangled in battle, were objects of intense interest with me. Second Lieutenant Crone, one of my son's most efficient officers, had lost his left arm, and after great bodily suffering and mental torture, on account of his inability to provide for a bright and interesting little family—the loss of his arm unfitting him to labor at the trade to which he had been accustomed, and which he had surrendered to take up arms for his adopted country—he came to me, one day, more depressed than I had ever seen him. I had witnessed his sufferings before his wound was healed; I knew the high estimation in which my son had held him. I knew his lovely family; and while he sat with me, I said to myself, 'I will go to Washington and see what I can do.' In less than twenty-four hours I was on my lonely way. My son had a very dear friend in Washington. To that dear friend I went. He gave me a letter to General ———, through whom he deemed it best that I should approach Mr. Stanton; gave me excellent advice, and such instructions as a novice needed; and warned me that some persons found Mr. Stanton cold and inaccessible, not to say brusque. He escorted me to the War Office and left me to my fate. My letter brought General ——— to me. My card brought the Secretary, who took a seat by me and bent those fine eyes upon me in a way that made my heart beat very quickly. I had committed to memory my little tale, and was speaking in what I felt was a very constrained way, and was, in fact, scarcely conscious of what I was saying, when he interrupted me with the question, 'What do you wish me to do, madam?' My set speech vanished; and, coming to myself, I told the story in simple and impassioned words, even to the end, and asked for a 2d Lieutenantancy in the Invalid Corps for my son's officer and friend. A second time Mr. Stanton spoke. 'Why do you not ask for something higher, madam?' Affected to tears by this question, I asked with much agitation, 'May I do so, Mr. Stanton?' He paused an instant; then taking my hand, he said, with great kindness, 'I give you a 1st lieutenantancy for your poor friend's sake, and I give you a captaincy for your gallant son's sake. I have heard of him.'"

THE STANTON FUND.—We see it stated in many papers that the sum of $100,000 is likely to be all subscribed and soon paid over to the widow of Secretary Stanton. While living, he steadily refused to receive any pecuniary aid from his friends in consideration of his public services, being determined to support his family by his own efforts; but, now that he has left his wife and children in comparative poverty, it is only just that the citizens of the country he did so much to serve should place them in independent circumstances.—The Independent.

NOBLE.—A salesman in a dry goods store at Kansas City, Mo., the other day observed a pale, attenuated, and apparently sorrow-stricken woman concealing a bundle of laces under her shawl. Very quietly, and without attracting the attention of a single eye in the store, the salesman said to her, "I am not able to pay for the lace under your shawl, or you might keep it and welcome. Please put it back, while I walk to the other end of the counter." Large tears came into the woman's haggard eyes, her whole face expressed gratitude, and without a word she put the lace back and walked out of the store.—Exchange.

BROOKLYN.—The Third Unitarian Society of this city, under the charge of Rev. Mr. Camp, is prospering finely. On the evening of the first Sunday of the year it observed, for the first time, the rite of the Lord's Supper. The Sunday school, connected with the church, steadily grows in number and interest, and its monthly concerts are very successful.—Liberal Christian.

There is a tradition in Harvard College that the officiating clergyman once prayed at morning prayers, that "the inefficient may be made efficient, the imtemperate temperate, and the industrious dustrious."

The gold pulse, which ran up to a fever height during the war, is coming down to a healthy point again. The national finances are decidedly convalescent. They've got a Bout well.—Boston Commonwealth.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of thirty-eight years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. The City of Toledo.

To Capitalists and Manufacturers.

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.
In 1850—3,829.
In 1860—13,784.
In 1866—24,401.
In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of side-walks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

FIFTY AFFIRMATIONS.

RELIGION.

1. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself.
2. The root of religion is universal human nature.
3. Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root.
4. Historical religions are all different, in virtue of their different historical origin and development.
5. Every historical religion has thus two distinct elements,—one universal or spiritual, and the other special or historical.
6. The universal element is the same in all historical religions; the special element is peculiar in each of them.
7. The universal and the special elements are equally essential to the existence of an historical religion.
8. The unity of all religions must be sought in their universal element.
9. The peculiar character of each religion must be sought in its special element.

RELATION OF JUDAISM TO CHRISTIANITY.

10. The idea of a coming "kingdom of heaven" arose naturally in the Hebrew mind after the decay of the Davidic monarchy, and ripened under foreign oppression into a passionate longing and expectation.
11. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be a world-wide empire on this earth, both temporal and spiritual, to be established on the ruins of the great empires of antiquity by the miraculous intervention of Jehovah.
12. The Messiah or Christ was to reign over the "kingdom of heaven" as the visible deputy of Jehovah, who was considered the true sovereign of the Hebrew nation. He was to be a Priest-King,—the supreme pontiff or high-priest of the Hebrew church, and absolute monarch of the Hebrew state.
13. The "apocalyptic literature" of the Jews exhibits the gradual formation and growth of the idea of the Messianic "kingdom of heaven."
14. All the leading features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "kingdom of heaven," the "end of the world," the "great day of judgment," the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," the "resurrection of the dead," the condemnation of the wicked and the exaltation of the righteous, the "passing away of the heavens and the earth," and the appearance of a "new heaven and a new earth," were definitely formed and firmly fixed in the Hebrew mind, in the century before Jesus was born.
15. John the Baptist came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." But he declared himself merely the forerunner of the Messiah.
16. Jesus also came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and announced himself as the Messiah or Christ.
17. Jesus emphasized the spiritual aspect of the Messianic kingdom; but, although he expected his throne to be established by the miraculous intervention of God, and therefore refused to employ human means in establishing it, he nevertheless expected to discharge the political functions of his office as King and Judge, when the fulness of time should arrive.

18. As a preacher of purely spiritual truth, Jesus probably stands at the head of all the great religious teachers of the past.

19. As claimant of the Messianic crown, and founder of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, Jesus shared the spirit of an unenlightened age, and stands on the same level with Gautama or Mohammed.

20. In the belief of his disciples, the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus would not prevent the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven." His throne was conceived to be already established in the heavens; and the early church impatiently awaited its establishment on earth at the "second coming of the Christ."

21. Christianity thus appears as simply the complete development of Judaism,—the highest possible fulfilment of the Messianic dreams based on the Hebrew conception of a "chosen people."

CHRISTIANITY.

22. Christianity is the historical religion taught in the Christian Scriptures, and illustrated in the history of the Christian church.

23. It is a religion in virtue of its universal element; it is the Christian religion in virtue of its special element.

24. The Christian Scriptures teach, from beginning to end, that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God,"—that is, the Hebrew Messiah. This, the Christian Confession, was declared both by Jesus and the apostles to be necessary to salvation or admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

25. The Christian church, from its origin to the present day, has everywhere planted itself on faith in the Christian Confession, as its divinely appointed foundation,—the eternal "rock" against which the "gates of hell shall never prevail."

26. The Christian Confession gradually created on the one hand the theology, and on the other hand the hierarchy, of the Roman Catholic Church. This process was not, as is claimed, a corruption, but a natural and logical development.

27. The Church of Rome embodies Christianity in its most highly developed and perfect form, as a religion of authority based on the Christian Confession.

28. Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of Christianity, whether regarded theologically or ecclesiastically, under the influence of the free spirit of protest against authority.

29. "Liberal Christianity,"—that is, democratic autocracy in religion,—is the highest development of the free spirit of protest against authority which is possible within the Christian church. It is, at the same time, the lowest possible development of faith in the Christ,—a return to the Christian Confession in its crudest and least developed form.

30. Christianity is the religion of Christians, and all Christians are believers in the Christ.

31. The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian Confession is the boundary line of Christianity.

FREE RELIGION.

32. The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion,—the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church.

33. The history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion at the expense of the Christian Religion. As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases.

34. The completion of the religious protest against authority must be the extinction of faith in the Christian Confession.

35. Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law.

36. The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.

37. The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man,—the race serving the individual, the individual serving the race.

38. The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous and universal education of man.

39. The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice in the private soul.

40. The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One.

41. Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion,—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend.

RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO FREE RELIGION

42. Christianity is identical with Free Religion so far as its universal element is concerned,—antagonistic to it so far as its special element is concerned.

43. The corner-stone of Christianity is faith in the Christ. The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in Human Nature.

44. The great institution of Christianity is the Christian Church, the will of the Christ being its supreme law. The great institution of Free Religion is the coming Republic of the World, the universal conscience and reason of mankind being its supreme organic law or constitution.

45. The fellowship of Christianity is limited by the Christian Confession; its brotherhood includes all subjects of the Christ and excludes all others. The fellowship of Free Religion is universal and free; it proclaims the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

46. The practical work of Christianity is to Christianize the world,—to convert all souls to the Christ, and ensure their salvation from the wrath of God. The practical work of Free Religion is to humanize the world,—to make the individual nobler here and now, and to convert the human race into a vast Co-operative Union devoted to universal ends.

47. The spiritual ideal of Christianity is the suppression of self and perfect imitation of Jesus the Christ. The spiritual ideal of Free Religion is the free development of self, and the harmonious education of all its powers to the highest possible degree.

48. The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of Free Religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face; Free Religion is erect on its feet.

49. The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake.—The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

50. Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.

THE PRACTICAL WORK OF FREE RELIGION.

[Read to the (then) Unitarian Society of Toledo, Sunday morning, Aug. 8, 1869.]

"The Wisdom of what rules, and is First and Chief in Nature, has made it to be according to the private interest and good of every one to work toward the general good; which if a creature ceases to promote, he is actually so far wanting to himself, and ceases to promote his own happiness and welfare. He is, on this account, directly his own enemy; nor can he otherwise be good or useful to himself than as he continues good to society, and to that Whole of which he is himself a part."

Lord Shaftesbury, Inquiry concerning Virtue (last paragraph.)

In the four preceding discourses, I have sketched the outlines of Christianity and Free Religion, and set the two before you side by side, that you may judge freely and fairly for yourselves which appeals the more powerfully to thoughtful and earnest minds. A few words on the natural connection of the two contrasted faiths will properly precede what I have still to say concerning the Practical Work of Free Religion.

So soon as Romish Christianity and Free Religion are distinctly apprehended as based on two incompatible principles, authority and liberty, it becomes very clear that Protestant Christianity is merely a transition from one to the other,—a feeble compromise between the two, necessary in history, yet impossible in logic. But every compromise between contradictory ideas is transient, because, in the long run, logic governs history. The so-called "logic of events" is simply the true relations of ideas forcing themselves on human attention, and thereby moulding human action. Compromises cannot last. In every Protestant sect, we see, accordingly, two parties or wings, one tending forward to freedom, the other tending backward to authority. For instance, in the recent ecclesiastical trial at Chicago,—a tiny "tempest in a tea-pot," interesting only as a sign of the times,—we see a feeble manifestation of Free Religion in the attempt of Rev. Mr. Cheney to assert his independence of the rubric, and an equally feeble manifestation of Romish Christianity in the attempt of Bishop Whitehouse to crush him. A petty protest, and a petty persecution,—that sums it all up. Now this case illustrates the law of growth of Free Religion. The protesting spirit appears within the church itself, is sternly repressed, grows by opposition, and finally rends the church in the interest of freedom. It was thus at the Reformation, and has been ever since. Each generation has carried the protest a little farther, until at last, coming to full self-consciousness, the human soul declares itself absolutely free from every species of priestly rule,—issues from the confines of Christianity into the limitless liberty of Free Religion. Observe the steps of the process. Rome builds on the authority of the Christ as represented by Pope, Church, Tradition and Bible. Episcopacy protests against the Pope, but accepts the Church and Tradition, as well as the Bible, and is thus only imperfectly Protestant, in the common meaning of the word. Puritanism protests against the Pope, the Church, and Tradition, accepting the Bible as sole, supreme authority, and thus occupies strictly Protestant ground as commonly understood. Unitarianism protests against the Pope, the Church, Tradition, and part of the Bible, but accepts the New Testament, in whole or in part, and recognizes the divine authority of at least the words of the Christ. This is to reduce authority to its minimum. To give up the authority of the Christ would be to give up authority altogether. But in proportion as the spirit of Christianity has decreased in the church, the spirit of Free Religion has correspondingly increased; and to-day it affirms that man is at last able to stand alone. Thus has the circle of authority contracted by degrees to narrower and narrower dimensions, until at last it disappears; the non-age of Christianity is passed, and the soul of man attains its majority,—its spiritual franchise.

Now here we see two distinct forces at work. The despotic spirit utters itself in the claim of Christianity to absolute authority; the free spirit utters itself in the protest against this authority. As civilization advances, the latter grows at the expense of the former; and within the church itself, fostered by external and general influences, it increases in strength, until it no longer needs the protection of ecclesiastical walls. Plant an acorn in a flower-pot, and it will grow until, at last, either the pot must break, or the young oak die. Free Religion is the acorn planted in Christianity. Or, rather, Christianity is the acorn itself, containing a store of nourishment without which the young oak of Free Religion could never begin to grow; but the vigorous plant soon exhausts its stored-up food, strikes root into the ground, and, while the acorn decays, thrives on the juices of its native soil. Every religion which, like Christianity, is based on the authority of an individual or priesthood, can be provisional only; it enslaves the race to a great reputation, and merely prepares the way for the freedom that must come. Free Religion, therefore, is not, strictly speaking, a development of Christianity, but rather a development of Humanity in Christianity. The universal element of Christianity gradually sloughs off the special element altogether. The same process must go on in every other great historic faith, until, as all the rivers of the globe are merged and lost in the sea, all the world's historic faiths shall be merged and lost in the ocean of Free Religion. No one historical religion will ever succeed either in converting its rivals or in triumphing over them; but out of all of them must be eventually developed a spiritual and universal faith man which shall bind the human family together, not in by one creed, but by one spirit of love, liberty, and mutual co-operation. It is the only faith which will enable men to throw themselves, heart and soul, into the great work of human elevation, without seeking at the same time to propagate a creed. In this respect, Free Religion differs from every form of faith that the world has yet seen. Christianity has its foundation in the past, Free Religion in the present; and while the one must ever labor to make all men fall prostrate at the feet of Jesus, the other labors to make them stand erect upon their own feet and with cheerful faces do whatever their hands find to do in the common cause of human welfare. The one concentrates all efforts on the salvation of the soul from hell in the world to come; the other concentrates all efforts on making social and individual life purer, nobler, and happier in this world. The one is the purest selfishness disguised as piety; the other is pure forgetfulness of self in the service of others. The one seeks safety from imaginary dangers by passive reliance on an external Savior, and thus aims at the most visionary ends; the other seeks to improve the present condition of mankind in all possible ways by active exertions, and thus aims to accomplish the most practical ends. If Christianity has always been found combining to some extent practical with visionary objects, it is because the spirit of Free Religion has from the outset been struggling within it to better and bless mankind here and now; but when these visionary objects are definitely discarded, and all energies are directed to practical ends alone, the impetus given to all movements for human happiness and welfare will be beyond all calculation. Of all social forces, ideas are the most real and resistless; and the ideas which I have included under the name of Free Religion are powerful enough to revolutionize the world, if only faithfully applied. The reform which seeks to implant these ideas in every soul, is, of all reforms, the most intensely practical, the most unqualifiedly utilitarian, and yet, at the same time, the most profoundly spiritual and religious. Extremes meet; and were it not for this double aspect of Free Religion, I should feel sure it could not be what it is,—the truth made life.

The question, then, comes squarely before us,—what practical good is Free Religion going to do in the world? For unless it aims to do practical good, and is able to do it, it is not Free Religion but Free Philosophy,—a very good thing in its place, but powerless to elevate the practical condition of man. Speculation for its own sake I am the last man in the world to despise; in science and philosophy, as the pursuit of pure truth without regard to any material applications, it will always maintain its place and engage the attention of the world's great thinkers. But thought which ends in thought, and contemplates no results in action, is something which never interests the multitude of men, and has no immediate bearing on their welfare. Religion concerns action, and deals with ideas as instrumentalities, not as ultimate ends; it is the application of ideas to life, and values them for their power to touch the springs of religious feeling, to direct the instincts of right and wrong, and to stimulate the will to upright and unselfish activity. Unless Free Religion, therefore, can do more and better for men than Christianity has done, it will never thrive or spread. What, then, will it do for them,—as individuals and as a race?

1. If you can succeed in giving to any man a higher ideal to aim at, a nobler object to live for,—if you can succeed in awakening a more earnest aspiration for goodness and truth, and a more powerful resolve to make every day radiant with their divine beauty,—you have rendered the grandest service that one soul can render to another. Judge between Christianity and Free Religion by their ability to render this service. "Save your own soul,—live for yourself!" says Christianity. "Devote every energy to universal ends,—live for your race!" says Free Religion. The salvation of your own soul, the welfare of all mankind,—these are the two ideals. Which is the nobler and the higher? I leave it to your own hearts to make reply. Again, Christianity appeals to hope and fear,—hope of heaven, and fear of hell,—as the supreme motives of fidelity; while Free Religion appeals to that love of goodness for its own sake, that love of men for their own sake, which utterly forgets all rewards and punishments. "Save my own soul!" echoed Wilberforce, to a pious friend who warned him not to forget his own salvation in his labors for emancipation of the negro, "save my own soul! I had forgotten I had a soul!" It is mean and sordid to crave a good that shall not bring with it a blessing to all men. We are so bound together into one brotherhood by nature, that my good is your good and my evil is your evil; and I violate the sanctity of the universe by aiming at any purely selfish end. Do I seek wealth? It must be for its beneficent uses to all. Do I seek power? It must be that I may bless more widely. Do I seek reputation? It must be that my influence may be a constant stimulus to all noble and beautiful actions. Thus universal usefulness should be my ideal end,—disinterested love of goodness and of men should be my motive,—the influence of perfect character should be my means. "How can you do the most good?" asked a lady of a child. "By being myself just as good as I can be," was the more than childish answer. Depend upon it, the common welfare can only be subserved by obedience to your ideal in the profoundest solitudes of your own soul. The sacrifice of your self-respect, for any cause or for any person, is a bloody one, and leaves a stain never to be washed out on the floor of the inward temple. This is what Free Religion will do for you,—it will purify and expand the selfish ambition of your life, until it embraces the welfare of all your race; and it will supplant the low promptings of hope and fear by the grand uprising of self-forgetful love. Great Usefulness through great Character,—great Character through great Usefulness,—these are the gifts of Free Religion to him that refuses, in this populous world, to have any private interests.

2. But if this is the service which Free Religion can do for the individual, what can it do for the race? How will it affect men in their collective action? How will it ennoble them in their social aims?

Look at the world as it is. Did you ever hear of a corporation that had a soul? Of a nation that acted from any higher motive than expediency? Large assemblies have sometimes been moved by electric words to acts of heroism. But I never heard of any people whose sustained policy was that of exact and equal justice, still less of pure and uncalculating generosity. Yet Free Religion, if ever it becomes the living faith of man, will put a soul into the body politic,—will infuse into society such tenderness for the weak and ignorant, that all the combined energies of the race shall be dedicated to the protection and befriending of the individual, however humble. To educate, develop, and protect the meanest of mankind, will become an object worthy of grave deliberation in congresses and parliaments. Society will at last find some better use for a man than hanging him. Criminals will not be sacrificed, but saved. Paupers will not be shoved into workhouses, but helped to honest labor and self-respect. Betrayed women will not be condemned to a hell on earth, but tenderly redeemed and fitted for honored homes. Politics will cease to be a synonyme for knavery, and become the art of practical philanthropy. The State will be the voluntary association of mankind as a whole to help, defend and develop mankind as individuals. The little nationalities of the earth will grow ashamed of subdivisions that do but foster jealousy and provoke to war; and following the still imperfect example of our own Republic, will become members of a great Confederacy, with a Congress of Nations empowered to transact the governmental business of the world, without infringing on the rights of the tiniest community, the feeblest class, or the poorest man. The arterial tides of commerce will bear new life to neglected corners of the earth; competition will become rivalry in co-operation; and all distinctions of race or color or sex will be swept away in the great stream of a common consciousness, a common nature, a common destiny. All the resources of united man will be consecrated to the service of the individual soul; the world will be one vast home, the race will be one vast family, the Republic of Humanity will be one vast State and one vast Church. What need of a separate church, when all its legitimate functions are discharged by the State? This is that union of Church and State to which I referred last Sunday, as the crowning triumph of Free Religion. Is the dream chimerical? No! it is but a feeble guess at a reality yet to come in splendor inconceivable. Faith in Man is the telescope through which the starry future is descried in distant glory. In human nature is contained the latent possibility of grander things than these; and given unlimited time, the possibility, so sure as human nature is the prophecy of human destiny and character, will yet become a fact.

But while I assert that Free Religion is the pledge of all this, and more, I do not forget that Free Religion, in distinct self-consciousness, has nowhere as yet become an actually existing power. Its ante-natal life is past; its hour of birth is at hand. Christianity is the mother of a greater than herself. But the growth of the babe must be slow indeed. Before this ideal State of the Future, which shall be itself the ideal Church of the Future, is realized on earth, all those whose souls are kindled with Faith in Man must work for its establishment hopefully and devotedly, as best they may. Little associations must prefigure the great eventual Republic of Humanity, working earnestly for the same universal ends. Little churches (if that name may still be retained for communions so thoroughly secularized in spirit and purpose), or—a better name—little societies or fraternities, must labor for these ideas, and, so far as possible, apply them to the problems of the times. The same great ends and the same broad methods must be found embodied in miniature societies, foreshadowing the coming commonwealth of colossal grandeur. Is the age yet ripe for societies like these to start up and to thrive? I wait to see,—yes, I wait to serve. Wherever and whenever the summons comes, I am ready to obey. With surprise and hope I have been watching the spirit of the times asserting itself so unmistakably and so vigorously here. Let me sketch the character of the organization it must create, if it is indeed the genuine spirit of Free Religion.

1. The Church, or much more appropriately, the Society, of Free Religion, is a company of earnest men and women who devote themselves to no end more narrow than the universal welfare of Man. Above all local interests, this universal interest must reign supreme. If ever the universal interest demands a sacrifice of any "Society" interest, this sacrifice must be cheerfully and boldly made. No selfish policy, no timid fears, no prizing of local success above the success of ideas, must poison the great spirit of the movement, or quench its inspiration. Wealthy or poor, many or few, honored or persecuted, the Society of Free Religion will value its ideas above all prosperity, and obey them with unwavering fidelity. The welfare of man must be its aim. Nor is the aim a vague one. It means that the moral and spiritual improvement of all the members, and the practical advancement of all good enterprises, according to ability and opportunity,—that is, private character and public usefulness,—must be the constant object of the Society, valued infinitely above all increase of numbers, of wealth, or of influence. Let no sail be trimmed to catch the breeze of popular favor, but let the ship's course be guided by the compass of high principle. To learn what is the truth of God, and to apply this forthwith in the service of man, is the only excuse or reason for the existence of a Society devoted to Free Religion.

2. Human welfare, then, being the true object of aspiration and endeavor, what are the appropriate means? First and foremost, I think, is the weekly assembly for worship and mutual improvement. The clear apprehension of ideas must precede their wise application to life. Hence the propriety of maintaining a free pulpit or platform for the discussion of all subjects that concern human welfare. I am very far from underrating the importance of having a speaker who, by special aptitude and circumstances, shall be fitted to address earnest minds on the highest themes. But it is not enough that the pulpit should address the pews; the pews should also address the pulpit and each other. It is not wise to have the talking all on one side. It is not simple reception, but intelligent discussion, true conversation, that best develops the mind, and secures the most thorough comprehension of truth. Hence there should be frequent meetings for conversation and discussion of the freest kind, open to all decorous persons, in which the minister should be obliged to meet his people on equal terms, to answer their questions, and, if necessary, to correct his own mistakes or receive new light. It is altogether preposterous for one man to expect to monopolize the work of instruction. The weekly assemblies should be on a really democratic plan, with a chance for every listener to express his own assent or dissent, to suggest modifications, and to add his quota to the common stock of thought. The true minister will take pleasure rather in fostering the intellectual activity of his listeners than in imparting to them his own opinions. Vigorous thought, even if sometimes erratic, is better than languid acquiescence in absolute truth. The acquisition of new ideas or new facts, to be of the greatest possible benefit, must be supplemented by free exchange of views.

Furthermore, besides insight into truth, the culture of religious feelings and sentiments is a very important part of the objects aimed at in the weekly assemblies. For myself, I feel the deepest veneration for the devotional element of human nature; and I believe that Free Religion will tend to strengthen, not weaken, this element. It is closely allied to all that is best and holiest in human hearts; it craves some form of social expression, and ought to be deepened by social sympathy. I should be false to my own nature, if I should disparage prayer or treat it as something to be outgrown. It is because I reverence true prayer profoundly, that I refuse to make it a mere part of a regular routine, or to degrade it into a mere conventional form which is never to be omitted. Leave it free, or you will make it dishonest. The leading objects, therefore, of the weekly meetings should be the sincere culture of the spirit of devotion, the enlargement of the mind by close and vigorous thought, and the mellowing of the character by the development of all kindly and social and religious sympathies. For purposes like these, I believe the institution of frequent public gatherings will always continue.

3. But weekly gatherings by no means include the whole duty of a free society. It must become a powerful agency in all sorts of practical philanthropy and social reform. Its ideas must bear fruit in direct endeavors to purify and bless mankind. It should not wait to be applied to for help in worthy objects, but should take the aggressive and study how to diminish the misery, and reform the vice, and educate the ignorance, that are all about us. It should regularly set apart money for charitable purposes, appoint special committees to oversee its appropriation, and frequently consult together concerning the best modes of doing good. Unless infused with a spirit of deep compassion for all human woes, and inspired by a conscientious determination to do all in its power to alleviate them, it is a ghastly mockery of all religion, and does but cumber the ground. The only religion I want to see in the world is that which "remembers those in bonds as bound with them," and glows with earnest zeal in all kind and loving and merciful works. If religion cares nothing for these, the true tasks appointed for it to do,—then, call it Christian or Free or what you will, we should spue it out of our mouths as wormwood and gall. Perish all religion but that which stoops with tenderness and pity, like a good Samaritan, over humanity's bleeding form! And long live every ism which fosters in the hearts of men the spirit of earnest consecration to deeds of mercy and of love!

This, then, is the Society of Free Religion,—a band of earnest men and women aiming at universal human welfare, and doing all the good they can, in their own immediate neighborhood, as part of this universal end. It thus represents on a small scale that Republic of Humanity which it labors to establish on a grand scale. It is a centre of true intellectual, social, and religious life, inspiring all around with high enthusiasm for truth, righteousness, and love, and devoting itself unremittently to the prevention and alleviation of all human miseries. What, then, shall be its terms of admission, its bond of union and condition of fellowship?

It is in this respect that the Society of Free Religion differs most fundamentally from the Christian Church. The Christian Church, even when calling itself Liberal, expects from all who join it a certain faith in the Christ and deference to his authority as Teacher, Lord and Master; it thus imposes a creed, of greater or less comprehensiveness, on all its members. But the Society of Free Religion makes no inquiry what a man believes, whether concerning Jesus or even concerning God; it says only,—“We are trying to help each other and all our fellow-men; will you join us in the work?” It is a deep sympathy in this practical object that constitutes its condition of fellowship and bond of union,—not a creed, or profession of faith, of any kind. It is thus a Society based on human nature itself, wide as humanity in its aims and its hospitality. As a Society it has absolutely no creed, no theological opinions whatever; as individuals, the members may hold whatever creed or opinions they believe true. All the members, whether believers or disbelievers in God, whether Jews or Christians or Mohammedans or Pagans, have equal rights and meet on equal terms, finding their common sympathy and purpose an all-sufficient bond of union. The Society must be hospitable to all who feel drawn to it by the inward attractions of its great and generous object; and it must forbear to prescribe to its members a creed, even in the most homœopathic dose. For one, I can never again belong to any Society which, even by its name, disfranchises any man for his opinions. The name of Baptist, or Methodist, or Unitarian, or even Christian, is a condensed creed, and excludes all who do not choose to accept it. A Jew will not join a Society which, by calling itself Christian, makes him virtually profess faith in Christianity by connecting himself with it. The only just, free, and generous course, is to sacrifice every name which can offend the conscience of any one, and adopt a name in harmony with universal ends. I think the name “Independent” is the best at present. It avows faith in liberty, the principle which in these times most needs to be emphasized: it has no sectarian or denominational associations, and suggests no creed of any sort: it is at the same time the most radical name possible, for when we have got down to the idea of absolute liberty of thought and conscience, we have got down to the everlasting foundation. All such names as Unitarian or Christian practically exclude many men who ought to be heartily welcomed; while the name Independent affirms for every man the right to be uncompromisingly himself, and thus admits all earnest persons on equal terms. Christians may belong without in anywise discarding Christianity; and so may Jews belong without discarding Judaism, and Atheists, if they choose to come, without discarding Atheism. When truth alone is sought, prejudice dies away, the hearts of men are softened by the warm rays of mutual kindness, and all who long to make the world better, happier, and holier, may join hand to hand and shoulder to shoulder in the noble task. This, my friends, is the character of the Society that worthily and intelligently plants itself on Free Religion.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—“I am very glad to add my mite to the support of your paper, not so much from full sympathy with the views which it advocates, as from personal regard for you, and love of free discussion. Much as I love Christianity (both the name, and the thing as I understand it), I love the Truth and Liberty more. There will surely be more harm from the slightest stifling of any sincere and reverent conviction than from the gravest speculative errors. My faith in the future usefulness of the Unitarian body centres in its loyalty to the broadest toleration of inquiry and discussion. Let us seek the truth and encourage others to seek the truth, provided the temper be earnest, pure, reverent, and patient, no matter what the upshot may be. That we will leave with God.

As I said, I have not much intellectual sympathy with your peculiar views. I have not had much time since I left the School, for investigation; and I cannot take any steps further forward without careful investigation. I want to read everything that bears on the Radical Controversy, even when I am offended by flippancy and disingenuousness, or by dogmatism and shallowness, provided I can find any rays of light to clear up the fog. And I feel convinced that 'there is yet more light to break forth from God's Holy Word,' from the ever-speaking Word of His ever-present Spirit, and that Religion has by no means reached its ultimate expression. * * * * I believe that there must be elements of truth in the distinctive views which you advocate, which a free and reverent discussion will winnow from the chaff. Our only safety is in the fullest and frankest discussion—not 'controversy,' for that implies too much of a partisan and dogmatic temper, which God forbid.

Above all, I hope that both sides will be patient. 'Rome was not made in a day,' and men cannot be expected to change long-cherished views at the first trumpet blast of the champion of some novelty. I always distrust men who take up with new views suddenly, whether more orthodox or more radical. It suggests fickleness, superficial inquiry, and the influence of the imagination and emotions rather than a calm understanding. Let us allow plenty of time for new views to be sifted and the truth to win its way, provided there is a candid temper; and let us not surfeit people with too much of novelty, but allow a natural progress in the unfolding and presentment of new truth. Our 'transition schools' have a providential and essential place; and I think our Radicals make a grave mistake in being so impatient with them. Finally we must treat with courtesy and reverence every form of belief that sincere religious feeling still clings to, and remove the delicate religious affections from the dead trunks by gentleness and sympathy.”

—“Send me a copy of your paper, THE INDEX, as I am anxious to get a paper free from sectarian bias, and hoping that yours will answer to that character. I send you enclosed one dollar for which you can send it as long as you think that amount will pay, and I will send the balance to pay for a full year. I have not the two dollars to spare at present, as I am a poor man; but I am interested in your movement, so do not fail to send it.”

—“It may seem a little churlish if I fail to acknowledge your circular of the 1st of November; at the same time, I do not feel interested in subscribing to the paper you propose. I do feel interested in hearing from you at intervals, and from all pious minds, that suppose that Christianity limits freedom of action, fullness of development, conscious reception of the Spirit of God. But I am not persuaded that the 'Radicals' are pursuing the right path. My own turn of mind leads me to a direction wholly different from the speculative, the theological. To me Christianity is the embodiment of benevolence, the inspiration of beneficent action. I recognize as a Christian, after Christ's own pattern and wish, the Pagan, Mahometan, or Jew, or Radical, whose deeds and spirit resemble those of Jesus. And it is towards beneficence in action, that I should be glad to hear the thoughtful and religious world continually turn.

I desire that you should have all freedom, respect, honor and love; but you can easily see how I should not be a constant reader of your paper, if I were to receive it.”

—“I hasten to send my name as a subscriber to THE INDEX, and, though unknown, desire to express my sympathy in the undertaking, and my faith that the paper will prove a true representative of the Free Religious thought of the times. That thought needs encouraging; it needs constant upholding, for it comes as a comfort to many who are obscure, and to many who hesitate to give it expression, being deterred by the conventional forms, so very slight as they are, of the Liberal Christianity of the modern Unitarian Church. May your efforts hasten the coming of the Church of the Future, which, in my thoughts, I like to style the Church of the Father.”

—“We are also to-day greeted with the first number of your paper. Allow me to express my great satisfaction in the clear and interesting analysis of Christianity and Free Religion. I have never seen anything on the subject that so entirely commends itself to my own thoughts, as your Lecture. I look with interest to Miss Cobbe's 'Argument.' I think she is right in considering the Future Life the great problem. As I stated to you before, it seems to me, without faith in it, effort must be much paralyzed.”

—“I have just read the Prospectus of your proposed weekly paper, and believe that such a publication is very much needed. Few, indeed, realize the impending transition from historical Christianity to pure Religion; yet on those few rests the solemn responsibility of teaching mankind the facts, and establishing as speedily as possible a positive belief based on that highest of authorities, the Reason and the Conscience. May God speed and guide your work.”

—“Wishing you success, beyond your most sanguine expectations, in your experiment of publishing a paper which proposes to call things by their proper names, I am yours very truly.”

THE GOLDEN RULE.

A seer whom ancient Wisdom wooed
Spake words forever true,—
“Do not unto others as ye would
They should not do to you.”

Another, gentle midst the rude,
In tones which all men drew,
Said—“Do unto others as ye would
That they should do to you.”

Now speaks the divine in every soul
Dear words of love and grace,
Which touch all human joy or dole,—
“Put yourself in his place.”

The Index.

FEBRUARY 5, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

In the great press of work which must be done, our correspondence suffers. We trust that correspondents will not misconstrue our silence or delay as indifference. We have but little time to answer letters; but we are much pleased to receive them, and we thank our friends, known and unknown, for their many encouraging words.

Many unavoidable mistakes have occurred in mailing THE INDEX to subscribers. We hope soon to arrange this matter satisfactorily. Please inform us of all irregularities.

Referring to our recent remark that Dr. Osgood would have had a better chance of a bishopric among the Unitarians than among the Episcopalians, the Christian Register says:—“THE INDEX, like other youthful beings, is sometimes saucy.” THE INDEX apologizes to the gray-haired Register for treading on its sensitive corn.

Miss Dickinson gave her lecture on “Whited Sepulchres” in Toledo, January 26. Every man must feel deeply moved by such a burning appeal, and inwardly resolve to do his utmost to remove the inequalities and iniquities that have made it necessary. The cry of humanity itself, insulted and wronged, bursts from her lips. Who dares to stop his ears or harden his heart against it?

Mr. Alcott was in Toledo a day or two last week. He is holding his conversations at various places in the West, and finds a welcome reception from thoughtful people. A few months ago he addressed the Independent Society here on Sunday morning, delighting his hearers; and he also addressed the Toledo Woman's Suffrage Association, besides holding a couple of conversations.

THE NEW CREED OF ATHEISM.

A recent number of the Liberal Christian has a two-column criticism of our Fifty Affirmations by Rev. Dr. Stebbins. We find but two points that need any reply:—

1. The Fifty Affirmations are the “fifty articles of the creed of Free Religion, exceeding by eleven those of the Church of England, and by forty-nine that of the National Conference which has caused the Free Religionists, or their first cousins, so much pain to have riveted on freedom of thought.”

2. “There is no article which confesses any belief in God, either as personal or impersonal, nor is the name of God used in any statement made of Free Religion in the fifty articles. Free Religion is a religion not only without a Christ, but also a religion without a God! Mankind are orphans!”

We will say a few words on each of these two points.

1. The word creed comes from the Latin credo, meaning I believe. Every man has beliefs, of course. If he states his beliefs, the statement is a creed, in the strictly etymological sense of the word. But, in the only proper use of language, a creed is a statement of theological doctrine which has been adopted as the basis of a sectarian organization. The difference between these two kinds of creeds is vast enough, one would imagine, to be visible even when looked at through the smoked glass of Unitarianism. We never objected to creeds except in the latter sense. The Thirty-nine Articles of the Episcopal Church, and the One Article of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, are creeds in this objectionable sense, more or less committing every member of those organizations. The creed of an individual commits nobody but himself; the creed of a sect commits all who belong to it. The expression of individual convictions promotes freedom of thought, by stimulating other minds to action. But the adoption of a sectarian creed hinders freedom of thought, by throwing the odium of heresy on all dissenters. The Fifty Affirmations are offered as our individual convictions, based on study and reflection,—therefore not as a creed in the proper sense of the word. We speak for no one else. But if it pleases any one to call them a creed or a rhinoceros or a boot-jack, we have no objection whatever to that harmless pastime.

2. We had imagined that our fortieth Affirmation—“The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One”—sufficiently indicated our own belief in God. But we are not disposed to evade the question raised, nor yet to be terrified into dogmatism by any hue-and-cry of “atheism—atheism!” Is it true, as charged, that “Free Religion is a religion without a God?”

A dogma is a theological doctrine affirmed to be true by some authority too sacred to be questioned,—a theological axiom, to doubt which is as irreligious as to doubt a mathematical axiom is idiotic,—in short, an undebatable proposition. Now Free Religion admits no undebatable proposition. It has no dogmas,—not even the dogma of simple theism. Every proposition, being a human affirmation, is subject to human revision. Whether recognized or not, human thought is the real authority for every proposition that can be put into words; and when thought affirms—“God is,”—it can claim no more infallibility than when it affirms—“God is not.”

Now we find the theist making the one, the atheist making the other of these affirmations. We perceive them to be equally honest and upright men. Shall we say to either,—“You are a knave or a fool?” No! we leave that insolence to the bigot. Deep as is our own individual faith in God, we will not so insult humanity as to show aught but profoundest respect to conscientious thought. We will waive our own convictions for the time being, and say to the atheist,—“Brother, let us meet in kindness on the common ground of our humanity, and discover, if we can, which of us two is mistaken. We both love the truth, and seek it in sincerity of soul. Perhaps the God I believe in has been slandered to you by ignorant priests. I will try to look at the question from your standpoint; will you not try to look at it from mine? I find such unutterable peace in this great thought of God, that I would gladly share it with you; but if I am deceived, let me share your higher peace. For come what may, Truth, and Truth alone, can give the peace I crave.”

This is the spirit of Free Religion. It trusts the soul of man too tenderly and deeply to fear the results of any sincere thought. It treats all men as brothers and equals, claiming no moral or spiritual superiority because of intellectual beliefs. It dares to cut loose from the last dogma clutched convulsively by human fear, and launch out boldly on the illimitable ocean of truth,—dares to sail the seas with all humanity for crew, nor dreads to find a Jonah in the soul of the honest atheist,—dares to go to the bottom, rather than cast him over-board.

If this be atheism, make the most of it!

THOMAS PAINE.

We promised last week to give some extracts from the writings of eminent men, showing the estimation in which they held one whose wide-spread unpopularity proves that America is not incapable of Athenian ingratitude. His great services in our Revolutionary war have been quite eclipsed by his religious heterodoxy. Even in his grave, the misrepresentations of men who have never read a word of his writings pursue him with a prejudice which does the work of the bitterest malice. It is time that justice should be done to his memory.

President Washington wrote to Paine:—“Your presence may remind Congress of your past services to this country; and if it is in my power to impress them, command my best exertions with freedom, as they will be rendered cheerfully by one who entertains a lively sense of the importance of your works.” And again to Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia:—“That his Common Sense and many of his Crisis were well timed and had a happy effect upon the public mind, none, I believe, who will turn to the epoch at which they were published, will deny. That his services have hitherto passed off unnoticed is obvious to all.”

Thomas Jefferson wrote to Francis Eppe:—“You ask my opinion of Lord Bolingbroke and Thomas Paine. They were alike in making bitter enemies of the priests and pharisees of their day. Both were honest men,—both advocates of human liberty.” In 1801, he wrote to Paine himself, tendering him a passage to the United States in a national vessel:—“I am in hopes you will find us returned generally to sentiments worthy of former times. In these it will be your glory to have steadily labored, and with as much effect as any man living. That you may long live to continue your useful labors and to reap the reward of the thankfulness of nations, is my sincere prayer.”

James Madison, referring to a bill proposing to give Paine a tract of land on the Chesapeake shore, brought forward and defeated by a single vote in the Virginia Legislature, in 1784, thus wrote to Washington:—“Should it finally appear that the merits of the man whose writings have so contributed to infuse and foster the spirit of independence in the people of America are unable to inspire them with a just beneficence, the world, it is to be feared, will give us as little credit for our policy as for our gratitude in this particular."

James Monroe wrote to Paine while still confined in the Luxembourg:—"You are considered by them [i. e. the American people] as not only having rendered important services in our own Revolution, but as being, on a more extensive scale, the friend of human rights, and a distinguished and able advocate in favor of public liberty."

Andrew Jackson wrote to Judge Hertell, of New York:—"Thomas Paine needs no monument made by hands; he has erected a monument in the hearts of all lovers of liberty. The Rights of Man will be more enduring than all the piles of marble or granite man can erect."

Dr. Franklin wrote to the Duc de la Rochefoucauld:—"The bearer of this is Mr. Paine, the author of a famous piece entitled Common Sense, published here with great effect on the minds of the people at the beginning of the Revolution. He is an ingenious, honest man; and as such I beg leave to recommend him to your civilities."

Rev. Solomon Southwick, a Christian minister, wrote thus generously of Paine, whose opinions he condemned:—"No page in history, stained as it is with treachery and falsehood, or cold-blooded indifference to right or wrong, exhibits a more disgraceful instance of public ingratitude than that which Thomas Paine experienced from an age and country which he had so faithfully served. . . . As to his religion or no religion, God alone must be the judge and arbiter of that. No human being, no human tribunal, can claim a right even to censure him for it, much less to make it the pretext for defrauding him, either in life or death, of the reward due to his patriotism, or the legitimate fame of his exertions in the cause of suffering humanity. Had Thomas Paine been guilty of any crime, we should be the last to eulogize his memory. But we cannot find that he ever was guilty of any other crime than that of advancing his opinions freely upon all subjects connected with public liberty and happiness. If he erred in any of his opinions, since we know that his intentions were pure, we are bound to cover his errors with the mantle of charity." He says that James Cheetham, whose Life of Paine is the fountain-head of the slanders circulated against him, "strove in vain to blacken his moral character."

Lossing, in his Field Book of the Revolution, says:—"Paine was in Washington's army in December, 1776, and the first number of the Crisis was published. It was read to every Corporal's guard, and its strong and truthful language had a powerful effect in the army and among the people at large."

Gen. Charles Lee, fourteen days after the publication of Common Sense, wrote to Gen. Washington:—"In short, I own myself convinced by the arguments of the necessity of separation."

Gilbert Vale, in his Life of Paine, gives the testimony of Aaron Burr, who was sufficiently fastidious in his tastes to be a competent witness on the points involved:—"In reply to a query which we recently put to Col. Burr, as to Mr. Paine's alleged vulgarity, intemperance, and want of cleanliness, as disseminated by those who wished it true, he remarked with dignity, 'Sir, he dined at my table.'

Then am I to understand he was a gentleman? 'Certainly, sir,' replied Col. Burr, 'I always considered Mr. Paine a gentleman, a pleasant companion, and a good-natured and intelligent man, decidedly temperate, with a proper regard to his personal appearance, whenever I saw him.'"

Judge Cooper wrote:—"I have dined with Mr. Paine in literary society, at Mr. Tiffins', a merchant in London, at least a dozen times, when his dress, manners and conversation were such as became the character of a gentleman, accustomed to good society. . . . Paine's opinions underwent no change before his death."

Rev. M. D. Conway said in 1860, in Cincinnati:—"So disinterested was he, that, when his works were printed by the ten thousand, and as fast as one edition was printed another was demanded, he, a poor and pinched author, who might very easily have grown rich, would not accept one cent for them, declared that he would not coin his principles, and made to the States a present of the copyrights. His brain was his fortune,—nay, his living; he gave it all to American Independence."

Lord Edward Fitzgerald, the Irish patriot, wrote to his mother from Paris in 1792:—"I lodge with my friend Paine; we breakfast, dine and sup together. The more I see of his interior, the more I like and respect him. I cannot express how kind he has been to me; there is a simplicity of manner, a goodness of heart, and a strength of mind in him, that I never knew a man before to possess."

Joel Barlow wrote:—"He was always charitable to the poor beyond his means, a sure protector and a friend to all Americans in distress that he found in foreign countries; and he had frequent occasion to exert his influence in protecting them during the Revolution in France."

Samuel Adams wrote to Paine:—"I have frequently, with pleasure, reflected on your services to my native and your adopted country. Your Common Sense and your Crisis unquestionably awakened the public mind, and led the people loudly to call for a Declaration of our National Independence."

William Howitt wrote of Paine:—"This pamphlet [Common Sense] was the spark which was all that was needed to fire the train of Independence. It at once seized on the imagination of the public; cast all other writers into the shade, and flew in thousands and tens of thousands all over the colonies. . . . During the winter and spring, this lucid and admirably reasoned pamphlet was read and discussed everywhere, and by all classes, bringing the conviction that immediate independence was necessary. The common fire blazed up in Congress, and the thing was done."

The Atlantic Monthly, Vol. IV. p. 16, says: "His [Paine's] career was wonderful, even for the age of miraculous events he lived in. In America he was a revolutionary hero of the first mark, who carried letters in his pocket from George Washington thanking him for his services; and he managed besides to write his name in large letters in the history of England and France."

These extracts, selected from Joseph N. Moreau's "Testimonials to the Merits of Thomas Paine," are but a small part of the testimony which has been given by irreproachable witnesses to Paine's high character, great ability, and invaluable services to America and to man. May the world grow ashamed of the bigoted and cruel prejudice with which it has rewarded one of its best and greatest benefactors!

LETTER FROM H. L. GREEN.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1870.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Allow a stranger to thank you from the bottom of his heart for THE INDEX. I find in your lectures the expression of the crude thoughts I have had for a long time, but which I have never been able to express to my own satisfaction. And from consultation with my friends I find that they, too, have had a like experience. And I think there are a few minds in every village and town throughout our broad country who are hungering and thirsting for this experience of free religion, to be emphasized as you suggest upon the last syllable.

If this be so, then THE INDEX will live. It has no competitor. No other religious paper is wholly unsectarian; no one has ever before, to my knowledge, taken a stand "outside" of all religious sects and parties, and planted itself squarely upon the platform of the absolute religion. If all who are in sympathy with the movement of the free religionists will assist you in your noble endeavor to present their ideas to the world, THE INDEX will be sure of a long and progressive life, and before the end of the present year you will be obliged to enlarge the sheet. All that is necessary is that every lover of religious freedom should see his friend who sympathizes with him in his views, and urge upon him the importance of giving THE INDEX his support. You cannot expect much encouragement from the political or sectarian press. There may be a few like the great INDEPENDENT, which has an editor whose heart is much larger than even his large sheet, that will give it an honorable mention; but the majority of them will, like the Liberal (?) Christian, merely prophesy its death, in a manner that betrays the fact that "the wish is father of the thought." But let THE INDEX go forth without "thought of the morrow," relying wholly for support upon those who shall aid it for truth's sake; and whether it shall die or live, it will have done something to establish the true kingdom of heaven upon earth, which shall be broad enough to admit all the true and beautiful souls that God has made, whether from Christian or pagan lands. Let its motto ever be,—

"Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee,—
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me!
Nearer, my God, to thee!"

H. L. GREEN.

LETTER FROM "C. J."

MY DEAR ABBOT:—With your recent letters before me, and the first and second issues of your journal in my hands, I get a full view of your plans, and am very glad that it has come to this. It seems to me just right that these earnest and generous Toledo folk should give you this capital chance to use pulpit and press equally in proclaiming your religious convictions. I honor them greatly for their part, and I rejoice that this special providence is securing you a hearing such as no one of the regular pastors of Unitarianism obtains. You need not be told that hearty personal regard, and great faith in your providential vocation, mingle in the sympathy with which I bid you God-speed.

I have been for twenty years a very close observer of the religious world, heathen as well as Christian, and a constant student of the religious history of the race, and nowhere have I seen, or heard of, a more absurd spectacle than that now presented in the little corner of Christian Ecclesiasticism which the Unitarians and Universalists divide between them. The handful of sectarists who preach universal redemption much as dirty and snarling Diogenes in his tub preached philosophy, are controlled by bigots as intolerable as any that either Catholic or Calvinist circles have known. But they have the ample excuse of exceeding ignorance. Undoubtedly Caiaphas and Pilate were not more unconscious of crime, when they suppressed Jesus, than Rev. Dr. Miner and his co-workers are of outrage in delivering a brother of rationalistic leanings to the damnation of a Universal Redemption Convention.

But the narrowness of Unitarian ecclesiasticism is voluntary and shameless. The disaster to religion, which Unitarianism has inflicted since its National Conference lied to the Holy Ghost, did not fall in the dark. Dr. Bellows yielded his acknowledged preference of liberty, and put his best inspirations to an open shame, when the 'crucify, crucify' of arrogant priests and rich Pharisees induced him with his own hands to deliver Freedom to death.

Your journal makes its appearance at a moment when the disgraceful hesitation and infidelity of your former communion seem to have reached a climax. The decease of the Christian Examiner, the summary snuffing out of Mr. W. T. Clarke's trembling light in the Liberal Christian, and the starting of Old and New, which evidently means new wine in old bottles, mark a curious moment in Unitarian history. Undoubtedly Hale is a fine fellow in his way, and there is a little prospect that he may have something of a magazine success; but what a tailing off for Liberal Christianity! Fred. Ingham's "Ten Times One is (sic) Ten" the last word of inspiration! A popular magazine the end of the intellectual movement represented by Channing and Parker! Verily, the bottles will be safe, for all the stir likely to come from Capt. Ingham's sweetened water.

The INDEX, as a journal continuing the work of applying free thought to religion, which Unitarianism now lays down, has the whole ground. The field of grave study and able discussion is as clear before you as a school-room when masters and pupils have proclaimed a day of grand sport. Capt. Ingham, cap in air, rushes all the old Dominies out for the 'good time boys' of Old and New, and the great opportunity belongs to whoever shall claim it. The masters' seats of free thought and learning are vacant. Even the Monthly Journal, which barely had a name to live, has slept its last sleep, in pew corners and waste baskets. The men who had the most distinct call to bear witness to the truth are silent. The great passion of thought is extinguished in them. They have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of ecclesiastical quiet. I do not speak of such as — or —, nor of the mass of clerical respectability which has given the communion a tone of good manners and feebleness usually found in female boarding schools, but of the large and noble minds, like Dr. Hedge and Robert Collyer, whose natures fitted them to be apostles of uncompromising truth. The Yorkshire blacksmith tends a woman's garden of flowers, makes bouquets of sentiment, anecdote, and quaint wit, and escapes the toil of honest thinking, with its crown of thorns. Dr. Hedge, who, by most remarkable gifts and great attainments, seemed likely to be the most robust thinker and finest scholar of New England, retires timorously within the cover of his privacy, and only comes out to adorn a spectacle or to assist in an ecclesiastical play. The one great man, who fills the measure of his vocation, whom no difficulties deter and no modesty embarrasses, is Hepworth. Hepworth bloweth where he listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, and canst tell exactly whence he cometh and whither he goeth. Singular compend of all the winds of heaven, simulating through a brass horn the voice of the Holy Ghost! His word is in the popular ear, and where some thousands are gathered together, there is he in the midst of them. But at least he dares something. Have we not seen "Hepworth's Divinity School," and are we not about to see Hepworth's "Creed of Unitarianism?" This is the one man remaining to Unitarianism.

But really, my dear Abbot, while I thus congratulate you with all my heart upon your undertaking, I must say frankly that I consider the peculiarity of your position, your flat rejection of the Christian connection and name, without warrant in religion, philosophy, or common sense. As Theist, thinker, and man, according to Human Nature all its rights, giving to Reason sole and absolute authority, and directing devotion to the only God and Father, I hold you bound to claim and to maintain, by confession, argument, and life, that Christianity is fulfilled in Free Religion. If I write for the INDEX, I must make a special study of this very matter, and lay before yourself, and your readers, the method and grounds of my interpretation of the Christian Gospel, and my reasons for stoutly believing and strenuously insisting that the great Free Thinkers, of whom this generation is not worthy, are in the direct line of apostles and prophets, and more than any others entitled to the Christian name. Shall I do this? [By all means. —Ed.] Ever most truly yours, C. J.

WORLDLINESS AND UNWORLDLINESS.

BY MARIE A. BROWN.

Worldliness. Unworldliness. What is the one? What is the other? We know that one is corrupt and debasing, and that the other is pure and holy; that one is the reverse of the other as surely as night is the reverse of day, yet how determine the one—how pronounce upon the other? Christianity, in theory, defines very distinctly these opposite states,—emphasizing its ideal in an immortal example, from all of which, in practice, its followers deviate persistently. Occasionally there is an imitator. He is styled a fanatic. These are devotees;—monks, nuns, celibates, and sisters of charity interpret to the letter the law of righteousness, accepting meekly the self-imposed penance. They are called unnatural, they are commiserated, their course is avoided.

Unworldliness, in the Scriptural, in the Christian sense, signifies withdrawal, abnegation, forfeiture. Withdrawal from what? From the world. God made the world, and it contains somewhat of good. Abnegation of what? Of the things of the world. These things are our inheritance to be preserved. Forfeiture of what? Of all possible good of which the perishable is the medium and channel. The objection to this system is, that it cannot be perfectly carried out save in suicide; it is subject to inconsistencies, and forced to the necessity of compromise. The senses will not forego their delights,—breathing, smelling, touching, tasting, must still go on, consequently the senses have a little margin left them in which to work mischief; evil requires small territory. The body must be clothed, fed, sheltered; hence, possession which may become selfish, desire which may become greed, or gratification which may become sensual: enter all the lusts of the flesh. It is like driving out the flies in summer time; back they come in swarms and settle themselves more obstinately than ever. The only suppression of the senses is in death, the only complete renunciation is in dissolution. In life, the conditions of life must be respected; if these conditions are impure, there is but one resource—annihilation. Which is better,—to fight with nature and endeavor to stifle her instincts, or to work with her for Divine results? Which is wiser,—to repress, or to chasten? How cowardly to retain a fragment of attenuated existence, and, while casting greedy eyes upon the plenitude that we affect to despise, reproach the Creator for his bounty, and rebuke Him for placing temptation within reach: refuse munificence and growl at God for not making the earth a desert. There is a man living in America, though not a native, who aspires to be a follower of Jesus, and a servant of the Lord. He accepts the "word" literally, and obeys with the few unavoidable exceptions that I have noticed. He defies the world, the flesh, and the devil. He lives the spiritual life after his own interpretation in this wise. In the first place he is a vagrant, having neither habitation nor home of his own; (he is doubtless obliged to sleep in a house, for the habits of civilization have so far modified the ideal simplicity that nocturnal rest out of doors is out of the question,) he covers himself in beggarly garb, and wears his hat upon all occasions, lest he should show deference to men; he is unwashed, unshaven, unkempt; he probably munches his food in secret after breaking his frequent fasts which are indulged in as often as nature will permit; his manners are uninvited by any attempt at civility, grace, or decorum; he is uncouth as a bear, ill-favored as a houseless dog, and altogether intolerable in his declension from human to bestial,—and withal, arrogant, conceited, fairly sickening in his pious egotism and inflation. He receives messages from the Lord, hears his voice, and receives his commandments. He goes about preaching the gospel, and desires above all things to take forcible possession of the pulpit and denounce the present occupants: his mission is "to form and establish the true, holy, and everlasting Christian Church,—the Millennial Church,—and to prepare the way of Jesus Christ for His second advent,"—in short to expel the spirit of worldliness and to reinstate righteousness upon the white throne. He has written a book, an autobiography, not yet published, from which a few extracts are in print. He felt himself commanded in this wise—to use his own words:—"Once the Lord said: 'Salute no man by the way.' Again, He commanded me to salute with the salutations of peace, as Jesus did and taught: 'Peace be to this house,' 'Peace be with you.' Again, He forbade me to use the razor, and also the comb, to trim, adorn, or embellish the body in any manner whatever; or to observe any of the fashions, customs, and manners of the world; to care for the body, or for food, or raiment; to carry money with me, to have any respect for persons, to give titles or to make compliments to any one; to jest, to talk of worldly things, or to have the mind on worldly things. All these things the Lord has expressly forbidden me the one after the other." This man is an extreme example of a certain fanaticism,—the carrying out of oft repeated injunctions to which all bend the ear, but few the inclination. Are the people perverse? No,—the gospel is false. Are the people sold to worldliness? Not more than the creed is sold to folly. But in subscribing to a creed to which one cannot agreeably conform the life, there is a little sense of hypocrisy and a savor of wickedness which adds zest to indulgence and a sting to contrition. One enjoys under protest, and then worships Jesus for atonement, renunciation by proxy. One keeps possession because he will have it, and then falters "Have mercy upon me, miserable sinner." What do we find in this man of whom I have been speaking—a man spiritualized, or a man bestialized? Are the lusts of the flesh subdued, or are they brutalized to mere animal instincts? Is covetousness repressed, or does it transfer its greedy clutch from tangible possessions to visionary benefits that will transfigure the gross clown in his own sight? "To be the most useful man in the world, next to Jesus Christ,"—such is his modest prayer. Is not pride—pride? What matters it whether one be proud of his standing, or proud of his lowliness? Is not arrogance the same, whether it is the arrogance of wealth or the arrogance of a dirty poverty that shoves itself forward? Ah! one may be vain because he is brilliant, and another vain because he is meek,—but neither is the paragon. One may be vain of fine raiment or vain of rags,—wherein lies the choice? One may be obsequious before men, or obsequious before an imaginary authority,—but cringing is none the more noble. We have among us certain utilitarians who aspire to simplify and purify existence; all things not absolutely needful are superfluous and should be dispensed with. Their purification is mere crudity, their simplification a return to rough-primitive conditions. If their conclusions with regard to the absolutely needful are correct, then God is a great prodigal, wasteful in the extreme. These people do not utilize—they reject. To utilize means to use all things wisely, to be able to divine the use inherent, or to invent a use which the apparently useless may be made to serve. The true utility is not a lopping off, but an adding to. The true religion is not abnegation, but acceptance,—not a closing of the eyes to temporal benefits, but an opening of the arms to receive them, an opening of the heart to appropriate them, and an opening of the understanding to use them wisely and reverently. Worldliness is the prostitution of good things to base uses; unworldliness is the Divine intention made manifest. Neither exists in the things themselves, but both exist in the disposition we make of them. The hard fist may be as worldly as the fair, jewelled hand, calico as satin, china buttons as jewels, glass as diamonds, sausages as confectionery, bare floors as tapestry, nothingness as profusion; if there is any preference it must justly be given to the finer, for the finer is the more ideal. The poor drudge in the kitchen stewing over her pies contrasts her humble and frugal condition with that of some more luxurious neighbor, and deprecates the worldliness of the latter. The poorly dressed, the poorly housed, the moderately circumstanced are ever denouncing the worldliness of luxury and excess. Luxury the most exuberant has nothing to do with worldliness—any more than squalor and wretchedness has. As well denounce the full corn in the ear, or rebuke the bud bursting with fulness, or the fruit dripping with juice. Richness, fulness, luxuriance are just as pure, just as holy, just as good, as destitution possibly can be;—the only question is—is the soul upright, or is the soul debased? If the soul is cumbent, it matters not whether the weight that oppresses be that of wealth, or that of want,—the soul must never incline—it must bend all things to it. In proportion to its power it craves the amplitude of means,—in proportion to its richness it abhors scantiness and poverty. Rueful the condition of the soul that prefers poverty—prefers the doing without—is partial to barrenness. Yet there is a patience—nay, a heroism under adversity that is grand; an acceptance not of meagre conditions, but of a deep cause which renders this appearance necessary for a time, and during which season the real wealth of nature hoards itself in a superb independence of accessories. The Winter can afford to bury foliage, fruitfulness, profusion, warmth, but does not burial predict resurrection, and is not the Spring eager to unlock the treasure and deck the willing earth with beauty? The soul asserts itself when stricken: "I am so great that I can do without toys and gew-gaws,—I have nothing, but I contain all." Then, when independence is at its meridian, is the spirit prepared to receive inheritance; then for the first time can it own the things of the earth because it is no longer possessed by them. Because it is free, it can use all things for good. Because its own value is ascertained, it may gauge with accuracy the work of things. Because the spiritual is reached, the temporal becomes fluid, and responds to the need for which each thing is designed. When the soul is delivered, it has dominion over the earth!

THE BIBLE IN SCHOOLS QUESTION.—The opinion developed as regards the expediency of continuing the reading of the Scriptures in schools has an eccentric aspect when tested from theological standpoints. Besides the Independent and the Beechers, the Chicago Advance, a paper, it will be remembered, started at the West to counteract the heresies of the Independent, takes ground for the exclusion of the Scriptures. On the other hand, one of the chief champions of its continuance is Rev. A.D. Mayo, the well-known Unitarian pastor of Cincinnati; the Liberal Christian allows one of its leading writers, Rev. A. P. Putnam, of Brooklyn, to commit it to the same side, and Rev. Mr. Hepworth takes like ground in a recent sermon. Beecher's platform on this subject is thus indicated by himself:—

"The Puritans took their stand on religious toleration; let them stick to their text, and never abandon the principle of perfectly free religious toleration, nor suffer others to impose a different principle upon them. 'What?' says the Catholic, 'do you think it proper to encourage infidelity—to bring up children without religious education?' Not at all. We do not teach husbandry in the common schools; but it does not, therefore, follow that we wish to make lazy children. Everything in its place. Let the church teach dogmas. Let the common school give intelligence. Let religious instruction be taught in the household, in the Sunday-school, in the church."—Boston Commonwealth.

HEROISM.—In France some years since a galley slave who had been condemned for life, managed to effect his escape and succeeded in baffling the officers who were searching for him. One day he came to a hut whose appearance indicated poverty within.—He entered it and found a poor family who seemed to be oppressed with some great grief. The father, mother and children were gathered together in a corner of the only room, and their lamentations moved him to inquire the cause. The father informed him that they were behind in their rent, and that, if it were not paid within a given time, they would be turned out of the only shelter they had in the world. "How much will it require to pay your rent?" asked the escaped slave. "Fifty francs," was replied. For a moment the felon reflected, and then, turning to the father, told him that there was a standing reward of fifty francs to whoever apprehended a galley slave. "Place a rope around my body, lead me to the magistrate and claim the reward," he said. It required much urging to induce the man to consent to this, but when he was told that, if he did not take the rope and lead the felon as directed, the latter would surrender himself, and that, if he did not do so, his family would soon have no home, he took the galley slave to a magistrate, received his money and saved a shelter for his wife and children.—Rev. Mr. Mundy, in "Troy Daily Times."

To "H. W."—The religious paper which you mention, and request us to notice a certain article of, we do not exchange with, and therefore you will have to send us a copy. There are but few papers of any kind that will exchange with the Investigator—it is so wicked! and the religious press, with scarcely an exception, give it the go-by. Not an Orthodox, a Baptist, Methodist, Episcopalian, Unitarian, Swedenborgian, Mormon, Quaker, nor Catholic paper comes to this office. The only religious papers which extend to us the usual courtesies of the press, are—the Free Religionist, Radical and Index; The Universalist, the World's Crisis, the Sabbath Recorder, the Banner of Light, and other Spiritual publications, and the Herald of Truth, a little pious sheet published at Woburn, Ms., by Elder Allen. This comprises about all the religious reading that we obtain from newspapers, though we have repeatedly tried to enlarge the list of these exchanges, but without success. However, we can do without them, and are no doubt saved by their absence from many a tedious infliction.—Boston Investigator.

Rev. James Freeman Clarke has recently preached in his church in Boston a discourse on Christianity and Free Religion. We can only judge of the discourse from a report of it in the Boston Journal reproduced in the Christian Register. Our first feeling on reading it was one of surprise and disappointment that a man of such liberal sympathies as Mr. Clarke, should so utterly fail to understand the nature and scope of the Free Religious Association, as he seems to do. We are sure it must be a failure of understanding, for he would not intentionally give, as his report represents him to do, a caricature of the Association instead of a characterization. Perhaps, however, the report does not do full justice to Mr. Clarke's position, though in its main points it substantially agrees with recent utterances of his in other places. But it will be safe to make allowance for modifying words and sentences not found in the report. Yet, since these views of the Association go out in Mr. Clarke's name, and since they are evidently to some extent views that are actually held by other people, it seems worth while to offer some correction. We shall speak of them not as Mr. Clarke's views, but as the reporter's understanding of his views.

First, in order to meet the argument of those who maintain that Christianity as a specific religious system has limitations, which free religion passes over and seeks to remove, the reporter represents Mr. Clarke as reasoning thus:—

"Free religion was not larger [than Christianity] either as a fact or power. Not as a fact, for free religion as a fact included only a few highly cultivated gentlemen and ladies in Boston and elsewhere, while Christianity included a fifth part of the population of the globe, including men and women of all races, all languages, all culture, rich and poor, wise and ignorant, civilized and barbarous. Nor was free religion broader as a power than Christianity, for free religion was as yet certainly but a speculation, and not a power. As yet it merely entertains those who have leisure and literary tastes and are fond of something new. When he saw it going among the poor, the abandoned classes, visiting the prisons, kneeling by the sick bed, lifting the poor out of the mire, helping the atheist to trust in God, he for one would gladly follow in its footsteps."

Of course Mr. Clarke could not mean to use the "argument of numbers" to prove the error of the principles of free religion; for he has shown up the weakness of that old argument too many times in his defense of Unitarianism, which numbers a very small part of Christendom, against the claims of Orthodoxy with its numerous adherents; and he knows that there was a time when Christianity, though it may now include a fifth part of the population of the globe (counting its "barbarous" as well as its "civilized" adherents), only required a single upper chamber for the gathering of all its open believers. Mr. Clarke must simply have meant to state the truism, for what purpose the report does not make quite clear, that at present there are not so many believers in free religion as in Christianity. He could hardly have meant to infer from this fact even the superior largeness and breadth of the one to the other as a religious movement, though this is what the reporter seems to infer from his statement; for Mr. Clarke has been in the minority too often to suppose that even the "largeness" of moral and religious movements can be measured in that way. But assuming, as we do, that he merely intended to make a comparison of numbers, he falls into an error which it is important to correct. He seems to think that free religion is confined to the known or active membership of the Free Religious Association,—to that and to the attendants, or a portion of the attendants, of the Radical Club in Boston. As if the organization of either of these bodies was the beginning of the free religious movement, or included it all! The Free Religious Association (for with that we are here chiefly concerned) only came into existence to represent a religious movement already developed,—a movement wide-spread in extent, and various in form. It is the ultimatum of the Protestant principle of free inquiry and private judgment in religious matters. The free religious movement is going on even among people who may never have heard of the Free Religious Association. It appears not only in America, but in England, in Germany, in Switzerland, in Italy, in India; among Jews and Hindus as well as Christians. There are thousands of Germans, in this country and in their native land, who have congregations on the principles of free religion. Free religion properly means emancipation from all external standards of religious authority, and the acceptance in their stead of the inner voice of reason, conscience, and spiritual intuition. And wherever and however this process of emancipation is going on, there is a vital part of the free religious movement. The Free Religious Association aims in some way to represent and give voice to the movement in its various phases, without, however, expecting to concentrate all its varied energies in its own or any single organization. Mr. Clarke himself is one of the workers for free religion. In his late learned articles in the Atlantic Monthly on Comparative Theology, or the Ethnic Religions, he has shown very clearly the natural resemblances and relationship between Christianity and other religions. He maintains that there is divine inspiration and divine truth in all the great religions, and that Christianity only differs from the others in the degree of truth and inspiration it manifests. He tries, indeed, at the end of each of these papers, to "put down the brakes" and stop the train of his logic, with the dogmatic assertion that Christianity contains the whole of spiritual truth, is universal, absolute, final; but his fellow-travellers who take this road of the natural relationship and development of religious systems, will not generally be likely to switch off on any side track, but will go through to the end—free religion. For they will naturally inquire, how does any finite intellect have the power to assert of any religious system, though it may contain all the truths of previous systems and something more, that it is full-sided and contains all spiritual truth without limitation?

As to the other criticism in the foregoing extract,—that free religion as yet is only a speculation and not practical, not philanthropic,—the members of the Free Religious Association will certainly not object that their religious faith shall be put to the test here implied. What fruits does it bear? Many of the supporters of the Free Religious Association hardly believe in any other sort of religion than just that practical kind described in this paragraph. Its members generally will accept this test, whether they are able to meet it or not; and Mr. Clarke has worked hand in hand with too many of them in various philanthropies and reforms to be capable of intimating that, as individuals, they are behind other people in practical religion. It can even be claimed that free religion has "helped the atheist to trust in God." Many a man who had been regarded, and who had regarded himself, as an atheist, acknowledged to Theodore Parker that he had been helped to believe in God, through his discourses. And Theodore Parker did not base his religious views on the authority of Christianity. He preached the principles of free religion, though under the different name, Absolute Religion. Others, among the younger and still living ministers of free religion, have received the same acknowledgement. And believers in free religion hold that the main hope of the world against the spread of atheistic and materialistic views, lies in absolutely freeing religion from all systems of authority, which attempt to entail the creeds of one generation upon succeeding generations, and in remanding faith back to the natural primary intuition of the human soul.

Again, to meet the objection which believers in free religion have to calling Jesus "Master" and "Lord" the reporter represents Mr. Clarke as saying:—

"All depended on what we meant by masters. There are two kinds of masters—the one kind enslaves us, the other sets us free. * * * The good master inspires us—the bad master merely orders us. Every earnest youth seeks and finds some master, some one who feeds his soul, inspires his mind, animates his life. The very persons who object to taking Jesus as their master, often accept Goethe, Carlyle, Emerson, or Theodore Parker, or perhaps Herbert Spencer, Darwin, or Tyndal. Every word these writers say seems to them plenarily inspired."

We never happen to have met any of these persons who believe in the plenary inspiration of Goethe, Emerson, Herbert Spencer, etc., or even anybody who would accept as true what either of these writers may have said simply because he said it. When Mr. Clarke meets any such persons, will he not tell them—he may even do it in behalf of the Free Religious Association—that they certainly fall under the same condemnation, both from free religion and free thought, which would come upon them for calling Jesus "Master?" But if Mr. Clarke calls Jesus "Master" in the same sense in which he and other literary and thinking persons call Goethe and Milton and Raphael and Shakespeare and Emerson "masters,"—that is, as aids, helpers, inspirers, nourishers, to true thought and feeling and living,—then we apprehend there is no difference between him and believers in free religion, on this point.

Another of Mr. Clarke's criticisms of free religion in this sermon is so strange that we must think that here at least the reporter misconceives his meaning. The report runs thus. The believers in free religion —"treat religion as if it were a speculation set afloat by some human brain, and which could be planted here and there by the will of man, and not as a grand providential movement, step by step, of the human race." * * * "These criticisms of Christianity arise from an ignorance of the nature of Christianity, the nature of man, and the laws of historic progress."

Now if the believers in free religion insist upon one thing more than another, it is that religious progress always follows natural laws of historical development,—that no religion, not even Christianity itself, is planted outright by the will of man, nor by any instantaneous action of the will of God, but that every religion, including Christianity, has natural relations to the antecedent conditions of humanity, where it has appeared, and is the natural resultant of the same kind of causes that are always at work in human history. The believers in free religion believe so thoroughly in the capacity and dignity of human nature, that they have no difficulty in thinking it capable, in the natural order of development, without any miraculous aid, of producing Christianity with all its truths and excellencies, and the character of Jesus with all its moral symmetry and beauty, and whatever spiritual perfection may be claimed for him. And so fundamental and prominent is this principle in all their discussions, as marking the difference between their views of Christianity and the popularly received view, that it seems impossible that Mr. Clarke should imagine them to hold the opposite opinion. Believers in free religion are, indeed, as Mr. Clarke says, "endless seekers"; they never expect to find an end to that which is infinite—never expect to see the day when all truth will be known. Neither does Mr. Clarke. But this is not to say that points and principles of truth have not been discovered that are absolute and irrefragable. The believers in free religion have as much past behind them as Christianity; for they have Christianity itself, and all that that rests upon back to the first day of creation.

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEEVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

JUVENILE WIT.—The boys of "Uppingham School" publish a periodical which contains the following parody on "examination papers"—

"Supposing the river Ganges to be three cubits in breadth (which it isn't,) what is the average height of the Alps, stocks being at 91 $\frac{1}{2}$?"

"If, in autumn, apples cost 4d. per pound in London, and potatoes a shilling a score in Spring, when will greengages be sold in Paris at 1 1 2d. each, Spanish oranges being at a discount of five per cent.?"

"If two men can kill two brace of partridges in going up the right side of a rectangular turnip-field, how many would be killed by five men and a terrier pup in going down the other side?"

"If a milkmaid, 4 feet 20 inches in height, while sitting on a three-legged stool, took four pints of milk out of every fifteen cows, what was the size of the field in which the animals grazed, and what was the girl's name and age?"

"If 30,000,000,000 of human beings have lived since the beginning of the world, how many may we safely say will die before the end of it? N. B.—This example to be worked out by simple subtraction, algebra, and the rule of three. Compare results."

ANTEDILUVIAN.—A certain minister at Newport, R. I., on Sunday evening last, said that Abraham Lincoln met his violent death as a punishment for stepping aside from his high calling to attend the theatre. And this in December, 1863!—American Spiritualist.

PROTESTANT EXCLUSIVENESS.—The houses of worship are free all over the world, among all religions except Christianity; and of the three great divisions of Christendom—Romanist, Greek, and Protestant—the last one alone adopts the exclusive system; a system whose practical working, in our large cities, is to shut out from the churches a large part of the poorer people.—Sat. Eve'g. Post (Phil.)

GENIUS.—It is no man's business whether he has genius or not; work he must, whatever he is, but quietly and steadily; and the natural and unforced results of such work will be always the thing God meant him to do, and will be his best. No agonies nor heart-rendings will enable him to do any better. If he is a great man, they will be great things, but always, if thus peacefully done, good and right; always, if restlessly and ambitiously done, false, hollow, and despicable.—Ruskin.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL AND PHYSICAL CULTURE, or the Philosophy of True Living, by Prof. F. G. WELCH, Instructor in Yale College. New York: Wood & Holbrook.

In these days of so much trashy literature, it is refreshing to see a book that teaches something of practical importance. The one before us promises to be of much usefulness, as it abounds in matter that will put the reader to thinking concerning those things which are of the utmost importance to all. It treats—first: Of all that pertains to the subject of Physical Culture. Secondly: All that it is necessary to know concerning the House WE LIVE IN. Thirdly: The Culture of the Mental and Moral. It contains beside, the complete Dio Lewis System of Musical or Parlor Gymnastics, with many suggestions, additions and improvements. Here are four volumes in one. Its subjects, too little heeded, too long neglected, are of vital importance, and needful to all. It contains many valuable hints on health—the means of guarding against sickness, the proper articles of food,—all about our physical structure, and the care of the body—in a word—"True Living." It is noble in its purpose and counsel. None can read it without becoming higher, nobler and better. It is therefore worthy a place in every family. It occupies a new field and will have an extensive circulation. The College Courant says of it "There is sufficient useful and acceptable information in Parts III and IV to stock a new department, in any newspaper or magazine, for months."

We have here a handsomely bound, beautifully printed 12mo volume, 444 pp. It will be sent by return post on receipt of price, $2.25. Address— F. G. WELCH, Yale College, New Haven, Conn. 6-1]

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

UNITARIANISM VERSUS FREEDOM.

[Read to the (then) Unitarian Society of Toledo, Sunday morning, Aug. 15, 1869.]

"Here I stand. I can do no otherwise. God help me! Amen."

MARTIN LUTHER.

At the conclusion of last Sunday's services, the following resolutions were submitted to you for your action:—

"WHEREAS, The 'National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches,' in the Preamble to its Constitution adopted at New York in 1865, professed its faith in Jesus of Nazareth as King, Lord, and Christ, thus making a virtual creed its bond of union; and voted down by a large majority the proposition made at Syracuse, in 1866, to abolish this creed and reform the Preamble; and at last won the consent of the minority at New York, in 1868, to the retention of the Preamble as it stands, unchanged and unchangeable:—

Resolved, That we regard this action as inconsistent with the great principle of spiritual freedom.

Resolved, That we regard it as our duty to make earnest and emphatic protest against all such ecclesiastical encroachments upon the liberty of the individual.

Resolved, That our corporate name be henceforth changed from "The Unitarian Society" to "The First Independent Society."

Resolved, That the Secretary of the American Unitarian Association be requested to erase the name of this Society from the list of Unitarian churches in the denominational Year-Book.

Resolved, That the Trustees of this Society be authorized and requested to take all steps which may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect."

Action upon these resolutions having been postponed until next Sunday, it has been suggested to me, —and I cheerfully comply with the suggestion,—that I might profitably devote this morning to an explanation of the true intent of these resolutions, the reasons why I offer them at all, and especially the reasons why I offer them at this time. I do this with great willingness, because I know that some misconceptions have arisen on these points; and since I regard the adoption of resolutions like these as certain to follow a clear perception of the duty of the hour, I wish to stimulate thought and excite discussion concerning the action they contemplate. It is error, not truth, that shuns the light; and it would be unworthy of a believer in Free Religion to seek to promote its interests except by the frankest and most fearless methods. If the important step I propose were not demanded by the principle of spiritual freedom,—if it were not absolutely essential to the moral integrity of my own position,—if it were not equally essential to the integrity of every Unitarian society that intelligently makes spiritual freedom its corner-stone,—then there would be no occasion to propose it at all. But such, in my opinion, is the case. The ideas I have advanced as my own faith, and the faith I serve, point directly to this step; and these ideas are the only compass by which I sail the sea of life. To throw them overboard for any reason would be to me shipwreck of character and self-respect.

When Dr. Channing became the recognized spokesman of the early Unitarian protest against New England Orthodoxy, he planted himself on a platform of four leading ideas:—

1. The Unity of God, which involved denial of the Trinity, and of the Deity of Jesus.
2. The dignity of human nature.
3. The sacred right of spiritual freedom.
4. The Lordship and divine authority of Jesus Christ.

The first of these, the Unity of God, gave rise to the word "Unitarian,"—at first a nickname, afterwards a cherished denominational name. From the noun "Unity," i. e. the Unity of God, was thus derived the noun and adjective "Unitarian," i. e. one who believes in the Unity of God. Both "Unity" of God and "Unitarian" thus expressed the same doctrine or dogma of God's oneness, as opposed to Trinity and Trinitarian, which expressed his threeness. That these are simple facts, is shown by the following testimony of Prof. Norton:—

"The common use of the words 'Unitarians' and 'Unitarianism,' to denote a sect and the opinions of that sect, was, I think, introduced among those who had before been called 'liberal Christians' by Mr. Channing, through his Letter to Mr. Thacher, published in 1815. The Orthodox had endeavored to fix that name on liberal Christians invidiously, for the purpose of confounding them with the English Unitarians of that time, and of making them responsible for all the speculations of that body. Mr. Channing, though recognizing it as an ambiguous term, and remonstrating against the use made of it by the Orthodox, and carefully defining that by Unitarianism he meant only Anti-trinitarianism, yet adopted the appellation as the distinctive name of those in whose defence he was writing. . . . The name 'Unitarian' gradually became prevalent among us, and those by whom it was assumed combined into a sect. . . . It was explained as denoting merely a disbelief of the doctrine of the Trinity, and as including all (that is, as was then meant, all Christians) who rejected that doctrine, whatever might be their differences of opinion respecting the language of Scripture which has been supposed to relate to it. . . . When a Unitarian was first spoken of among us, a Unitarian Christian, as I have said, was meant. But the adjunct 'Unitarian' has succeeded, to a great extent, in dispossessing the substantive 'Christian' of its power; and the Christian Unitarians among us have in consequence found themselves brought into strange fellowship with unbelievers and pantheists." [Prof. Andrews Norton, Tracts on Christianity, pp. 11—13.]

Now, as time went on, two tendencies revealed themselves among the Unitarians, creating at last two parties,—conservative and radical. The conservatives, as usual, adhered closely to the platform of their acknowledged leader, Dr. Channing; the radicals began to suspect that this platform was self-contradictory, and endeavored to reform it by discarding the authority of Jesus. Theodore Parker was the chief, and almost sole, exponent of this tendency for some time. He believed in the unity of God, in the dignity of human nature, in the right of spiritual freedom, as Channing did; but he began to protest against the authority of Jesus, as inconsistent with spiritual freedom. Thus began an internal conflict among the Unitarians which has gone on, increasing from year to year, until it is plain that lasting union is impossible on the platform of Dr. Channing. From the point of view which I hold, it appears evident that Dr. Channing took his stand on Christianity and Free Religion at the same time, not perceiving the incompatibility of the two. His assertion of the priceless worth of spiritual freedom was due to his Free Religion; and his assertion of the Lordship of Jesus was due to his Christianity. These two assertions are contradictory; and the issue between conservatism and radicalism in the Unitarian denomination thus dates from Dr. Channing's attempt to reconcile antagonistic principles. It is the "irrepressible conflict" over again; and all endeavors to compromise it have failed hitherto, as they will fail hereafter. The inherent weakness of all forms of Protestant Christianity is thus laid bare most conspicuously in the direct self-contradiction of the Unitarian platform; the idea of spiritual freedom is brought directly into conflict with the Christian Confession. Nothing can be more apparent, therefore, than that the decisive battle between Christianity and Free Religion is to be fought out in Unitarianism, the border-land between the two,—the Kentucky of American Religion, everlastingly "halting between two opinions." For this reason, the warfare of ideas now going on among Unitarians acquires an importance altogether disproportioned to the magnitude of the contending armies. It is the great warfare of the age between Slavery and Liberty, carried up to a higher plane, and waged about the position whose capture or successful defence must determine the future of mankind. If Jesus is justly King, Lord, and Christ, then Monarchy ought to be universal, and Rome is right; but if the human soul is justly its own King and Lord, then Democracy ought to be universal, and America is right. The conservative Unitarian, cleaving to the Christian Confession, ought logically to retreat to Romish Christianity; while the radical Unitarian, cleaving to the right of spiritual freedom, ought to advance to Free Religion. In Unitarianism, therefore, I see the last desperate struggle between slavery and freedom, barbarism and civilization, ignorance and science, the dark ages and the nineteenth century. It turns on the truth or falsity of the Christian Confession, that Jesus is rightful King, Lord, and Christ. No sensible man can regard this issue as involving mere theological subtleties; for, inasmuch as history is always, in the long run, true to logic, the settlement of this issue involves the whole future welfare of the race. Whether the Church shall absorb the State, or the State shall absorb the Church, depends wholly on the answer time shall give to the great question now in debate in the Unitarian denomination.

From the time of Channing until about three or four years ago the radical tendency among the Unitarians was slowly gaining ground,—since Parker's time, quite rapidly. This gradual victory of radicalism alarmed the conservatives, and overcame their inherited dislike of a sectarian policy and attitude. They desired to abandon the system of complete congregational independence hitherto jealously guarded by Unitarian churches everywhere, and planned to effect an ecclesiastical union, which, by its prestige and moral influence, should overawe and repress the radicalism of the rising generation. The plan was formed and executed with great shrewdness. Proposing to "organize the Liberal Church of America," and thus effectually disguising their sectarian and reactionary purpose, the leaders summoned a great convention to meet at New York in April, 1865,—not composed, as hitherto had been the custom in all Unitarian conventions, of all who might wish to come, but solely of delegates elected by the churches. The result of this change was to secure a thoroughly conservative body; for, at the East, the persons of wealth and influence who would most naturally be elected, are, nine cases in ten, conservatives. It was thus practically a packed convention. A constitution was adopted, with a preamble into which the Christian Confession had been skillfully woven, without, however, seeming to be what it has since turned out to be,—a creed. Even as it was, this creed did not escape challenge and opposition; but, after a few words of protest by radicals, all debate was cut off by calling for the "previous question"; and thus the denomination were saddled with what Channing himself most earnestly opposed, a creed of human making. Its influence at once began to be felt. Young radicals began to be afraid to utter their thought as boldly as before; for it was plain that whoever wished to "rise in his profession," as the unworthy phrase is, must be careful not to oppose the will of the majority. Fear took the place of courage,—policy, of principle. At first, although I had voted against the preamble at New York, I was doubtful of its real intent; but the use immediately made of it by the conservative leaders revealed this unmistakably. At Syracuse, therefore, in October, 1866, I brought forward a substitute for the Preamble, simply pledging the Conference to spiritual freedom; but after a long debate of several hours, it was voted down, two to one. I was taught a most useful lesson,—that no Christian sect, however fairly it may profess to cherish liberty, either can or will live up to its professions. I publicly withdrew from the Conference, and, after a while, from the denomination and from the Christian Church. Last autumn the third meeting of the Conference was held at New York once more; and the moral poison of the creed had so weakened the radicals, that, at a caucus of their own held before the Conference met, they agreed that they would not attack the Preamble, lest they should lose their "positions." They voted to content themselves with a new Article to the Constitution, which declares that the Constitution is binding only on a majority of those who meet to act under that very Constitution, and which thus makes the Conference inexplicably ridiculous in the eyes of all who know what organization means. At this Conference, both radicals and conservatives declared themselves to be Christians, and agreed to let the Preamble, with its Christian Confession, stand henceforth untouched. Thus conservatives have won a complete victory by the crucifixion of spiritual freedom. They have succeeded in reversing the engines, and are hurrying the train backward as fast as it was previously moving forward. None but those who will call themselves Christians can belong to the Conference. The whole denomination have acquiesced in the doings of the Conference; individuals, here and there, have protested, but no society has done so within my knowledge. The whole denomination, therefore, stand committed by the action of their Conferences, and must remain so, until they choose either to reverse this action or to abolish the Conferences altogether. It is visionary to expect either of these things to happen. For over two years I hoped against hope, and saw the Unitarian policy growing more and more sectarian every day. Now I am outside; and there is no bribe big enough to tempt me back into the abandoned jail. The Unitarian creed is henceforth the Christian Confession; and, were it not coupled with loud professions of fealty to freedom, it would be entitled to respect. It is the blowing hot and cold with one mouth that offends the moral sense of every true liberal, who prefers an open rebel to a border-state loyalist. An earnest and thorough-going Christian, who believes in his creed, and considers a free thinker a traitor to the Christ, is worthy of sincere respect; but it is hard indeed to respect a trimmer. The Unitarian denomination, as a whole, is to-day trimming; and its policy merits the rebuke of every man who has faith in principle. That is why I refuse, either directly or indirectly, to be compromised even by its name. I do not believe the Unitarian creed, and withhold my respect from the Unitarian policy of riding two horses at the same time.

But it is often urged, "Why can't you act with the Conference, despite its creed, when the Conference distinctly states this creed to be that of the majority alone?"

Because, if it professes to believe in freedom, it ought to recognize the equal rights of all its members; whereas it allows the conservative majority to assert their convictions collectively, and forbids the radical minority to do the same. The way to respect the freedom of all its members is to have no public creed, unless all agree in it. The consistent believers in creeds admit no dissenter into their fellowship; the consistent believers in freedom forbear to have any creed to dissent from. Is it no offence against equal justice, when the Unitarian Conference throws the entire prestige of the denomination in favor of the majority's creed, and practically throws the odium of heresy on the minority who cannot accept it? The whole moral influence of the Unitarian denomination is directly against the ideas I believe in; and, by consenting to belong to it, I must perforce to that extent work against my own ideas. Every creed makes a sect; and I reject creeds because I believe in the brotherhood of man. Every creed makes spiritual slaves; and I reject creeds because I believe in spiritual freedom. In short, I not only refuse to submit to a creed myself, but, for the very same reasons, must stand aloof from all associations that submit to creeds. It is the creed-principle that I protest against, not merely the Unitarian creed in particular; and by acting with any creed-bound body, directly or indirectly, I myself sanction the creed-principle to that extent. The Unitarian denomination is simply a collection of individual societies; its influence is simply the sum of the influences of these societies. Whatever society, or whatever individual, consents to be a part of the whole denomination, even to the extent of merely bearing its name without protest, so far helps to swell the influence of that denomination and name,—an influence which is practically determined by the action of the majority. To be sure, the actual influence exerted by only one society or individual may be small; but it is the duty of each society and each individual to throw that influence, small as it may be, on the right side. In an election, every vote counts; and it is the voter's duty to vote right. Under reactionary leaders, the Unitarians have become a party working against spiritual freedom in the interest of the Christian Confession; and whoever believes in freedom more than in the Christian Confession, is obliged to stand aloof from this party. But the only way to do this thoroughly is to withdraw from the denomination and discard its name. Such action is a vote, cast on the right side. What good does it do for a man to talk Republican, if he votes Democratic? His deeds speak louder than his words; his vote drowns his talk. You and I may talk Free Religion as much as we please; but if we still cleave to the Unitarian name and sect, we vote Christianity. Now you must decide for yourselves how you will vote; but, as for me, I mean to talk and vote in the same way. I mean to be consistent,—to stand utterly aloof from the Unitarian sect, and discard emphatically the Unitarian name. I mean, in other words to practise what I preach,—Free Religion, and not Christianity. That is why I regard it as essential to my character and my self-respect to be resolute in not connecting myself, even indirectly, with Unitarianism.

But to some of you who are not familiar with the history and spirit of the Unitarian movement, it seems trivial and over-scrupulous to care about names. "What's in a name?" says Shakespeare. "A great deal," says Common Sense. The name of an Association is the proclamation of its objects and principles: it condenses into a small space a whole speech addressed to the world at large. If the name is not an honest one, it tells a lie to the world. For instance, many and many a European has been induced to join the Democratic party, and then to vote the Democratic ticket, simply because the name has deceived him; he has been simple enough to believe that, in American politics, Democratic means democratic. Those who believed in true democracy have been obliged to drop the name, or else help the party that "takes its name in vain." It is just so with the name Unitarian. It once stood for spiritual freedom; it now stands for spiritual bondage, and all who wear it now, so far help the party of spiritual bondage. This may seem a strong statement; let me illustrate it by a case in point.

For nearly four years I was minister of a Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., and was then obliged to resign through conservative opposition. This taught me a lesson, and opened my eyes. When I preached my farewell sermon, I repeated what I had said some weeks before, that henceforth I should stand outside of Unitarianism, and Christianity, too.

A movement sprang up at the church door to keep me in Dover as a preacher on that basis. I consented, provided the old Society should change its name, or else a new Independent Society should be formed. My friends, many of whom were outsiders, agreed to form a new Independent Society; the radical majority of the Unitarian Society voted to give to the new Societly the use of the Unitarian church for half of the time. This exasperated the conservative Unitarians, who, being encouraged by their fellow-conservatives in Boston and elsewhere, went to law about it, applying to the Supreme Court for an injunction against my preaching in that church. Now the articles of association of the old Society were just as broad as yours; but its name was the "The First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover." After several months of delay, the Supreme Court of New Hampshire issued the following injunction:—

STRAFFORD SS. SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT, }
December Law Term, 1868.

Sam'l Hale et als. vs. Charles E. Everett et als.

Upon hearing the parties and their proofs,

It is ordered,

That the prayer of said Bill be granted, with costs taxed at one hundred and fifty-three dollars and sixty-one cents:

And that said Jasper H. York, George L. Folsom and Carl H. Horsch, wardens of said First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover, and all other wardens and members of said Society, be jointly and severally strictly enjoined and forbidden to hire, employ, allow, suffer or permit, said Francis E. Abbot, or any other person, to preach and inculcate in the meeting-house of said Society, doctrines subversive of the fundamental principles of Christianity, as generally received and held by the denomination of Christians known as Unitarians:

Or to employ, suffer or permit to preach in said meeting-house, any person who rejects Christianity altogether, or who teaches that, as a system of religion, Christianity is partly true and partly false:

Or who preaches and inculcates a disbelief in the doctrine of the Lordship and Messiahship of Jesus Christ, as taught by him in the New Testament Scriptures:

Or a disbelief in Jesus Christ as the great Head of the Church, or of his Divine Mission and Authority as a religious teacher, as thus taught by him:

Or who preaches and inculcates a denial of the doctrine that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament do contain a Divine Revelation, given by Inspiration of God, and containing a sufficient and perfect rule of faith and practice:

And that said Francis E. Abbot, and all and every other person or persons, be forever strictly enjoined and forbidden to occupy said meeting-house of said society, for the purpose of preaching and inculcating said disbeliefs, denials, and doctrines, herein before specially prohibited to be taught therein, and every and all other doctrine or doctrines subversive of the fundamental principles of Christianity, as generally received and held by the denomination of Christians known as Unitarians.

IRA PERLEY, Chief Justice.

A true copy of the original decree of Court on file in this office.

Attest: DANIEL HALL, Clerk.

The Supreme Court of New Hampshire has thus judicially imposed a very stringent creed on the Unitarian Society in Dover, on application of the Unitarians themselves. It rests this decision avowedly and solely on the ground that the name "Unitarian Christian" means a whole list of old dogmas. So it is the name, and the name alone, that supports this legal outrage on the right of the majority of the Unitarian Society to manage the affairs of that Society. This decision was approved and endorsed by the Liberal Christian, and printed without a word of protest by the Christian Register; and these two papers represent the fair average sentiment of the Unitarian sect.

I believe myself, therefore, to have thus abundant reason to believe Unitarian professions of freedom of thought and speech to be insincere,—to reject the Unitarian name, and to count it a badge of spiritual servitude. Whatever influence it exerts is hostile to the spiritual freedom that I believe in; and to wear it, or uphold it, or in any way extend it, is so far to endorse the illiberality it represents, and to be unfaithful to the great cause of Free Religion. The name is a flag; and I could never have fought the battles of the Union under the flag of the Slave-Confederacy.

But still some of you ask,—“Why can't you preach to us on your own ground, even if we still call ourselves Unitarians? Why is it not exacting and dictatorial to require us to change the name of our Society, just to please you?” These two questions I ought certainly to answer, and I will try to do so.

1. I cannot become your minister at all, on the old ideas of the ministry. The minister used to be installed “over his society,” as the phrase went; but if I stay with you, I wish to become a member of your society. I wish to share the same work, and bear the same name, and in all things be one of yourselves. It is merely a subdivision of labor that puts me in the pulpit, and you in the pews, and the choir in the singing seats; we are all on the same level, engaged in the same work, each according to his ability. Hence your name becomes my name, if I join your society; and a false name will certainly exclude me. If you really want me, it must be because you want to hear the truth; and if the name we are to bear in common misrepresents the truth I must work for, I must decline to serve the truth itself under false pretences. The Liberal Christian recently sneered at me, who cannot conscientiously call myself a Christian, for “preaching as candidate to a Christian society in a Christian church.” This is something I have not done; but would you wish me to justify the sneer by doing it? Every Unitarian Society is a Christian Society, at least in this country; and I preach as candidate to no Christian Society. With my views of Christianity, simple decency would forbid this. I have too much respect for the natural propriety of things.

2. Believing that the Unitarian policy is hostile to freedom and injurious to personal character in many ways, and that every society calling itself Unitarian so far aids and abets this policy, I see that consistency with principle requires me not to sanction by action what I must condemn by speech. You can find enough Unitarian ministers to serve you, if you wish to remain a Unitarian Society. But feeling it my duty to preach against sectarianism, I feel it my duty to act against it, too. Before long, you would yourselves perceive the inconsistency between my principles and my practice, were I to waive all scruples and consent to compromise; and of what use could I be to you, when you had learned to despise me? No, friends,—I can waive no scru-ple and make no compromise. Free Religion demands first of all obedience to the inward, self-imposed law; and seeing that settlement with a Unitarian society is practically to some extent an endorsement of the Unitarian policy, I must decline to make any such endorsement. I can do more good in the end by adhering steadfastly to the ideas I serve, than by making ever so slight a sacrifice of them for any reason whatever. I see that a little PRACTICAL radicalism,—a little putting into practice of what Free Religion logically requires,—will do more to arouse thought and waken a manly spirit among men, than all the preaching I could do in fifty years. The times require more boldness and less conformity. Radicalism leads straight out of Christianity into Free Religion; it demands the sacrifice of all sectarian names and ecclesiastical connections, in order that the brotherhood of man may rest on simple community of nature; it declares that the retention of these is weakness and inconsistency, and summons us to accept unshrinkingly the logical results of great ideas. How, then, could I consent to join any society, if it persisted in a position I could not honestly share? Even if, as is likely, I should find no other society, I shall do better service to the cause of Free Religion by living it than by preaching it. Let others, if they please, still linger in the precincts of the Christian church; I am out, and do not mean to halt on the threshold with one foot still inside the door.

These, then, are some of the reasons why I cannot connect myself with a society still burdened with the Christian or Unitarian name. I should be out of place there, and should be fatally embarrassed in my conscience and my work. Let me answer the other question,—“why is it not exacting and dictatorial to require a change of name by this Society, as a condition of my stay?”

In the first place, I exact nothing, I dictate nothing, I require nothing. I simply state the work I mean to do, and the terms on which I can honorably do it. I respect your freedom as much as I ask you to respect mine. Every laborer has a right to state on what terms he can work; they may not suit, and he may not be employed, but no one should think him exacting for simply stating his terms. Now my terms,—the only terms I have made,—are, that, while working for Free Religion, I shall not be expected also to work against it. I cannot afford to be making apologies, or explaining to every critic how it happens that I, who am not a Christian, am preaching to a Christian Society. I cannot afford to act in any ambiguous manner: it does not agree with my constitution to sit on the fence. I only stipulate that the ideas I work for shall not be compromised by my practical connections. Now if these terms, simple as they are, seem too onerous to be accepted,—if it seems too great a sacrifice to give up the Unitarian name and connection,—if your attachment to Christianity is stronger than your faith in Free Religion,—I shall certainly have no reason to complain. I require absolutely nothing. I only submit my terms, to see if they are satisfactory; and shall be perfectly content with your decision, be it what it may. For understand, I have not come to you as an office-seeker, scheming for an appointment,—not as a candidate, hoping to find a snug berth; far from it. I come to you as a man whose heart is given to a great cause, and whose dearest interests are the interests of his cause; I come to you to see whether the work I have to do can best be done here or elsewhere; I come as an equal to an equal, asking no favors, but submitting to your judgment the plans I have formed and the way in which the plans must be executed. If we can agree upon the plans and upon the methods, I trust we shall be close friends for many a long day; if not, we will part, friends still. I ask nothing from you as concession on your part; I can make no concession on my part. What I hope is, that we shall agree that the ground of Free Religion is the true ground to stand upon, and that both you and I, freely obeying the Spirit of Truth, may find ourselves able to work together. The step I have proposed appears to me essential to the work I have to do; I cannot do my work in any Christian or Unitarian organization. Let us concede nothing on either side, and not dream for a moment of doing anything in this matter merely for the sake of pleasing each other. But let us discuss this thing fully, and settle it by principle. If the step seems to you wise and noble, take it: if not, refrain. I only wish to remind you that this step is what I fully and fairly told you I should propose before I came to your city. The offering of these resolutions simply carries out the proposal I then made. Allow me to quote a passage from the reply I sent to your letter of invitation:—

“Let me come straight to the point,” I wrote, “and deal with you as I hope to be dealt with by you. If your society is resolved at all events to retain the names Unitarian and Christian, and listen to no reasons that would lead them out upon the broad ground of absolute Independency, I must say, somewhat sadly but very firmly, I am not the man you seek. But if you are willing to have the question raised, and not afraid to hear why I regard the shaking-off of all sectarian names and connections as of profound practical consequence, then I shall be glad to spend the months of July and August with you, and submit to your judgment the terms on which I can honorably continue to preach. I have no desire to dictate to any one,—I have only a determination to square my own course with principles that bend for no one. At the end of the two months, if you still choose to be Unitarians, we may at least part good friends; or if you are willing then to take a more advanced position, we may yet work together for years in the cause of Free Religion. Unless you feel willing to have me raise this question, I ought to say beforehand that California has not gold enough to tempt me to connect myself, as its minister, with any Christian Society. It would be neither right nor decent for me to do so. I have taken the only ground that is absolutely free, and wait till the world moves forward to it. Do not suppose that for an instant I could think of any compromise,—any concession to expediency. I could better afford to go to the almshouse than budge an inch from my position."

When, after language so frank as this, I received a renewed invitation to come, I took it for granted you would all expect me to propose the step indicated by the resolutions. I took it for granted that you all understood on what conditions I could stay with you, and that my business was simply to explain them more fully and then submit the whole matter to your vote. Pardon me for feeling some surprise that the resolutions should be unexpected by any one. I should never have dreamed of coming here to propose them, if I had not supposed I had obtained your full permission beforehand. They simply carry out the intentions unequivocally expressed in my first letter; and the reply I received to this led me to suppose that you were all expecting them. They bring before you the only terms on which I can conscientiously undertake the work of the ministry again, either here or elsewhere. Let me now condense their meaning into a few words.

The corporate name of your Society (and every Society must have some corporate name, without which it cannot hold property at all) is "The Unitarian Society of Toledo." There is also a separate church organization, with the name "Unity Church." Both these names mean precisely the same thing, namely, the "Unity of God,"—the doctrine which first gave name to the Unitarian denomination. Mr. Hepworth's church in Boston, Mr. Collyer's in Chicago, and I believe other Unitarian churches have adopted this name, "Unity Church." As you now are, therefore, you constitute part of the Unitarian denomination, and are enrolled on the official list of Unitarian churches. These resolutions propose to make a protest against the Unitarian creed, and to make it in the only effective way by a complete separation of your society from the Unitarian denomination. If you wish to make the protest at all, and to declare your independence of all sects and sectarian names, these resolutions point out the way to do it. The question is a perfectly plain one,—do you vote to be henceforth within or without the Unitarian Christian denomination? If you think the true ground for a liberal society to be independency, that is, liberty, and accordingly pass the resolutions, I can honorably accept the invitation which, with a unanimity exceedingly grateful to my feelings, you extended to me last Sunday to become your minister. If otherwise, I could not accept the invitation without violating my own conscience.

I state this simply because I wish to be perfectly frank with you,—not because I seek to influence your decision by any personal feelings. On the contrary, I urge upon you to put my going or staying entirely out of the question, and decide the matter on its own merits alone. It has no more to do with me, than it has to do with your minister who so recently left you. It is purely a question of principles, a question between authority and liberty, Christianity and Free Religion; it will be no compliment to me to accept these resolutions, it will be no compliment to Mr. Camp to reject them. Put persons out of your minds altogether, and meet the issue with an independence and freedom from prejudice worthy of its importance. I can see no advantage to be gained by postponing the matter beyond next Sunday; the case is fairly before you, and a week is as good as a year. One request I have to make,—do the thing cleanly, or not at all. If it is left half done and half undone, I shall not know how to act. The resolutions are very simple, and contain nothing not essential to a thorough-going separation from the Unitarian sect. If you change one name, change both; for they both mean precisely the same thing, i. e. the doctrine of the unity of God, and equally connect you with the Unitarians. And do not, out of an over-generous courtesy to the Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, leave it at his option to erase or continue your Society in the list of Unitarian churches; if you are in earnest, you will settle that question for yourselves without any ifs or buts. And do not insert the word—"Religious"—in the new name, if you adopt it. As you and I understand that word, the Society will be more thoroughly and profoundly religious than ever before, on its new basis; but our works will speak for us, and make it plain. We may safely leave that word—"Religious"—to be taken for granted; it need not be expressed in the name,—it will far better be expressed in the practical character and conduct of the Society. Let the widow and the orphan and the wretched and the poor have cause to speak of our religiousness, and let us say as little about it as possible. Besides, there are some excellent persons, who ought by all means to be welcomed into a truly liberal society, who yet attach to the word "religion" only the meanings to which it has been degraded. To them it means superstition, not service of man in the divinest spirit of love; and we ought not to let a word exclude such persons from our fellowship in good works. The problem is, to find a name that shall be devoid even of the semblance of a creed, which might wound the tenderest conscience. The name—"First Independent Society"—is open to no suspicion on this score, even by the conscientious atheist who should be drawn to us by his secret sympathies and aspirations. I want to meet such men on equal terms, and am willing to waive any word, however dear to me, rather than run the risk of grieving another as I was grieved at Syracuse. Let us strive to put our religion into our lives, rather than into our titles, and thus prove that religion is only the truer, the holier, the tenderer, for being also free.

COMMENTS OF THE PRESS.

"The First Independent Society of Toledo" has been passing resolutions changing its name to that from "The Unitarian Society of Toledo," by which it has hitherto been known, and furthermore requesting its name to be erased from the list of Unitarian churches. The grounds upon which this recalcitrant action is based are that the Unitarian Church in its corporate capacity has been guilty of passing resolutions acknowledging "Jesus of Nazareth as King, Lord, and Christ." This acknowledgement the Unitarians of Toledo consider to be "inconsistent with the great principle of spiritual freedom," inasmuch as it "makes a virtual creed its bond of union." This sort of thing is revolting to the Unitarian mind of Toledo, and hence this action. The conduct of those people in this matter is doubtless shared by most of the come-outers, or "free religionists," as they call themselves, who met in Boston a few months ago, and upon whose deliberations The World at that time editorially commented. It is very difficult to see what the mutineers would substitute for a "virtual" or an explicit creed as a bond of spiritual union. As idem sentire de republica is the strongest and, indeed, the only practical political copula, so it would seem identity of sentiment in matters spiritual ought to be the only bond of spiritual union. If religion be held to consist in works of charity and mercy, one can join a dozen charitable associations without making any profession of religion at all. But if the church is to consist of "a congregation of faithful men," surely the first essential to its existence is that the faith its members hold should be the same for all. Otherwise, what use is there for a church or a "First Independent Society of Toledo" at all? The scheme which these religious guerillas propose to themselves appears to be that a number of men shall club to get a preacher, provided he preaches nothing which anybody disagrees with. In that case, he must preach practically nothing at all.—New York World.

MR. ABBOT FINDS A FLOCK.—Mr. Francis E. Abbot, late of Dover, N. H., where he assisted at a separation of the Unitarian society, of which he was pastor, has ceased to call himself a "Christian" minister; but, with that well understood, he has lately been invited to the "first independent society" of Toledo, O., to become its minister for a year. The vote inviting him passed 60 to 2. This society has heretofore been called "the Unitarian society of Toledo," but by a series of resolutions, passed August 22, it has voted to change its name to that given above, and to have itself erased from the list of Unitarian churches in the country.

It may be remarked here that the late decision of the New Hampshire Supreme Court in regard to the Dover Unitarian church, had not the assent of all the judges. Judge Doe has prepared a dissenting opinion, and Judge Smith, being a member of the society in Dover, did not sit in the case.—Springfield Republican, Sept. 4, 1869.

It is significant of the spread of "heresy" in the church that the following resolutions could be adopted by a Unitarian society, in Toledo, Ohio. They mark an important epoch, as they are the first public protest made by a hitherto Christian society against the confession of Jesus as the Christ in behalf of religious independence. Rev. F. E. Abbot is the minister of the society. He told the people there that he should never connect himself again with a "Christian" Society, but they urged him to come, notwithstanding. He then preached a series of five sermons, setting forth the contrast between Christianity and Free Religion, at the end of which he submitted these resolutions for their action, saying plainly that his stay depended on their adoption. After a fortnight's earnest discussion, they were adopted. The vote to give Mr. Abbot a call, was over sixty to two. [We omit the resolutions, which are printed elsewhere.—Ed.]—Boston Commonwealth, Sept. 11, 1869.

We can easily understand that a Christian society may be willing to hear a Jew, a Mohammedan, a Brahmin, or a teacher of any other religion; and the novelty of the thing may make them desire to hear what such a teacher may have to say. But we do not see how a man who cannot conscientiously call himself a "Christian," can consistently accept an invitation to preach for a Christian society, in a Christian church, particularly as a candidate for settlement.—Liberal Christian, (N. Y.) July 10, 1869.

There is a limit to the liberality of the Liberal Christian, which says:

"We can easily understand that a Christian Society may be willing to hear a Jew, a Mohammedan, a Brahmin, or a teacher of any other religion; and the novelty of the thing may make them desire to hear what such a teacher may have to say. But we do not see how a man who cannot conscientiously call himself 'Christian' can consistently accept an invitation to preach for a Christian society, in a Christian church, particularly as a candidate for settlement."

Rev. Mr. Abbot, lately of Dover, N. H. must be "candidating" somewhere. A positive tone of opposition to any philosophy which makes Heaven and immortality a myth, is characterizing that able paper. We find among our Unitarian exchanges some of the most able defences of supernaturalism against infidelity.—New York Independent, July 15, 1869.

[The words we have italicized above show that the Independent "sees the point."—Ed.]

We have received a printed statement of the facts in relation to the change of the name of the Unitarian Society of Toledo to the First Independent Society. It has the signature of five trustees, and is drawn up in a spirit of fairness. The action of the parish was based on the idea that the Preamble of the National Conference is virtually a creed, which we regard a serious mistake. The society also voted to have its name erased from the list of Unitarian churches in the Year Book, and to excuse all persons who withdraw from the society in consequence of the change of name from paying their subscriptions to the church-edifice now in process of erection. It was complained that the vote authorizing these acts did not fairly express the views of the majority of the society; whereupon the whole subject was reconsidered at a full meeting of the actual members of the parish, and after a prolonged discussion the previous action was sustained by a vote of fifty, thirty-one persons withdrawing without voting. This change has been brought about chiefly through the influence of Rev. Francis E. Abbot, who was invited to supply the pulpit of the Unitarian society for a few weeks, and has now become minister of the new society. Mr. Abbot having taken a position "outside of Christianity" before going to Toledo, we find it hard to reconcile his course with our idea of fair dealing, but the action of the Toledo society in inviting him is still more remarkable. Those of our body, however, who regarded the action of the National Conference at its last meeting as a surrender to radicalism, have a sufficient answer in the course Mr. Abbot has pursued and the reasons upon which it is based.—Liberal Christian, Nov. 27, 1869.

["Our idea of fair dealing" must be very peculiar, if it would condemn a society of grown men and women for managing their own business, or if it would condemn a minister for supposing them able to do so. The above is simply the language of chagrined and disappointed sectarianism.—Ed.]

We have received, with a good deal of pleasure, the resolutions of the First Independent Society of Toledo, in Ohio, passed August 22, 1869. This society, having been called a Unitarian society, now starts afresh, changing its corporate name from the "First Unitarian Society of Toledo" to the "First Independent Society of Toledo."

The justification of this action is such as to confirm completely the views which the Christian Register has always taken of the action of our National Conferences. It is in the following preamble and resolutions: [Only the preamble and the first two resolutions were quoted.—Ed.]

When, in this journal, we took precisely the view of the action of the Second New York Conference which the preamble here takes, we were overwhelmed by a cloud of communications from our conservative friends, informing us that the "left wing" took no such view. It is a satisfaction to find that we precisely understood the position. At any future convention it will be remembered that the minority at New York agreed to "the retention of the preamble as it stands, unchanged and unchangeable;" that the Conference is on a Christian footing and cannot be taken off, and that though it claims no authority over its members, it is still able to state the convictions of its majority.—Christian Register, Oct. 1, 1869.

[Knowing that the American Unitarian Association did its best to prevent the passage of the resolutions, we take the words italicized in a Pickwickian sense.—Ed.]

TOLEDO, OHIO.—We have received a communication of considerable length relating to the affairs of what some regard as "the late" Unitarian society of that city. We have only room for the closing paragraphs, which contain the pith of what has been sent to us:—

"No one will deny the right of the parties engaged in this movement to organize an 'Independent' society for any purpose to which they may see fit to devote their energies; but is it fair for them to enter the pulpit of a Unitarian Association, and, to the manifest dissatisfaction of a large portion of those who occupy the pews, endeavor to change all its relations and to destroy the harmony and unity of the organization?"

"I may only at present add to this that the 'First Unitarian Society of Toledo' still exists, and though just now without either a church which it can occupy or a minister to preach to it, it nevertheless embraces within its ranks a very respectable portion of those who in the past have earnestly labored in the cause. These, though annoyed and perplexed by the action of their late associates, are by no means discouraged, but being resolved to stand steadfastly by what they believe to be the 'right,' have an abiding faith that their labors will ultimately be crowned with success."—Christian Register, Oct. 23, 1869.

[It seems to our benighted conscience perfectly "fair," on express and repeated invitation, and after a frank statement of what we proposed to do, to "enter the pulpit" of any Society, Unitarian or otherwise, to state the principles of Free Religion, and to recommend the action which those principles, if intelligently adopted, require. We took it for granted that the Toledo Society could act independently; nor was our confidence misplaced.—Ed.]

Poetry.

UNLEASHED.

The breath of the morning is sweet;
'Tis true there are pricks in the path,
And the pebbles are sharp to my feet,—
But the sunbeams shower down on my head
Their fresh and bountiful bath.

There are strength and life in my tread,
There are fire and hope in my heart;
For the pulses of youth are fed
By a will that feeds upon God,
And they thrill in every part.

I have hewed me a way straight and broad,
With many an eager blow;
The briars are crimsoned with blood,
But the fountain that dyed them is full,
And the drops were welcome to flow.

Now hail to the tug and pull!
Hail to the sweat and strain!
Rest be for coward and fool!
There's a blessing for man to win,
And a smile from God to gain.

There's a falchion to wrest from Sin,
A sceptre from giant Wrong;
Here let the war begin—
Lord, in thy adamant mail
I clothe me, and am strong.

Let my arm be hammer and flail,
Forging the bolts of truth,
Scattering the chaff to the gale!
Let me die—but the Right prevail!
O God, hallow my youth!

The Index.

FEBRUARY 12, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

We publish this morning, in addition to our usual amount of matter, a SUPPLEMENT containing the notices of the press which have thus far come to our knowledge. We print to-day several thousand copies of THE INDEX for gratuitous distribution, which will be furnished on application to the editor. Friends of Free Religion will please use them as specimen numbers among their acquaintances.

Subscribers are requested to write PLAINLY their names and post-office address, including town, county, and state.

Although large editions of the early numbers of THE INDEX were printed, they are nearly exhausted by the demand made upon us for specimen copies; and all who wish a complete set for the year must send in their names at once.

On our eighth page will be found a notice of the OHIO WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE CONVENTION, at Columbus, Feb. 10 and 11. As THE INDEX is issued in advance of its date, we take pleasure in calling attention to this gathering in a good cause, and expressing our best hopes for its complete success. No friend of Woman Suffrage who can be present, should be among the absentees.

CONGRATULATORY.

It gives us great pleasure to be able to announce to our readers that, although we began the publication of THE INDEX at New Year with a number of subscribers far larger than we anticipated, OUR SUBSCRIPTION LIST IS ALREADY MORE THAN DOUBLED. The degree of success thus far attained by THE INDEX exceeds our most sanguine expectations; and we expected much. If the influx of subscriptions should continue merely at the same rate, making no allowance for increase, within ten weeks the expenses of the undertaking will be paid for one year, and THE INDEX will have become an institution. We congratulate our friends, and all friends of the cause we work for, on this cheering prospect, and trust that it will prove an encouragement for "a long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together." Once assured that the paper will pay its own expenses, we hope to make various improvements in it, and render it still more worthy of support. Evidences multiply on every side that it has struck a deep chord in the popular heart, and will supply a need keenly felt by thousands and thousands throughout the country. Women and men alike write to us in terms of earnest joy and hope at the prospect of a weekly journal which shall unite real religion with absolute freedom of thought and speech. The "Voices from the People" contain only a fraction of the expressions of enthusiasm and faith, called forth by our attempt to set forth the only religion worthy of the times we live in. Profoundly convinced as we are that Free Religion is the dawning Faith of the World, such words but deepen our resolve to do the little best that in us lies to bring its great truths home to human hearts. GOD HELP THE RIGHT!

THE NEW DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

If the discourse printed in the present issue of THE INDEX concerned only the local interests of an isolated Society, we should not have dreamed of giving it to the public. We would gladly keep whatever is merely local and personal in the back ground. But to do so in this case would be, from motives of false modesty, to suppress a lesson of the gravest importance to mankind. The action taken by the "Unitarian Society of Toledo" on August 22, 1869, in changing its name to the "First Independent Society of Toledo" FOR THE REASONS GIVEN, marks, as we are deeply convinced, an epoch in the religious history of the race second to none in the past. It was the firing of the first gun in an open conflict between the institutions of the past and the institutions of the future, of which no man can predict the duration, but of which a fearless faith in humanity may yet predict the final issue. For the first time the axe has been laid at the root of the tree. For the first time the spirit of freedom, which started from its long trance in the outbreak of the Protestant Reformation, and has been ever since uneasily protesting against it hardly knew what, has discovered that its protest must henceforth be against the Christian Confession,—the central dogma of Christianity itself. For the first time has Free Religion come to complete self-consciousness, and begun to manifest its power in the reconstruction of social and religious institutions. This action, therefore, of a single local society initiates a vast movement sure to spread in the end throughout the Christian Church. It is the first ominous crack which begins the actual breaking-up of the ice in Spring, and heralds the emancipation of the great river of human life from the long winter of ecclesiasticism.

The first distinct protest against the Christian Confession, made by a previously Christian Society in the name of spiritual freedom, is a new "Declaration of Independence," whose importance is not local, but universal.

The Declaration of 1776 was a protest against the political authority of the King of England; the Declaration of 1869 was a protest against the spiritual authority of the King of Humanity. The political Revolution must ultimate in a spiritual Revolution. It is the self-same spirit of liberty which necessitates both. Carrying the great American conflict, therefore, up to a higher plane, the vote of the Toledo Society is a challenge of the Christian Confession not to be silenced or ignored. It will yet prove a "shot heard round the world." It shows that the great cause of religious emancipation is no longer the cause of isolated individuals, but begins to be recognized as the cause of the whole people. Like the feeble voice of the little Anti-Slavery Society, which nevertheless made to totter and fall the vast Slave-Oligarchy, it will yet shake to its foundations the enormous fabric of Christian ecclesiasticism, with all its moneyed institutions and priestly privileges. England disestablishes the Irish Church; Italy, Austria, and Spain shake off the temporal yoke of the Popedom; but America, far in advance, begins to shake off the entire spiritual despotism of which these are but unessential parts. The half-protest of Europe has been completed here in perfect consciousness and deliberation. Short-sighted observers may ridicule these statements as the mere frothing of enthusiasm; but we appeal to the future to vindicate their truth. He is simply blind to the tendencies of the age and the needs of man, who fails to see in this measured but uncompromising protest the beginning of the end. Being a deed and not a word alone, it inaugurates a popular revolution, compared with which the Protestant Reformation was the merest child's-play. Let him laugh who will. There was laughter at the Court of England in 1776,—laughter at Versailles in 1789.

In four chief respects the action of the Toledo Society challenges the attention of every thoughtful man.

1. It was a popular, not an individual, protest; and thus acquires a deep social and institutional significance.

2. It was made within, and not without, the Unitarian Church; and thus shows that Unitarianism is simply a bridge between Christianity and Free Religion. Thus is observed the great law of the continuity of historical development.

3. It was prompted by the free American spirit; and thus shows that the Declaration of Political Independence leads logically to the Declaration of Spiritual Independence,—that American politics and American religion must come ultimately into perfect harmony.

4. It began the visible transition of the civilized world from Christianity to Free Religion which is destined to throw into the shade the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity.

That the step thus taken by a more than two-thirds majority of the Society was characterized by a spirit of entire kindness and fairness to the minority, will be evident from the statement of the trustees which we print below.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY OF TOLEDO, OHIO.

At a special meeting of the Unitarian Society, of Toledo, Ohio, held August 22d, 1869, the following Preamble and Resolutions were adopted:—[They will be found in the discourse on the first page.]

On the adoption of the above Preamble and Resolutions the vote stood, Yeas 39; Nays 18.

The Society has also extended a call to Rev. F. E.

But more fatal than all, Free Religion keeps no terms with the sectarian spirit, that most potent but least deserving of the spirits that build up churches. Take away the influence of that spirit—and what would become of Protestant Christendom? Banish the partisan zeal, the temper of ambition and rivalry, the pride of opinion, the angry competition for power, the insane lust of controversy, the passion for polemics and for verbal victories therein, the jealousies, the odiums, the piques and spites, and how the sects would dwindle,—how the meeting houses would thin ! Alas ! that the simple love of truth should be so small, so much smaller in religious than in scientific men! Alas! that truth of the highest order, just because it is of the highest order, should be so inseparably associated with personal prejudice! That the truth on which most seems to depend should be subject to the most wretched monopoly! All men shout for the truth, the truth, the simple truth; all they ask for is the truth. But what do they mean by the truth? Their own opinion. So long as you go with them in opinion, they will go with you. They will follow you, thinking that it is you who follow them, until you reach the threshold of their knowledge or prejudice; then they leave you. If you go beyond that, you go too far. You are near the jumping-off place. Each sect holds a fortified position and counts departure from its entrenchments to be apostasy.

Free Religion leaves all entrenchments, leaves all artificial enclosures behind, goes out in quest of wider fields. It is simply sure that truth is something more than any prejudice, dogma or system. It is tired of all that; sick of these "first principles" which are no principles at all; of these "fundamental postulates" that can be pricked through with a pin; these definitions that do not define; these traditions that pass nothing along; these "facts" that are no more than records in our old book; these creeds that tell what people used to believe; these systems which are but guesses and compilations of guesses; these "absolute truths" that are absolute only in the tone that utters them; and consequently it lets them all go, and lets go along with them the people who cling to them. They that cling to old associations and prepossessions cannot go with it; the timid and irresolute cannot go with it; the opinionated cannot go with it. It is left alone.

In all communities are large bodies of men who join the churches that promise to further their business or social interests. None of them come to Societies that are certain to be unfashionable, as the Free Religious Societies always are. The rich are not there, or the powerful or the influential. The leaders of society, the patrons of art, and industry, the political rulers, the bearers of the public and private purse are baring their heads at the name of Christ in other places; and where the carcass is, there the vultures are gathered together. The sway of fashion is as absolute in religion as in society. In fact religion is a department of society; there is but one world for fashion—one "great world;" it takes in God; uses the church as an ante-chamber for Sunday concerts and receptions, adopts heaven for the sake of perspective, and graciously asks the martyrs and saints to be masters of mummeries. Fashion calls Free Religion atheistical, just as it calls earnestness vulgar—to be out of its church is to be out of the presence of God—just as being off its visiting list is being out of the world. Free Religion has no chance except with men and women who are human enough to be religious and individual enough to be free. This must be the pledge of its success, pinning it down to plain honesty, bearing it up to high purpose. Its forces are to be weighed, not counted. Its members are not numerous, but each numbers one. Like the primitive Friends, they must stand up together and stand by their calling, for the simple reason that only so can they justify their position. Religions have ever flourished when driven back upon first principles. The future is theirs who accept the first principles and are satisfied to live in them.

Let us take courage then. The present is rich; the future is bright. Intellect, culture, philosophy, science are, we believe, on our side. Our angels are in the air; our Messiah is coming in clouds. He is the spirit of truth. We have but to persevere and to wait.

CIVILIZATION AND CHRISTIANITY.

Not unfrequently these two words are synonymous or nearly so, thus occasioning confusion of thought. What, then, is Civilization, and what is Christianity? Let us inquire of history. Did Christianity exist before Civilization or Civilization before Christianity?

Many centuries before Christianity there was Civilization; in Egypt; in Phoenicia; in Babylonia; in Assyria; in Persia; in Greece; in Rome. And these old civilizations have contributed to the nurture, growth, strength, beauty, of our modern civilization. Greek civilization, in particular, was so marvelous, so divinely beautiful, so vigorous, manly, expansive, that it has become the study, admiration, education of the ages. Had scholars, artists, statesmen, patriots, philosophers, scientists, followed the fashion of priests, they would have claimed for Greek civilization a supernatural origin.

Christianity thus being so much younger than civilization, so distinct from it, how comes it that the two things are sometimes confounded? Here let me attempt such definitions as are needed for the present purpose. Civilization is general human development, by means of language, religion, war, agriculture, manufactures, commerce, government, art, literature, science. Religion is special human development, through religious ideas, sentiments, worships. Christianity is "developed Judaism," through the ideas, life, claims of Jesus, and the faith, labors, earnestness of his disciples. Civilization contains religion; religion contains Christianity. Churchmen, mistaking a part for the whole, make Christianity the whole of religion, and sometimes even the whole of civilization.

Christianity early formed an alliance with the civilizations of Greece and Rome, and thus became one of the channels for conveying the old civilizations down to the new civilizations of Europe and America. Saracenic literature and science formed another of these channels. The Crusades formed a third,

A fourth was inductive science, which has grown and expanded till it has become the leading force of our modern world.

Throughout the Middle Ages Christianity was the controlling element of society, and performed then, in the infancy and youth of the modern era, its great work for the world; hence Churchmen, with their eyes on the past, easily confounded Christianity with civilization, little heeding the fact that a vast revolution, a new and broader and manlier development, began in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries and is still going on with accelerating and accumulating force, which places in the van science, invention, free thought, free literature, free work, free commerce, free government, free religion; and leaves church and Christianity lagging behind.

Religion is a strong and pervading element in our advancing civilization, but it is, in large measure, a different thing from Christianity. It is not the religion of creed, ritual, sacrament, priestcraft, church; but broad, progressive religion, that has learned to stand on its feet, no longer needing the leading-strings of children. It is the religion of principles, not persons; of reason, not authority; of duty, not dogma. It is love to God and man. It is not the enemy of science but its friend. It does not tyrannize over our civilization. It does not forbid free thought, but fraternizes with it. It did not apologize for slavery. It does not strengthen caste, sect, intolerance, privilege. It welcomes philanthropy, reform, progress, Truth of every kind and from every quarter. It is Free Religion.

JESUS THE INTERPRETER OF THE SOUL.

FORT MADISON, IOWA, }
Jan'y 20, 1870. }

To the Editor of the Index:

DEAR SIR,—Your position is a high one and very ably sustained,—but although I have carefully studied the second number of THE INDEX, I am very far from being persuaded to lay aside my New Testament.

Christ was a spiritual teacher and philanthropist of transcendent excellence, whose influence in human affairs has been, is, and will be, vastly beneficial to the race.

He has been adopted as the spiritual guide of that third part of the human race to which you and I belong. And churches, schools, and a literature of inestimable richness have been created in order to perpetuate, develop, and extend the influence of his teaching. He was incomparably the greatest religious genius of which I have any knowledge.

He is a highly competent interpreter of Intuitive Religion. Some of his interpretations thereof have been questioned by men not surpassed as to wisdom and virtue. But the ideas of no mortal would be universally accepted, even by the pure and sagacious.

Now it seems to me that, in view of what man is, and has, in history, shown himself to be, some authoritative interpretation of the Scripture written on the heart is requisite. So engrossed is the great mass of men in pursuits not religious, that some Oracle, some Bible, some Veda, some Zend-Avesta is a necessity. Where shall we of the Indo-European races find anything so well suited to our spiritual and moral necessities as the New Testament?

I admit that the supreme law of Religion is "the still small voice in the soul." But many souls seem dumb;—the voices of others are inarticulate. As the sun's rays are said to have called forth music from the Egyptian statue, so Christ's words are powerful to awake from their slumbers the spiritual voices within us.

Nor does the acceptance of Christ interfere with my freedom. If my will be consentaneous with his, then obedience to the still small voice within, and obedience to his law, are identical and harmonious as spiritual conditions. SEEKER.

NINE GOLDEN TRUTHS.

BY PHENIX.

1. The formation, preservation and government of the universe imply the existence of a Supreme Being, who is infinite in power, wisdom, goodness, mercy, love, and all perfection, and who pervades, animates, governs and guides all things according to His will and pleasure.

2. The unchangeable manifestation of God's providence, creating what are termed the laws of nature, renders His will knowable to man through the study of those laws.

3. All that need or can be known of God, of man and his future destiny, is written in Nature.

4. God having created man for His own purposes, and given him powers exactly adapted to the accomplishment of those purposes, man is alike incapable of provoking the wrath and forfeiting the love of his Creator.

5. The soul of man, being of God, is ever in harmony with God; and, hence, the sins which men commit are owing, not to native tendency or evil desire, but are the errors of the undeveloped intellect which it pleased God to bestow.

6. No church, no mediator between God and man, can make our sins less sinful or His mercy more merciful.

7. As the child loves the parent, so all men love God by natural instinct, though that love may be clouded by false conception of His character, or lie latent in the bosom.

8. In the study of and obedience to God's will, our present happiness and future glory are to be attained.

9. The Religion of the heart—true piety—is born of conscious love of and oneness with God, and is the birthright of all men, irrespective of church or creed.

ASPECTS OF STARVATION.

[FROM LEWES' PHYSIOLOGY OF COMMON LIFE.]

Terrible are the aspects of starving men; and it is well that we should know these aspects, lest we be the dupes of impostors, or confound the truly wretched with the professional mendicant. The first noticeable point is the excessive thinness of starving men, which is not the leanness of lean men, but manifests itself as unmistakable emaciation. The face is always lividly pale, the cheeks are sunken, the eyes—what an expression in the eyes! never to be forgotten by those who have once seen it. All the vitality of the body seems centred there, in feverish brightness; the pupil is dilated, the eye is fixed in a wild stare, which is never veiled by the winking lids. All movements of the body are slow and difficult; the hand trembles; the voice is feeble; intelligence seems gone; the wretched sufferers, when asked what they feel, have but one answer, "We are hungry."

There is one remarkable fact with reference to starvation which may here be noted, and that is the resistance opposed by the nervous substance to the effects of emaciation. Instead of being the first to suffer from deficient food, as its complexity and the lateness of its appearance in the animal series would lead us to suppose, the nervous tissue is the last to be affected. From the experiments of Chossat, we learn that, in every 100 parts of each of the following substances, 93 are lost of the fat, 52 of the liver, 42 of the muscles, 16 of the bones, and only 2 of the nervous substance, by the time starvation has terminated in death. The idea of our solid bones, principally composed of inorganic matter, losing eight times as much as our semi-liquid nerves, which are so predominantly organic in their structure, will seem very paradoxical; and the paradox is increased when we learn that, in spite of fat being beyond all proportion the most destructible tissue in the body, von Bibra finds the fat in the brain scarcely affected in starvation, although the fat in the muscles has been greatly wasted.

It is this which enables us hypothetically to explain the sleeplessness of men and animals suffering from hunger. A starving man has been known to remain seven days and nights without sleep. This nervous excitability, which often manifests itself as delirium, probably arises from the disengagement of the brain from those organic activities, which in the normal state call so largely on its energies; for the energies of the brain are not expended only on intelligence and emotion, but likewise, and to a great extent, on the functions of nutrition and locomotion. Considering the nervous system as a centre or fountain of influence, we may detect three streams in which the influence flows—a nutritive stream, a locomotive stream, and a sensitive stream. If the demand from the nutritive stream be large, the supply to the sensitive and locomotive streams will be proportionately reduced. Deep thought, or anxiety, disturbs the digestion and circulation; violent and protracted exercise, amounting to fatigue, incapacitates for thinking; the habitually trained athlete is nearly an idiot, the over-eater little better. When, therefore, a man is starving, the amount of nervous activity usually expended on his nutritive system is disengaged; and as his feebleness diminishes his muscular activity, the amount of nervous influence usually expended on locomotion is reduced, leaving the brain, with all this surplus activity, to prey upon itself; sleeplessness and madness naturally result from this over-excitement.

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Mrs. Caroline M. Severance, West Newton, Mass.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

The most official statement of the principles and objects of the Free Religious Association that has yet been made, was put forth in the First Annual Report of the Executive Committee of the Association. This was circulated pretty widely at the time, in 1868; but it is believed that there may be many readers of THE INDEX who have never seen it, and who are now making their first acquaintance with the aims and work of the Association. For the benefit of this class of readers we think it well to reprint here some extracts from that report. We would commend the reading of them also to any persons who have passed, or who propose to pass, a critical judgment on the Association,—with the injunction not to judge without knowledge. We shall print extracts this week indicative of the form and objects of the Association, and next week such as relate to its instrumentalities and methods of working. First, concerning the FREEDOM OF THE ORGANIZATION.

"As one who from the outset was especially interested in the formation of this new Association, the Secretary may here be allowed to put on record the statement, that, so far as he is aware, there was on the part of no one of those having the like interest any desire or thought of forcing into a compact organization, and into a strict community of purpose and action, the various representative religious elements to which they made their appeal for a public meeting; much less did they presume to control, through any formal, mechanical contrivance, the progressive religious spirit of the age, and think to turn it into some special channel. On the contrary, the first premise of all their thinking and acting was, that this spirit must be left perfectly free and untrammelled in order to work out its proper results; and their sole aim was to form some simple plan of association which should represent and give expression to this perfect religious freedom; not prematurely to hasten, nor artificially to shape any natural religious movements that are in progress, but to provide an organism—itsself a natural result of these movements—for religious elements that are spontaneously attracted more or less strongly to each other, and that are already prepared for some kind of combination and fellowship,—an organism that should enable these elements the better to define and express themselves in public sentiment in their united force, and at the same time leave the largest liberty to individual opinion and utterance. There was such entire trust to this general and spontaneous spirit of unity, and such entire freedom from any desire to have an organization that should specially represent the peculiar opinion of any clique or faction of religious believers, that of the Executive Committee, chosen at the convention in Horticultural Hall last May, only a small minority had been present at any of the preliminary meetings for consultation, or knew precisely what was in the minds of those who had most desired organization. The Committee were selected from those who were supposed to have a general and entirely unsectarian interest in religious enlightenment, liberty, and progress, and who would be willing to stand on the broad platform of the Association, which did not stop with the limits of the "Christian" religion. They were, to a considerable extent, personally unacquainted with each other; and before their first official meeting no one of them probably knew definitely what was the opinion of any other concerning the nature and method of the work which had been intrusted to their joint hands.

It seemed necessary to make this statement both to show how unforced and unplanned a movement this organization was, and to explain why no very extensive visible results were to be expected of it in the first year of its existence."

Here followed a sketch of what the Committee had done and attempted to do the first year; and then a statement of the OBJECTS.

"The objects of the Association are succinctly stated in the first Article of the Constitution. We are organized, according to that Article, 'to promote the interests of pure religion, to encourage the scientific study of theology, and to increase fellowship in the spirit.' But we fail to perceive the full bearing of this language, unless we note that this statement of purpose is introduced by the title of the Association, which is 'Free Religious,' and is followed by an invitation to 'all persons interested in these objects' to become members. The basis of the Association, therefore, is broader than anything before attempted in the way of organization in religious history. It goes below any one specific form of religion, and seeks to find the common ground on which all religions, or more properly religion itself, rests, and to plant itself there. It contemplates the ultimate union, not simply of all sects in Christendom, but of all religions, Christian and non-Christian, in one. It looks beyond 'Christian' limits for its fellowship. Nor is this aim, even thus early, only ideal. As the meetings last year and this both testify, it is in a measure already realized. And this fact, with what it involves, is the most distinguishing feature of the Association. 'With what it involves,' for the important thing is not so much the fact that the Association brings different sects and religions together on one platform, as the principle underlying that fact. The principle is, that in this Association these various religious opinions and faiths meet and mingle on perfectly equal terms, no one claiming for itself what it does not cordially accord, by courtesy and by right, to every other. For the first time in religious history, not only representatives of differing Christian sects, but people of all religious names and of no religious name, are invited to come together as equal brothers, and confer with one another on the highest interests of mankind. Most of us here are probably, by reason of birth and education, counted in the census of the world's population as 'Christian,' whether we make any other claim or not. But on the platform of this Association we do not obtrude that title. We agree here to listen to what our Hebrew friend may have to utter, or to what our India brother may write to us, of their respective religious faiths, with the same candor and the same integrity and openness of judgment that we accord to a 'Christian' speaker. A believer in the Christian system of religion may, if his conscience so dictate, use his right to speak on the platform of this Association with the purpose of proving the claims of his particular faith paramount to all others, and of converting non-believers to his views; but if he does so, that very act commits him to hear impartially the same claims made for any other faith. One who should come here simply to speak with dogmatic and sectarian arrogance for his own belief, and not cordially to listen to what might be said in behalf of another belief, would not come certainly in the spirit of the Constitution of this Association.

Yet this is not to say that the Free Religious Association takes the ground that one form of religion or faith is as true and good as another. It simply does not determine the claims of any specific form of faith, or assume the claims of any to be determined. It declines to consider it a closed question that the claims of any religion are to be regarded as finally established, and gives a fair, open field for the establishing of any religion, or of so much of any religion as can prove itself to be true. Christianity, thus far, has attempted to convert all other religions to itself. The Christian missionary goes to India and says to the natives there, 'You must be converted to my faith, or there is no hope of your progress to anything better in this world, or of your happiness in the world to come.' This Association says to these native religious devotees, 'Let us see what is true in your religion, and what is true in this and that other form of faith, and be ready to accept the true from any quarter; and, meantime, let us put our heads together and see if we cannot contrive some better and worthier ways of living.' The Free Religious Association simply does not accept any instituted form of religion as necessarily a finality. It admits the possibility of advance in religious truth beyond any present religious system. It plants itself on Truth-seeking, and does not claim to have found a finality in religious faith and practice.

On this broad basis, with this declaration of equal religious liberty and rights, the Free Religious Association is organized; and it is evident that the specific objects of the Association, as stated in its Constitution, must take direction and shape from these fundamental principles. The Association aims 'to promote the interests of pure religion,' without stamping those interests with any special name, or seeking to build up any sectarian form of faith and worship. It aims 'to encourage the scientific study of theology,' not fearing to trust reason and free inquiry on all fields of thought, not recalling them when they reach the limits of the 'Christian,' or any other special confession of faith, but striving to apply a more truly rational and scientific method of investigation to all problems of religious experience and history. It aims 'to increase fellowship in the spirit,'—defining that fellowship as nothing narrower than the brotherhood of man, and making it rest on the aspirations and strivings of our common humanity after higher truth and life."

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEEVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

WASHINGTON AND HIS GARDENER.—G. W. P. CUSTIS, in his "Recollections of Washington," gives a copy of a contract written in Washington's own hand, between George Washington and Philip Barton, his gardener. After the usual clauses it provides that the said Barton "will not at any time suffer himself to be disguised with liquor except on terms hereafter mentioned." After enumerating the clothing, etc., to be furnished, it further says that he was to be allowed "four dollars at Christmas, with which he may be drunk four days and nights; also two dollars at Whitsuntide, to be drunk two days; also a dram in the morning, and a drink of grog at dinner, at noon."—Saturday Evening Post (Phil.)

SOLDIERS, ATTENTION!

ED. INDEX: I cut the following from last Saturday's Blade under the caption "Eternal Death:"—
"On no second Cavalry is there a Redeemer offered for sin; and from no tomb there does He rise to life to bless the, etc., etc."
Now this is a matter of importance to the G. A. R., as well as other military men, and should be made known. Maybe the chances in the first or third Cavalry are better. Perhaps Mrs. Partington can tell.

The objects of this Convention will be to urge upon the Legislature now in session the claims of the women of Ohio to equal civil and political rights with men, and to determine whether the Ohio Woman Suffrage Association shall declare itself auxiliary to any existing national association.
Among the speakers who will address the Convention, are LUCY STONE and HENRY B. BLACKWELL, of New Jersey; MARY A. LIVERMORE, of Chicago; LIZZIE M. BOYNTON, of Indiana; LILY PECKHAM, of Wisconsin; Rev. Mrs. HANNAFORD, of Massachusetts; Miss RADELIA BATES, of New York, and Mrs. H. M. TRACY CUTLER, Mrs. M. V. LONGLEY, Mrs. M. M. COLE, and others of Ohio.

All Persons are Invited to be Present,

And the friends of the cause throughout the State are requested to take part in its deliberations.
As the time is short, we hope every friend of the Woman's Rights movement will exercise special effort to announce the holding of this Convention, in every locality in the State, that a full representation may be had.
It is hoped that the local associations in the State will send the full number of delegates to which they are severally entitled by the provisions of the Constitution. Every county in the State should be represented.
By order of the Executive Committee,
OHIO WOMAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.
In 1850—3,829.
In 1860—13,784.
In 1866—24,401.
In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of side-walks and sewers upwards of $2,350,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

FIFTY AFFIRMATIONS.

RELIGION.

1. Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself.
2. The root of religion is universal human nature.
3. Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root.
4. Historical religions are all different, in virtue of their different historical origin and development.
5. Every historical religion has thus two distinct elements,—one universal or spiritual, and the other special or historical.
6. The universal element is the same in all historical religions; the special element is peculiar in each of them.
7. The universal and the special elements are equally essential to the existence of an historical religion.
8. The unity of all religions must be sought in their universal element.
9. The peculiar character of each religion must be sought in its special element.

RELATION OF JUDAISM TO CHRISTIANITY.

10. The idea of a coming "kingdom of heaven" arose naturally in the Hebrew mind after the decay of the Davidic monarchy, and ripened under foreign oppression into a passionate longing and expectation.
11. The "kingdom of heaven" was to be a world-wide empire on this earth, both temporal and spiritual, to be established on the ruins of the great empires of antiquity by the miraculous intervention of Jehovah.
12. The Messiah or Christ was to reign over the "kingdom of heaven" as the visible deputy of Jehovah, who was considered the true sovereign of the Hebrew nation. He was to be a Priest-King,—the supreme pontiff or high-priest of the Hebrew church, and absolute monarch of the Hebrew state.
13. The "apocalyptic literature" of the Jews exhibits the gradual formation and growth of the idea of the Messianic "kingdom of heaven."
14. All the leading features of the gospel doctrine concerning the "kingdom of heaven," the "end of the world," the "great day of judgment," the "coming of the Christ in the clouds of heaven," the "resurrection of the dead," the condemnation of the wicked and the exaltation of the righteous, the "passing away of the heavens and the earth," and the appearance of a "new heaven and a new earth," were definitely formed and firmly fixed in the Hebrew mind, in the century before Jesus was born.
15. John the Baptist came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." But he declared himself merely the forerunner of the Messiah.
16. Jesus also came preaching that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and announced himself as the Messiah or Christ.
17. Jesus emphasized the spiritual aspect of the Messianic kingdom; but, although he expected his throne to be established by the miraculous intervention of God, and therefore refused to employ human means in establishing it, he nevertheless expected to discharge the political functions of his office as King and Judge, when the fullness of time should arrive.

18. As a preacher of purely spiritual truth, Jesus probably stands at the head of all the great religious teachers of the past.

19. As claimant of the Messianic crown, and founder of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, Jesus shared the spirit of an unenlightened age, and stands on the same level with Gautama or Mohammed.

20. In the belief of his disciples, the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus would not prevent the establishment of the "kingdom of heaven." His throne was conceived to be already established in the heavens; and the early church impatiently awaited its establishment on earth at the "second coming of the Christ."

21. Christianity thus appears as simply the complete development of Judaism,—the highest possible fulfilment of the Messianic dreams based on the Hebrew conception of a "chosen people."

CHRISTIANITY.

22. Christianity is the historical religion taught in the Christian Scriptures, and illustrated in the history of the Christian church.

23. It is a religion in virtue of its universal element; it is the Christian religion in virtue of its special element.

24. The Christian Scriptures teach, from beginning to end, that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God,"—that is, the Hebrew Messiah. This, the Christian Confession, was declared both by Jesus and the apostles to be necessary to salvation or admission into the "kingdom of heaven."

25. The Christian church, from its origin to the present day, has everywhere planted itself on faith in the Christian Confession, as its divinely appointed foundation,—the eternal "rock" against which the "gates of hell shall never prevail."

26. The Christian Confession gradually created on the one hand the theology, and on the other hand the hierarchy, of the Roman Catholic Church. This process was not, as is claimed, a corruption, but a natural and logical development.

27. The Church of Rome embodies Christianity in its most highly developed and perfect form, as a religion of authority based on the Christian Confession.

28. Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of Christianity, whether regarded theologically or ecclesiastically, under the influence of the free spirit of protest against authority.

29. "Liberal Christianity,"—that is, democratic autocracy in religion,—is the highest development of the free spirit of protest against authority which is possible within the Christian church. It is, at the same time, the lowest possible development of faith in the Christ,—a return to the Christian Confession in its crudest and least developed form.

30. Christianity is the religion of Christians, and all Christians are believers in the Christ.

31. The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian Confession is the boundary line of Christianity.

FREE RELIGION.

32. The Protestant Reformation was the birth of Free Religion,—the beginning of the religious protest against authority within the confines of the Christian Church.

33. The history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion at the expense of the Christian Religion. As love of freedom increases, reverence for authority decreases.

34. The completion of the religious protest against authority must be the extinction of faith in the Christian Confession.

35. Free Religion is emancipation from the outward law, and voluntary obedience to the inward law.

36. The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man as a progressive being.

37. The great ideal end of Free Religion is the perfection or complete development of man,—the race serving the individual, the individual serving the race.

38. The great practical means of Free Religion is the integral, continuous and universal education of man.

39. The great law of Free Religion is the still, small voice in the private soul.

40. The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One.

41. Free Religion is the natural outcome of every historical religion,—the final unity, therefore, towards which all historical religions slowly tend.

RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO FREE RELIGION

42. Christianity is identical with Free Religion so far as its universal element is concerned,—antagonistic to it so far as its special element is concerned.

43. The corner-stone of Christianity is faith in the Christ. The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in Human Nature.

44. The great institution of Christianity is the Christian Church, the will of the Christ being its supreme law. The great institution of Free Religion is the coming Republic of the World, the universal conscience and reason of mankind being its supreme organic law or constitution.

45. The fellowship of Christianity is limited by the Christian Confession; its brotherhood includes all subjects of the Christ and excludes all others. The fellowship of Free Religion is universal and free; it proclaims the great brotherhood of man without limit or bound.

46. The practical work of Christianity is to Christianize the world,—to convert all souls to the Christ, and ensure their salvation from the wrath of God. The practical work of Free Religion is to humanize the world,—to make the individual nobler here and now, and to convert the human race into a vast Co-operative Union devoted to universal ends.

47. The spiritual ideal of Christianity is the suppression of self and perfect imitation of Jesus the Christ. The spiritual ideal of Free Religion is the free development of self, and the harmonious education of all its powers to the highest possible degree.

48. The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of Free Religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face; Free Religion is erect on its feet.

49. The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake.—The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

50. Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.

Voices from the Press.

[From THE RADICAL, Boston, Mass.]

THE INDEX is the name of a new weekly paper to be published by Francis Ellingwood Abbot at Toledo, O. This announcement should be sufficient to ensure success. Mr. Abbot has already introduced himself to the attention and favor of the readers of THE RADICAL. Each number of his paper will contain, besides a popular discourse by himself, and a quantity of miscellaneous reading, contributions from O. B. Frothingham and W. J. Potter developing the purposes and plans of the Free Religious Association. In a circular-prospectus, which he will send to all who address him, Mr. Abbot states the objects of THE INDEX at length. It will be found that the trumpet gives no uncertain sound.—Dec. No.

THE INDEX has appeared, and, as all expected, it is bright and at the same time sober and thoughtful. Mr. Abbot offers 'Fifty Affirmations' which the orthodox world will have to deny or hold their peace—or accept. Here is an opportunity to test them as to how much they believe. Though Mr. Abbot does not follow up his 'Affirmations' with any threat of punishing unbelievers, we can but think ourselves that the time will come when many will mourn because their eyes were not unsealed in the day when to have seen and believed would have been a fresh delight.

At the present writing we have seen two numbers of 'THE INDEX.' We expect these will be improved upon. We cannot this month offer the extracts we have marked. But the best way to get them, and a great deal more, is to subscribe for the paper itself. THE INDEX is a fitting companion sheet to THE RADICAL, and especially is it so for all who are interested in the many items which a monthly, for the most part, has to let slip. We hope the two are destined to a long and useful life.—Feb. No.

[From THE OLD AND NEW, Boston, Mass.]

Other new journals are—1. THE INDEX, published in the interests of 'Free Religion,' at Toledo, Ohio, under the very able charge of Francis E. Abbot. The 'INDEX' says it shall be 'the organ of no party in politics and no sect in religion. The editor will speak for himself alone, and so will each contributor; neither will commit the other.' We presume that the editor speaks for himself in saying that 'to reject the Christian name does not necessarily mean to despise either Jesus or his religion.'

[From THE COMMONWEALTH, Boston, Mass.]

We have received the first number (dated Jan. 1, 1870) of the new religious journal, THE INDEX, the organ of the Free Religionists, published at Toledo, Ohio, Francis E. Abbot, editor. It is a handsome quarto sheet, well-filled with the leading ideas, as enunciated in Horticultural Hall and elsewhere, of those who gave religion pre-eminence to Christianity. Among its "affirmations" are these:—[We omit the quotations.]

These give a good idea of the basis of the new journal. Sustaining these is the discourse of Mr. Abbot in full in this city in February last, and various able articles. A department of the paper is devoted to the American Free Religious Association, under the control of its Secretary, Rev. Wm. J. Potter. Perhaps the relation of the free religionists to the old believers is as well expressed in the following editorial paragraph as in more lengthy articles:—

"To reject the Christian name does not necessarily mean to despise either Jesus or his religion."

It is evident THE INDEX will receive a large share of attention from the religious world and be approbated by all independent thinkers of the liberal field. Its price is $2 per annum.

[From THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER, Boston, Mass.]

We have seen the first number of Rev. F. E. Abbot's new paper, published at Toledo. It is a small but very neatly printed sheet, and, though somewhat lacking in variety, it bears the mark of vigorous and careful editing. It begins with 'Fifty Affirmations' which embody the creed of the editor, who invites thoughtful discussion of them. There is a brief history of the American Free Religious Association, a piece of original Poetry, a letter from Miss Frances Power Cobbe, who has sent an article on the Future Life which will appear in the second number, and an editorial on the McFarland-Richardson case which easily convicts both judges and clergymen in America of disregarding the plainest teachings of Jesus on the law of divorce. The most prominent paper, however, is Mr. Abbot's Horticultural Hall lecture on 'The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.' This is an earnest and able production, and, while it is wholly unsatisfactory in some of its conclusions, it increases our respect for its author's courage and consistency. Our readers will learn from the striking passages which we quote that it is a two-edged sword, cutting as unsparringly into the position of the 'Radicals' as into that of the 'Conservatives.' [We omit the quotations.]

[From THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR.]

"THE INDEX."—The Liberal preacher of Toledo, Ohio, the Rev. Francis E. Abbot (whose excellent sermon on "The Sunday Question" we lately published), proposes to issue a new paper in that city to be called THE INDEX. He says in his prospectus:—

"The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX will aim to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offer an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers."

THE INDEX will no doubt be an interesting journal, as Mr. Abbot is an able, independent and liberal writer. The publication of the paper is guaranteed for at least one year, by parties who are determined to secure a hearing for the most radical thought of the times.

THE INDEX.—We have received the first No. of this new paper which has just been commenced at Toledo, Ohio, and edited by the Rev. Francis E. Abbot. It makes a very neat appearance, and is well filled with interesting matter. We hope the paper may meet with a good reception, and be liberally sustained. Mr. Abbot has been roughly treated by Christians for taking a step in advance of them; and as we sympathize with all men of progressive views, whether they agree fully with us or not, we shall be gratified to learn that his INDEX is generously patronized. His "free religion" is not exactly to our taste, nor, in short, is any kind of religion; but, as that which is free is far better than that which is bigoted, we consider his an improvement upon Christianity, and therefore we wish it success on its journey towards complete emancipation, presuming that when it sees further, it will do better.

[From THE BANNER OF LIGHT, Boston, Mass.]

THE INDEX is the title of a new paper issued weekly at Toledo, Ohio, and edited by F. E. Abbot, and devoted to Free Religion and, as we view it, consequently to true religion, as we do not deem Christianity true religion, because it is not a free, natural and spontaneous religion, but an educated, sectarian and bigoted, partial religion of authority, against which we have ever protested because it was sectarian in its aggregate as well as its fractional headings, and for which protest we have ever been accused of battling against all religion, while we have ever proclaimed and defended man as a religious being by nature and not by education, but sectarian by education only, and consequently Christian, Mahometan or Pagan, as the case might be, but no more Christian by nature than Pagan, as persons born in Christian countries and under Christian influences are not more likely to be Methodists or Baptists than Unitarians or Quakers without educational training.

We are glad to see this and every other move that aids in freeing the mind from the authority of popular institutions, and the tyranny that cramps the growth of soul and cripples the moral and intellectual power of the human mind, as we are sure Christianity does in this day, however much it may have aided it in former times and under darker clouds of superstition. We hope THE INDEX will succeed and prosper, but we know how hard has been the struggle for life of other liberal papers.

[From THE NEW YORK NATION.]

Another new journal that we owe to a sort of Unitarians—or that perhaps we are going to owe—is THE INDEX, to be published at Toledo, and to be edited by Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Many of our readers know of this gentleman, for he has been conspicuous as a "come-outer" from the Unitarian camp, where doctrines are taught even by the more "advanced" of the Unitarians which are not advanced enough for Mr. Abbot. To such of our readers as are acquainted with his writings and speeches or sermons, we may say that Mr. Abbot—who is not yet in middle life—is a man of decided ability and of undoubted intellectual courage and honesty; so we do not know where the friends of what we may call religious rationalism would be likely to find an editor better able to express their views and opinions.

We have received the prospectus of THE INDEX, the forthcoming organ of the Free Religionists, of which we spoke last week, and now are able to speak of its character more definitely than we could then. Every phase of earnest thought, says the editor, will have a fair chance to be heard. No article will be rejected on the ground that it teaches atheism; transcendentalism and positivism shall have equal rights of speech accorded them; spiritualism and materialism, "free religion" and Christianity, all are to meet on equal terms. Nothing more will be asked of a writer than that his articles be in the new journal's general field of thought, and that it possess ability, and be fair, courteous, and of good moral tone—the editor being solely responsible for the application of these tests. What the paper's general field is to be, our readers may more distinctly see by looking at the titles and a list of seven essays which will appear in the seven opening numbers: first comes "The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion;" next, "What is Christianity?" next, "What is Free Religion?" next, "Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to cornerstones"—and not contrasted to the disadvantage of Free Religion, we may surmise; fifth is "Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to institutions, terms of fellowship, social ideal, moral ideal, and essential spirit;" sixth is "The Practical Work of Free Religion;" and last is, "Unitarianism versus Freedom." These are all lectures written by the editor, Mr. F. E. Abbot, who promises in addition "short and snotted" articles by able co-operators of his—Mr. O. B. Frothingham for one, and Mr. W. J. Potter for another, who both will fill regularly a certain space. And whether its articles are original or selected, short or long, they will be "uncompromising, fearless, radical," putting faith in ideas and working for them openly and regardless of consequences, "for its only policy will be strong thought and plain speech." Yet it will not "seek to shock the religious nerve," but though "standing squarely outside of Christianity, it will aim to be just to it, recognizing its excellencies, noting its defects." What, in Mr. Abbot's opinion, these latter may be, the reader unacquainted with his writings may partly gather from what he goes on to say next: THE INDEX "will pay no deference to the authority of the Bible, the Church, or the Christ, but rest solely on the authority of right reason and good conscience." It will trust no revelation but that of universal human faculties. It will accept every certified result of science, philosophy, and historical criticism, asking no question what it proves. Thus one more new crusade opens, and there is a brave sound of "trumpets blown for wars," and we seem to hear great neighing of steeds and the noise of armorers hammering at armor over in the direction of the Catholic World. But THE INDEX is more agile than that warrior, and appears every week instead of every month, thus having a clear advantage. Two dollars a year is the price of THE INDEX, and it sets out with a capital in hand sufficient to run it for one year certainly.

[From THE NEW YORK INDEPENDENT.]

We have received the first number of a weekly paper entitled THE INDEX, edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot, and published at Toledo, Ohio. Mr. Abbot, as our readers will remember, was some time ago minister of the Unitarian church in Dover, N. H. Belonging to what is called the "left wing" of the denomination, he finally renounced the Christian name altogether, and became the advocate of what is called "Free Religion." Some months since he went to Toledo, and was settled as pastor of what had been known as the Unitarian church in that place; a majority of the society, after an excited discussion, accepting him as their religious teacher, with a clear understanding of his views. That he is one of the most original and independent thinkers of our country cannot be denied. We first heard of him, some years ago, as the author of a philosophical article in the North American Review on "Space and Time," which proved him to possess a mind of no mean order. The love of consistency, which has now led him out of Christianity, showed itself in a later article in the same Review, in which he proved against Darwin that his theory of development—a theory which Mr. A. accepts—requires for its completeness that the first origination of life by law be also admitted. Mr. Darwin's [Mr. Spencer's?] reply, intended to relieve him of the charge of inconsistency, by no means met Mr. Abbot's argument. We see no reason to doubt that in his present position he is thoroughly honest and thinks himself a champion of the truth. We believe there is no stain upon his character, and that he sincerely desires to benefit his fellow-men. It is difficult, we know, for many who have been trained in the Orthodox fold, and never had a doubt of the doctrines taught them in childhood, to understand how a man can be honest and at the same time believe there is something better and higher than Christianity. Nevertheless, we believe such error to be perfectly compatible with the purest motives and the highest moral aims. Deeply as we must lament the mistakes of such a man, let us not be unjust to him. The Church, if it would bring such men back to the fold, must learn to treat them nobly and generously, to ply them with argument and persuasion, and not pelt them with denunciation. Mr. Abbot says:—[We omit the quotation.] Believing, as we most sincerely do, that Christianity rests upon the immovable foundations of truth, we are in no degree alarmed by the appearance of THE INDEX. If Christianity cannot stand the test of free inquiry and unrestrained discussion, let it fall. Its most dangerous foes are not those who honestly doubt its miraculous origin; but those who, professing to accept it, yet live as if it were false.

[From THE NATIONAL ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD, New York.]

THE INDEX is the title of a new weekly journal, to be issued on or about the 1st of January, 1870, at Toledo, Ohio, with the Rev. Francis E. Abbot as editor.

Funds have been pledged by responsible parties sufficient to insure the publication of the paper at least one year. The price will be two dollars per annum in advance. Though disclaiming, as we think unnecessarily, the name Christian, Mr. Abbot is conscientious in his convictions and earnest in action beyond the average of men. He is a young man of decided intellectual ability, and will no doubt render the journal over which he is to preside attractive, especially to free and independent thinkers. It will quite certainly be sufficiently fearless and outspoken in all matters pertaining to religion to interest the extreme religious radicals. We presume that it will not be merely or chiefly negative, but that editorially, at least, it will affirm important fundamental truths. We welcome Mr. Abbot cordially to the field of journalism, and hope his labors may be largely useful in promoting a truer and nobler conception than now prevails in the public mind of life, its opportunities, responsibilities and duties.

THE INDEX, a journal of very pronounced radicalism in religion, edited by Rev. Francis E. Abbot, and published at Toledo, Ohio, presents, in the initial number, Fifty Affirmations concerning Religion, Christianity, Free Religion, and the Relation of Christianity to Free Religion; a sermon on the Genius of Christianity and Free Religion, by Mr. Abbot; a letter from Frances Power Cobbe; a statement of the origin and purposes of the Free Religious Association, together with editorial and other miscellany.

It is a moderate sized, eight-page paper. It will be warmly welcomed by the increasingly large class of readers whose wants it is designed to meet. The Secretary of the Free Religious Association, Rev. William J. Potter, of New Bedford, with the President, Mr. Frothingham, will edit a department of THE INDEX in the interest of that organization. It is issued weekly, at two dollars per annum. We understand that among Mr. Abbot's supporters in this journalistic enterprise is the distinguished Rev. Petroleum V. Nasby.

[From the NATIONAL ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD (remarks of Col. T. W. Higginson at the Radical Club, Boston.)]

Mr. Abbot's fifty affirmative propositions, published in THE INDEX, are not surpassed, either in boldness or in truth, by the famous theses of Luther.

[From THE REVOLUTION, New York.]

THE INDEX.—This is a new weekly journal to be published in Toledo, Ohio, Francis Ellingwood Abbot, editor. Though but a newspaper in appearance and small in size at that, the name of the editor to all who know him, will be assurance sufficient that it will lack nothing in ability, nor in fearlessness to espouse and champion all new and progressive ideas, especially in the cause of a free, pure and practical religion. Like The Radical, it will probably be closely allied to the new Free Religious Association, whose centre is in Boston.

[From THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, New York.]

Rev. Francis E. Abbot, who was a Unitarian clergyman in New Hampshire, but who renounced Christianity and went out West, where he is now the minister of an independent religious society, has issued a prospectus for a weekly paper, of which he is to be the editor, and which he is to entitle THE INDEX. We commend the editor, Mr. Abbot, for so frankly defining his position. . . . THE INDEX cannot fail to be an able organ of Free Religion in the West, as The Radical is in the East. We are glad that it is so outspoken and straightforward at the start, and that it has thus done not a little to make clearer the lines that separate those who have no real fellowship with each other.

THE INDEX.—We have received and carefully read the first number of THE INDEX, edited by Mr. F. E. Abbot, and published every Saturday by the "Index Association" at Toledo, Ohio. It begins with "Fifty Affirmations," very tersely and frankly put, and which set with absolute distinctness before the reader and the public the essential faith and want of faith of the editor. There is something of positive affirmation in this statement, of a wholesome and conserving kind, as well as much that is destructive, and what, if it could be proved, would be fatal to the supernatural claims of Christianity, or to its institutional existence. We do not attach great importance to ideological movements like this, but we do not agree with those who think such serious, earnest statements of "Free Religion" can be wholly ignored, or denounced by Christians as merely presumptuous and ill-motivated. Trying to Christian feeling as it may be, we hope to see Mr. Abbot's half-century of affirmations carefully and frankly met; what is new, sound and valuable acknowledged; what is false, illogical, narrow and hasty exposed, and the editor treated with the courageous honesty with which he has treated his own convictions and the Christian public.

Mr. Abbot makes very plain what his mode of attack is to be upon what he regards as our outworn superstition—the general faith of Christians in a divine revelation. He presents the Roman Catholic Church as the normal and genuine development of the Messianic idea, which he makes the cardinal or germinal thought and faith of the Apostles. That idea, according to Mr. Abbot, made the Romish Church. It culminated in the days when the Romish Church had the largest political, social and religious power in the world. Protestantism was the beginning of the decay and will end in the death of the Messianic idea, and so of the religion which has been its embodiment. The superstitions, fallacies, priest-crafts and restrictions of the Romish Church were thus the natural and proper fruits of the Messianic idea, which originated in Jesus' own claim for himself, and thus reflect their proper character on the pretensions of the alleged Savior of the world. Protestantism, beginning with attacking them, must end with disowning him. Mr. Abbot has reached that point, and is rallying those who agree with him. Meanwhile he acknowledges the excellency of Jesus as a spiritual teacher and example, and his probable superiority over all who have yet won the reverence of the world.

Up to this time, the tender and holy gratitude and piety with which the life and character of Jesus Christ have been regarded, have kept the scholars and thinkers of the world, who aimed at popular influence, from handling the Scriptures which contain his alleged history and teachings, the Church which has gathered his disciples and been his external representative, and the person of Christ himself, with that absolute logic and pure, scientific candor and coolness with which it is claimed that the interests of religion demand that they should all be treated. THE INDEX throws overboard all the scruples, sympathies and delicacies which have embarrassed these previous investigations. It stands "squarely outside of Christianity." "It will pay no deference to the authority of the Bible, the Church or the Christ."

What sort of understanding of Bible, Church or Christ any man is likely to get who begins with denying the authority of either; what "authority" means as here used; what clue mere historic criticism or pure logic is like to afford in unthreading a divine life that has been poured into the world; what sort of adequacy a pure metaphysician like Mr. Mill or Mr. Abbot has for the task he proposes, we will leave to others to decide. Our own present conviction is, that what Mr. Abbot or the Free Religionists in general are about, so far as they aim to unsettle faith in Christianity, as divine in origin and power, is as likely to succeed as the effort that Hazlitt made in one of his essays, to prove that the heavenly bodies were less than a hundred miles from the earth, and not at all the sources of the light and heat which were popularly ascribed to them. Such speculations hardly come enough within the range of common Christian experience or faith to arouse a popular opposition. They might prove all they aim to prove, and most people would feel that they had not touched the question. What disturbs the public most is the seeming irrelevance of approaching the general theme of Christ's person and influence with the surgeon's knife, as if he were dead and might be hacked to pieces without any feeling on the part of those who know and love him, and live in and with him.

Before THE INDEX concludes its first decade, it will probably discover either that it is working in a vacuum, or threading the interstices of real Christian life, and so find little to run against, and little that runs against it. It will probably have its field all to itself, and freeze up with its disciples in the sunless, Christless region of that pole towards which THE INDEX points.

[From the Springfield (Mass.) REPUBLICAN.]

I observe, by the way, that Mr. Abbot proposes to publish at Toledo a free religious weekly to be called THE INDEX. It will be able, beyond question, and bold to the extremest utterance. Mr. Abbot discards even the name of Christian, and stands outside of Christianity, resting, as he says, solely on reason and conscience, and paying no deference to the authority of Bible, Church or Christ—Warrington.

MR. ABBOT'S INDEX.—While Mr. Hale is managing his 'Old and New' monthly (calculated for the meridian of Boston, but will serve for New York), a younger and more radical Bostonian, transplanted to Ohio, is about to open with a religious weekly in which Christianity will have no advantage given it over other forms of religion. Mr. F. E. Abbot, the independent minister of a society in Toledo, formerly Unitarian, gives the prospectus of THE INDEX, a weekly journal, in which he says 'every phase of earnest thought will have a chance to be heard.' No article will be rejected because it teaches theism, nor any because it teaches atheism; transcendentalism and positivism shall have equal rights, and spiritualism and materialism, 'free religion' and Christianity, are to meet on equal terms. Nothing more will be asked than that each article in the new journal's field of thought, possess ability, and be fair, courteous, and of good moral tone—the editor being judge of these matters. Each of the first seven numbers will contain an essay by Mr. Abbot,—first 'The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion'; then 'What is Christianity?' 'What is Free Religion?' 'Christianity and Free Religion, contrasted as to corner-stones'; 'Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to institutions, terms of fellowship, social ideal, moral ideal, and essential spirit'; 'The Practical Work of Free Religion'; and finally, 'Unitarianism versus Freedom.' Revs. O. B. Frothingham of New York and W. J. Potter of New Bedford, will each contribute regularly, and it will be a sort of organ, we infer, of the Free Religious Association. The ability of its editor, who is thoroughly in earnest in his new and, to most of us, rather disagreeable position, outside of Christianity, guarantees that the new paper will be worth reading and controverting. Its subscription price is two dollars, and its support is secured for a year. It is to be published at Toledo.

[From THE MORNING STAR, DOVER, N. H.]

TWO RADICAL NEWSPAPERS.—Almost every definite ism has its organ. The types are called into service whenever any considerable number of men and women have a common grievance to parade or a common end to compass. First a public meeting, and then a paper. Another public meeting, and then a plea for subscribers. The hall and the platform speaker are depended on to stir an interest, and then the press is used to organize and direct it. They who hear and noisily applaud may be properly asked for their testimony; but they who read and think are, after all, the main dependence of wise and shrewd leaders. And hence the multiplication of papers and pamphlets, large or small, daily, weekly, or monthly, able or feeble, philosophical or flippant, appealing to logic or to passion, rising to permanent influence or soon sinking to a forgotten grave.

Two weekly papers have appeared with the opening of the year, that may well claim and secure attention, both in view of what they are, and of the significant phases of thought which they represent and exhibit. One is THE INDEX, a sheet published at Toledo, Ohio, in the interest of the extreme type of Free Religion, and which Mr. Abbot chiefly uses as the silent pulpit for the dissemination of his views of theology; the other is The Woman's Journal, whose principal office is in Boston, and which appears to be the organ of that portion of the advocates of what is popularly known as the Woman's Rights movement, who are unwilling to be committed to the policy and measures of the clique that manages The Revolution.

The initial number of THE INDEX is largely filled with Mr. Abbot's individual contributions. He covers the first page with his creed, in the form of fifty affirmations. They are plain, consecutive, calmly and dignifiedly stated, without a particle of bitterness or the semblance of a fling at those who believe in Orthodox Christianity. To us, many of these affirmations appear wholly true, some of them almost wholly false; while not a few exhibit such a mixture of the wholesome and the mischievous, that they need a careful analysis before they can be properly disposed of. Direct approval and unqualified dissent are alike out of place.

But the document that deserves chief attention is a long and elaborate discourse, originally delivered as a lecture by the editor, at the Horticultural Hall, Boston. Here Mr. A. unfolds his views of religion, special and general, with thorough frankness, and no little ability and force. He claims that Christianity is only one of many special and partial religions—an advance perhaps on the best of its predecessors, but still having no just claim to be considered a religion for all peoples and periods. Christ is probably the highest embodiment of the religious genius that the world has yet seen; but his aim was too low, his methods defective, and his character tainted by the errors and prejudices of his times. In assuming to be the Messiah, he threw away the sceptre that would have made him the model and master of the ages. Mr. Abbot will have no Messiah, because, as he claims, he stands out against the higher priesthood and royalty of the individual soul.

It is only just to say that THE INDEX promises to be fair, thoughtful, and able. And Mr. Abbot is frank enough to define its and his position with the most unequivocal words. He gives up the name Christian; for, having ceased to accept Christ as the Messiah, he confesses he has no right to the title, and justly wonders at the illogical and unreasonable attitude of those who strip Christ of his peculiar authority and yet call themselves by his name. His language on this point is explicit and fitting. He says:—'The world at large can never be made to understand what is meant by a Christian who in no sense has faith in Christ. . . . The world is right, and may well marvel at a Christianity that denies the Lord, yet wears his livery.' He will not admit that there was anything of the nature of imposture in Christ's claims and works. He says such a charge 'should blister the mouth that makes it.' And there is something touching and suggestive in the words that tell of Mr. Abbot's mental state when he speaks of being compelled by conviction to withdraw the confidence with which he formerly gave in his testimony to Christ's Messiahship. He says he does not turn away 'in levity or mockery or defiance.' Out of his lost faith, he tells us, have sprung his own 'most hallowed experiences.' He goes still farther in his frankness, which seems to have in it a tinge of melancholy, when he adds: 'Once I felt the full power of the Christian faith . . . but come what may, let me never . . . make my heart the coffin of a murdered truth.'

It is impossible not to respect a frank and intense moral earnestness; and a Christian should be the last to complain of thorough fidelity to conviction, wherever that is found. Mr. Abbot must stand or fall to his own Master, like the rest of us. We do not attempt to judge him. We know there are honest doubters, as Thomas was. But we cannot help thinking that Mr. Abbot is giving up the Sun for the Milky Way, and leaving the eternal Rock for the shifting quicksands. The mere Theism which he advocates, we believe lacks the power to redeem the race that Christ would draw to himself; and we cannot help thinking that THE INDEX will prove a sorry, a local, and a short-lived substitute for the Old Book. When the Toledo preacher's ministry has ended, we confidently anticipate the coming of many generations of Christian teachers, who will hold up Christ's cross and vocalize Paul's theology in the presence of believing multitudes that willingly and wisely forget the Theistic protest that they may emphasize the Christian confession.

We have left only a bit of space in which to speak of The Woman's Journal. But, in a word, we may say that we heartily welcome so calm, clear, intelligent, dignified and vigorous a sheet as this, as an exponent of the new theory of woman's true sphere and functions. Its board of editors is such as to assure us of something better than tirades, extravagance, audacity and common scolding. Here is the list, and in point of large and varied ability, solid character, and ample experience which the names suggest, it is confessedly a rare one: Mary A. Livermore, Julia Ward Howe, Lucy Stone, Wm. Lloyd Garrison and T. W. Higginson. We shall certainly have brain, culture, sagacity, discretion and fairness, as well as purpose and pluck in The Woman's Journal. The first number is full of promise. It has no bile and no mere sentiment. Its earnestness is calm. It propounds its dogmas with decision, not with a belligerent defiance. Assuming sometimes more than we can yet concede, and calling some things proofs whose testimony appears to us quite ambiguous, it evidently means to honor fair play, and carry public conviction by argument and evidence, rather than by sophistry and clamor. Seeing that the question must be discussed from the woman's rights standpoint, we gladly welcome so able and deserving a sheet into the arena of debate. Those who would know what is being thought and said by the ablest advocates of an enlarged sphere for woman, can do no better than to send for this well printed and ably managed paper.

Read the advertisement of THE INDEX in another column. The spirit and candor of its editor is a guarantee that free thought will find in it a champion. We welcome such reinforcements to our side in the battle of ideas, and wish it all manner of success and usefulness. Mr. Abbot is not a Christian, but is something better, an honest man and free thinker.

A NEW PAPER.—THE INDEX is the title of a new paper published in Toledo, by Rev. Francis E. Abbot, who is also its Editor. Its mission is to advocate "Free Religion," which the Editor defines in a series of concise propositions. Mr. Abbot is a clear and forcible writer, and an independent and fearless thinker. Those who agree with his views of religion and morals will recognize in him an able defender. The paper is neatly printed—quarto in form—and will contain every week a discourse on some religious or moral topic by the editor, besides articles from the officers of the "Free Religious Association," which is composed of such men as Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Robert Dale Owen, Mrs. C. M. Severance, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, and W. J. Potter. The paper is furnished to subscribers for $2.00 per annum. Address the publisher, F. E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio.

[From the Toledo WOCHENTLICHE EXPRESS (translated).]

We welcome with pleasure the announcement of the appearance of a new weekly paper in English, which will be published here, at and after New Year, under the editorial care of Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Mr. Abbot, the minister of the First Independent Society, is no stranger to our readers. Many of them have already heard his discourses before his congregation; most of them have read his lecture against the Sabbatharians and his oration at the celebration of the centennial Anniversary of Humboldt's Birthday, and thereby learned to know him as a liberal, as well as a cultivated man. . . . Considering the religious prejudices of most English newspapers in general, and of the two in this place in particular, the establishment of a liberal English sheet in this neighborhood, and under such able management, is of incalculable value for the dissemination of liberal views among our American fellow-citizens. Every free-thinking German, therefore, should make it a matter of personal duty to support it in every possible way.

[From the COMMONER, Cincinnati, Ohio.]

THE INDEX, a journal devoted to free religion, and published in the interest of an organization that enjoys its freedom amazingly just yet, is in the same fix as Mr. Vickers. The very first page of the paper contains fifty affirmations; some of which breathe the air of liberty; but some also that smell of close churchism. We will quote only two illustrations:—
(38.) "The great faith or moving power of Free Religion is faith in man, as a progressive being."
(40.) "The great peace of Free Religion is spiritual oneness with the infinite One."

The first one throws the door wide open; the second is a half closing of it. We are quite willing to believe that our free religionists intend to keep it from being shut entirely, but we are not so clear that they have unreservedly set their faces forward; and we will give our reasons.

In the first place why call their organization Free Religion? Is it from regard to our reigning public opinion, which requires us all to have some religion? And is it to cover some weak brethren who want that cloak to be free in? If we have read THE INDEX correctly, its editors and co-operators mean to assert for America what the tyrannical spirit of public opinion, educated in a narrow theology, denies us, viz: our right and duty to re-examine and to subject to the test of advanced knowledge each and all the dogmas of the churches, and also every word of the Bible. If this be so, then they should have said "free philosophy"—or "free searching of truth"—and not free religion. Having religion presupposes faith in some creed, and the two words free and religion contradict each other. Religio means a bond of union; it comes from religare—which signifies to bind up. Nine out of ten men imply when they assert that they have a religion, that they have settled in their minds into some belief; for which they can readily repeat the words out of some catechism.

THE INDEX.—Through the kindness of "Hap-Hazard," our friend and correspondent from Toledo, we learn that Rev. Francis Ellingwood Abbot, minister of the First Independent Society of that city, has published the prospectus of a weekly paper soon to be issued, bearing the above title, and to be under the editorial care of Mr. Abbot himself. Its aim will be to increase pure and genuine religion in the world—freedom of religious thought and action, devoid of every species of spiritual slavery and form of superstition. "Standing squarely outside of Christianity," says the prospectus, "it will yet aim to be just to it, recognizing its excellencies, noting its defects." I admire the basis upon which THE INDEX will be placed—it is the right one. A. J. B.

THE INDEX.—We are in receipt of the first number of THE INDEX—a weekly publication of beautiful typographical appearance, published by The Index Company, Toledo, O., and edited by Rev. Francis Ellingwood Abbot, a man well-known as a radical writer of the ultra-Unitarian school,—an advocate of Free Thought Religion, which to our mind, is the only true phase of the term religion in the world. If one does not exercise free thought in religion, as in other matters, then indeed is one's mind enslaved. We wish THE INDEX a successful career. A. J. B.

[From the NORTHWESTERN FARMER, Indianapolis, Ind.]

THE INDEX, published by the Index Association, of Toledo, Ohio, is edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot, pastor of the Free Religious Society of that city, and is the freest and most radical religious paper in America. Those who sympathize with the free religious movement now sweeping over this country, will find THE INDEX a most interesting paper. Of course it is able,—the name of the editor is a guarantee of that. Weekly, $2 a year; samples 5 cents.

[From THE ST. JOSEPH VALLEY REGISTER, South Bend, Ind.]

THE INDEX, a paper advocating "free religion," which being freely translated means "no religion," has been started in Toledo, Ohio, and the editors [this is a mistake] have sent us a copy for a notice. Here it is.

[From THE EVENING POST, Chicago, Ill.]

We have examined the first number of THE INDEX, an organ of Free Religion, published at Toledo, with a good deal of interest. When we state that its editor is Francis E. Abbot, persons familiar with current American literature will understand that it is conducted with ability, scholarship, the most admirable courtesy, and the widest catholicity of spirit. "Theism and Atheism, Spiritualism and Materialism, Transcendentalism and Positivism, Free Religion and Christianity—in short, every phase of earnest thought—shall have a fair chance to be heard, and on equal terms." Such is a portion of the prospectus of THE INDEX. There is a great deal of truth, marred, as we think, by certain subtle errors, in the new organ of Free Religion, but it will present many nuts for authority to crack; and for ability, candor and liberality, is surely entitled to the favorable consideration of the intelligent public, both orthodox and heterodox.

"TWELVE APOSTLES OF HERESY."—On Sunday of last week was commenced in Horticultural Hall, Boston, a series of lectures by noted persons who are called "The Twelve Apostles of Heresy." It is stated that New England orthodoxy considers this course of lectures designed to overthrow the settled religious opinions of that notable section of our country. The subject of much remark in New England society and New England journalism, religious and secular, it is probable it will result in general discussion. The whole course of lectures, as marked out for "The Twelve Apostles of Heresy," is, we believe—Sunday, Jan. 23, John Weiss, "False and True Sentiment of Nature." Jan. 30, O. B. Frothingham, "The Revealed and the Hidden God." Feb. 6, T. W. Higginson, "The Sympathy of Religions." Feb. 13, Samuel Longfellow, "Theism." Feb. 20, Julia Ward Howe, "The Ethics of Culture." Feb. 27, Francis E. Abbot, "Jesus and Socrates in the History of Religion." March 6, John S. Dwight, "Music." March 13, William J. Potter, "The Agency of Law and of Persons in Human History." March 20, Ednah D. Cheney, "The Function of Art in Life." March 27, D. A. Wasson, "Providence." April 3, William Henry Channing, "The Church of Universal Unity." April 10, Wendell Phillips, subject not announced, but no doubt a demonstration that religion is the great reformer, and the church the great conservative.

These twelve apostles will surely give the Bostonians who may attend Horticultural Hall Sunday afternoons an admirable variety of discourse. Whether they shall succeed in upsetting New England orthodoxy is another question. It is hardly to be expected that the present course will succeed in doing so much, even in the opinion of skepticism itself.

But there is a considerable organized movement in the country against the Christian Church. It has more friends, perhaps, in New England, than elsewhere, but is not without adherents in other parts of the republic. One of the lecturers spoken of above—Francis E. Abbot—has recently established a weekly journal at Toledo, Ohio, which is an avowed advocate of Free Religion. Mr. Abbot is known to the literary world as the author of a number of metaphysical articles in the North American Review, which received the considerate attention of thoughtful men in this country and in other countries, to whom he is known as a man of genius, of great culture, and of pure life. An Unitarian preacher for some time in New Hampshire, he was, by process of law, we believe, ejected from his pulpit, and is now preaching Free Religion, and editing an organ of Free Religion at Toledo. That organ is making something of a stir. The concluding propositions among the "fifty affirmations" which constitute the platform, so to say, of Free Religion, make a summing up of the whole, and are:

"The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus, and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of free religion is that of self-respect and free self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is prostrate on its face. Free Religion is erect on its feet.

"The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus' sake. The noblest fruit of free religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake.

"Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; free religion is the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into free religion, lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race."

The age has been described as "destitute of faith, but terrified at skepticism." In that case, it will be little less than horrified at a number of propositions among the Fifty Affirmations of Free Religion, and at the whole as the verbal embodiment of a system.

Whether the "spiritual unity of the human race" is desirable, is a proposition that may admit of doubt. There has been a spiritual unity of Christendom; and it was a dark age for the world. It may be that the spiritual unity did not produce the intellectual darkness, as it has been called, but at least a prima facie case is made out which those who insist upon unity must rebut, whether Roman Catholics or Free Religionists. The human race might have been so constituted that religious unity would be a very desirable thing. The world might have been so constituted that there would be a perpetual summer everywhere. But it was not so made, and undoubtedly because it would have been stupid to so make it. Storms are evidences of wisdom. Conflicts—irrepressible conflicts—produce progress; and even war scotches a vast deal of unworthiness from certain classes of the general public. We think there is very little harm done by people being too much Presbyterians, or Congregationalists, or Methodists, or Baptists. Their controversies among each other would keep things lively and interesting, even during the millennium. At any rate, we had better not give up sects, all of which have some philosophy to uphold them, and which have accomplished infinite good in the world; which are at this moment at the head and front of nearly every good and honest work of benevolence toward men—we had better not give these up, though their adherents acknowledge the efficacy of the grace of humility, even for that sect which would have us all agree with each other, all standing up in our proud manhood to jaw at our Maker. The eagle stoops before it soars. In the presence of the Creator, it will do man no harm, but great good, to drop on his knees occasionally.

But, not to enter into argumentation on the subject, the advocates of Free Religion are bent on making a vigorous campaign. The New York Independent, whilom a religious journal, has the "Twelve Apostles of Heresy" handsomely written up, and we give orthodoxy fair warning that it must prepare to make a brave and vigorous warfare against the new enemy, and to send him in utter rout and discomfiture from the field.

[From THE NEW COVENANT, Chicago, Ill.]

THE INDEX.—Rev. Francis Ellingwood Abbot, of Toledo, Ohio, announces a new publication, THE INDEX. Mr. A. is "minister of the First Independent Society" of Toledo. He has repudiated the Christian name, in which he shows himself an honest man, too honest to sail under a flag to which he is not loyal. He has succeeded in securing only a very small hearing in the pulpit, usually having from twenty to sixty [a mistake] in his congregations. Most people's instincts are averse to encouraging such men as Mr. Abbot. They may have their own doubts, but their regard for human happiness impels them not to encourage and promote doubt in others by sustaining an anointed apostle of unbelief. We recognize Mr. Abbot's right to think and speak as he wishes to, and would do nothing to prevent him from telling the world what he believes—or does not believe—but for his own influence's sake, and for the sake of others, we shall hope that he may be as powerless in the press as he appears to be in the pulpit.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Oct. 17, 1869.]

On one of the banners carried by the children in the procession at the recent Humboldt Celebration, I read this motto:—"EDUCATION MAKES FREE (Bildung macht frei). Let these words stand as the text of my morning's discourse. So important is the right education of the young, especially in moral and spiritual directions, that I conceive it to be the corner-stone of a free and noble State. Only the educated nation is fit or able to be free. Throughout history we shall find that education tends to freedom, and ignorance to despotism. Conversely, freedom tends to education, despotism to ignorance.

A most striking illustration of this fact is to be seen in the attitude always assumed by the Roman Catholic Church towards popular education. Fully believing the maxim of Lord Bacon, that "knowledge is power," the Roman Church during the middle ages took care to educate its own clergy in all the learning of the period, and at the same time to prevent the people at large from sharing its own intellectual illumination. Desiring to retain all power in its own hands exclusively, it monopolized all knowledge within itself. Wherever, as in Austria, Italy, and Spain, the Church has held control of the State and dictated its policy, the people still remain sunk in the grossest ignorance; and centuries may yet be required before these nations shall become really fitted to govern themselves by Republican methods. We see the same tendency in Romanism even in our own country. The attempts, partially successful in New York, which the Catholic Church is making to undermine our free school system, and, if unable to ruin it, at least to rule it, reveal the close dependence of despotic authority, whether temporal or spiritual, upon popular ignorance. The recent controversy in Cincinnati and elsewhere concerning the control of the public schools is full of instruction, and should be thoughtfully studied by all lovers of republican institutions. The very safety of America as a free country depends on our jealous protection of the free school system; and if, out of a politic compliance or criminal indifference, we shall be persuaded to sacrifice our system of secular schools to the ambition or fanaticism of Romish priests, we shall yet live to deplore our folly in sack-cloth and ashes.

Nor is it only the crafty schemes of Rome that we have to guard against. The bigotry of evangelical Protestants, who refuse to exclude the Bible altogether from our schools, and thus manifest the same spirit of ecclesiastical interference with popular education, is the chief obstacle to-day to the thorough secularization of our schools. How can we ask the Catholics to send their children to be instructed in the Protestant Bible? It must be confessed that the Catholics have the best of the argument, so long as we insist on the public reading of Protestant Scriptures in the schools. Our only consistent course is to prohibit the use of the Bible altogether in schools designed equally for all our population. We violate the free-school principle by consenting to retain the Bible, and obliging all children alike to listen to public readings from it. Free schools must be purely secular schools, until the great principle of religious liberty is rooted in the hearts of the entire people,—until religion itself has become something better than dogma; which is as yet by no means the case. The public schools should teach only what all the people wish to have taught; while instruction in special directions should be imparted elsewhere. Arithmetic, grammar, geography, history, languages, science, etc., belong, therefore, to the proper province of the public schools; but the doctrines which different sects are unable to agree upon among themselves, should not be forced upon children whose parents object to their receiving such instruction.

It is in this necessary limitation of the public schools to branches desired by all alike, that we find the origin of the Sunday School system. Sunday Schools originated among Protestants, and were first founded to give instruction on subjects seen to be out of place in the common schools. Each sect began to instruct its own young in its own peculiar ideas. However false these sectarian ideas may have been, the movement was one in the right direction. It had its root in a consciousness that man, after all, is born for higher thoughts than can be got out of the primer, the atlas, or the multiplication table,—a consciousness that true education must include the development of all moral and spiritual powers. What is education but the unfolding, the "drawing-out," of all that is latent in human nature, and the training of all faculties in natural ways? It is true that Sunday Schools have been made too often mere engines for cramping the young soul into harsh and baleful postures; but let us be just to those who believed that distortion of nature was growth in grace. They wished to supplement the work of the public schools to the best of their ability; they wished to teach virtue and piety as something higher than parsing or cyphering; and if they supposed that the Catechism was the gate of heaven, or had some occult connection with the graces of character they sought to develop, let us not be blind to the merit of their endeavor to unfold the mind in its noblest powers. Somewhat bunglingly, it must be confessed, yet quite honestly and earnestly, have the supporters of sectarian Sunday Schools labored to perfect man and develop his higher nature. Although they have misconceived both the end and the means, nevertheless they have been pioneers in a work that will assume greater importance in men's eyes as time goes on.

The establishment of Sunday Schools, implying as it did an unconscious reliance upon natural, as opposed to supernatural, "means of grace,"—an appreciation of early moral instruction of the young as an indispensable condition of ultimate moral character,—was certainly a radical innovation and improvement upon previous practices and ideas. In fact, I regard it as one of the most significant appearances of the spirit of Free Religion, gradually and unconsciously developing itself within the confines of Christianity. So far, therefore, from there being any tendency in Free Religion to abolish the institution of Sunday Schools, the very establishment of them was really the work of Free Religion itself. Radicalism will only carry out more completely, with clearer insight and wiser methods, the plans crudely conceived and feebly executed within the Christian Church. Natural culture rather than supernatural intervention, as the means of raising character to its highest available excellence,—this is the principle upon which Sunday Schools rest; and surely there can be no principle more thoroughly radical in tendency and results. Natural development instead of supernatural conversion is the method of perfecting character relied upon by Free Religion; and what is plainer than that this method, although adopted in Sunday Schools by the Christian Church, is incompatible with that doctrine of salvation by "regeneration" which has been claimed as one great peculiarity of Christianity? If men can be saved only by the "second birth," and if they can be "born again" only by the Spirit of God

"blowing where it listeth," what use or profit could there be in depending on simple instruction in spiritual truth? Poor Nicodemus, bewildered by the mystic and transcendental Jesus of the fourth Gospel, makes a sorry show in the story, and has been despised these eighteen hundred years for his supposed spiritual obtuseness; but, in establishing Sunday Schools, the Christian Church has practised the gospel of Nicodemus, discarding that of Jesus. I claim that the Sunday School is based on a principle which recognizes the agency of God in natural laws rather than in supernatural influences, and thus discards the theory of a "second birth" in favor of the theory of the gradual development of all exalted character. For this reason, it is an institution founded on Free Religion, not on Christianity, and as such will flourish best under the nurture of radical ideas.

There is, consequently, good ground for the expectation that, when the world is thoroughly radicalized, it will feel greater interest and manifest a stronger faith in Sunday Schools than it has ever done hitherto. Signs appear every day that men's confidence in education is growing stronger and deeper. Universities and colleges are multiplying in America with a rapidity alarmingly suggestive of mushrooms. Developed intelligence is felt to be the only secure foundation for a free government; and the only means of creating and perpetuating this foundation is universal popular education. The great work of radical reform, however, is to make this education INTEGRAL,—that is, to make it include the culture of the whole man, and save it from the danger of being partial or one-sided. Americans are prone to excessive admiration of mere intellect,—to the forgetfulness of moral nobility. Go through the streets and ask the first ten men you meet whether, if obliged to choose between the two, they would rather be fools or knaves,—and I very much fear that nine out of the ten would choose to be knaves. So extreme has this worship of intellect become, that a great criminal who evinces unusual intellectual power is often more admired than condemned. Why do men pay such homage to mere success? Chiefly, I believe, because they infer that success must be due to mental power. It is not true that men respect scoundrelism; but, if the scoundrel succeeds, is there any lack of admirers? The melancholy fact is, that admiration for the mental strength supposed to be implied in success overpowers and well-nigh extinguishes indignation at the moral turpitude which has been its price. No man could possibly admire intellectual greatness more than I do; yet I confess it pains me deeply to see men rate intellectual higher than moral greatness. "Well, he is smart!"—how often we hear that comment on some shrewd piece of knavery, instead of the stern and grand verdict of an offended sense of right! What do I care how "smart" a man is, if he uses his smartness to ruin or cheat his neighbor? In no respect does public opinion need so profound a reformation as in the comparative estimate it forms of intellectual ability and moral worth. Both are needed; but, if one must be dispensed with, in God's name let it not be moral worth! You may vote me fool, if you must; but, as I live, you shall never vote me knave. Self-respect as a man of integrity and high character,—not self-conceit, but that consciousness of uprightness which is neither more nor less than the inwardly felt approval of the universal conscience,—self-respect thus understood, I say, is the supreme good of the human soul. Perish everything that shall conflict with it! Let this be written as the most sacred law of every soul,—that it shall not debase itself in its own eyes.

Here, then, we reach down deep to the real ground of justification for the existence of the Sunday School. It aims (or will aim, when things are as they should be) to make education integral,—to develop that nobler part of human nature which, when enthroned as supreme, beholds all things in their true proportions, and rules as lord of all. It aims so thoroughly to cultivate the conscience, that, in all emergencies and all temptations, outward action shall be without fail the musical ring of the true inward metal. It aims to train and discipline the moral powers to quick discrimination, and to brave and lofty choice, in every alternative of right and wrong. It aims to attune the soul to high and fine sentiment,—to delight and exultation in all that is morally beautiful, to hatred and loathing for all that is morally foul, to pity and sympathy for all that is morally weak. It aims to kindle into a perpetual glow that consciousness of human fellowship which makes the miseries of every other human being our own immediate concern, and prompts us to unselfish activity in all possible beneficence. It aims to touch and deepen the sense of that infinite Mystery in the universe which in our ignorance we are wont to call God,—that vast, unfathomable Power, ever latent yet ever patent, which in some unguessed fashion we feel to be akin to our own souls,—that ever-brooding Presence which is at once the unity of Nature and the highest life of Man. It aims, in short, to unfold the petals of each fresh human bud under the warm rays of sympathy; to make good the promise, implied in human nature itself, that every human being shall develop into enlarged moral and spiritual life. This is what the Sunday School aims at, or ought to aim at. By thus seeking to cultivate the best and loveliest side of human character,—the side which most of all needs tender and assiduous cultivation,—it supplements the free public school, which aims solely at intellectual cultivation; and thus makes education truly integral or comprehensive.

To condense what I have said and present it as a single thought,—the function of the Sunday School is to carry up the education commenced in the free public school, and complete the development of the human soul by calling into healthy, natural activity its moral and religious faculties. The education which is to "make free" in reality, must not stop short of this higher and finer work. No man, however intellectual or learned, is free, who remains a slave to his own passions, or binds himself apprentice to cold calculation of self-interest. The freeman must be free from everything that is low, base, cruel, dishonest, unmanly. Hence the culture that is to emancipate us must include conscience and sentiment and will, no less than intellect. Were it not for this need of humanity to be developed in the highest directions, the Sunday School would not be what I believe it may yet become,—the typical social institution of Free Religion.

A story is told of the aged and venerable Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia, which is worth repeating in this connection. A young physician, in conversation with him, once dropped the phrase—"When I finished my education,"—"Finished your education?" gently interrupted Dr. Rush, "why, I have not yet finished mine!" There is as great wisdom as modesty in this reply. Education should begin with life, and not end before it. The scope of the Sunday School must yet be so enlarged, as perhaps to swallow and absorb the Society itself, which is, after all, but a higher Sunday School. Both Sunday School and Society propose the same object, namely, development of the higher nature of man. There should be a life-long continuation of study, at least of thought, upon the questions connected with our ideal life and our ultimate destiny. We are all children and learners,—none above the need of increased knowledge and spiritual wisdom. The great truths by which we live are indeed few and simple,—the sunshine and the rain which are poured freely upon all. But the applications of these truths are countless, often complex; and we all need to concentrate the light of earnest thought upon the higher relations of human life.

A few words ought to be said about the kind of organization of the Sunday School required by the new position of this Society. Not much change, if any, will be necessary. The principle of pure liberty, upon which we have planted ourselves, requires that the Society as a whole shall have no opinions or creed, but shall allow each individual member to cherish his or her own opinions in perfect freedom. The Society must carefully refrain from committing itself as such to any belief or set of beliefs; but the various individuals composing it will hold whatever beliefs shall seem to them to be true. The bond of union among us is the love of truth, the spirit of mutual respect and free equality, the desire of co-operating heartily in all good works without asking any imperinent previous questions concerning points of doctrine. This is a complete union of liberty and law, a solution of the question how to organize for practical work without infringing on private freedom. Now the Sunday School should stand on precisely the same basis. It should be emphatically an Independent Sunday School, uncommitted to any doctrine on any subject; it should have no catechism for instructing all the children in the same set of ideas; it should not seek to create a uniformity of opinion on any point whatever, but should aim rather at the creation of a uniform sentiment of kindness and good will, a uniform purpose of acting from high motives and of helping each other in every good work or way, and a uniform spirit of love of truth for its own pure sake.

Instead, therefore, of all the teachers adopting one book or one method of instruction, each teacher should be left perfectly free to teach what he or she shall judge to be the truth; and the parents of the children should be free to choose what their children shall learn. A diversity of beliefs among the teachers will be no hindrance to their real usefulness. It is idle to attempt to conceal from our children the fact that men differ fundamentally on the most important questions. It is, on the contrary, far wiser to inform them of these great differences of belief, and endeavor to lead them to the formation of independent opinions of their own. Teach a child how to think, rather than impress your own thought upon his mind. The Sunday School teachers should be willing to prepare themselves for their work beforehand, and aim to develop the mental and spiritual nature of the child, without seeking too anxiously to determine the exact direction of this development. Nature takes care of that. Provided the young mind is trained to use its thinking powers conscientiously and earnestly, it can safely be trusted to enter the arena of conflicting opinions.

Let the Sunday School, then, be as free as the parlor or the street; the child is here exposed to the most diverse intellectual influences,—made to hear the most contradictory opinions on all subjects. No more harm will result from attendance at a Sunday School where the different teachers communicate different ideas to their pupils. On the whole, I believe that the sturdiest characters and minds are those which are developed under the greatest variety of influences. Let, then, the Sunday School be as free as the Society, uncommitted to any ism and unbound by any service-book or catechism. Let every teacher be perfectly free to teach according to his or her own honest convictions of truth, without any effort or wish on the part of any one to secure a perfectly uniform system of instruction among all the teachers. Give free play to native tact. Whatever shall be found to increase the interest of the scholars, or promote their welfare, we shall be as free to do hereafter as heretofore. The precise methods to be employed will be better discussed elsewhere than here; I have only sought to indicate the general purpose and scope of the radical Sunday School, and to emphasize the importance of keeping it as thoroughly independent of dogmatic tenets as the Society itself. If we rear our children in the pure air of liberty from their cradles, there is little danger that they will plunge into the stifling atmosphere of moral license, or seek to breathe in the exhausted receiver of orthodoxy. Rightly conducted, the Sunday School is one of the best possible auxiliaries to home instruction; and I hope sincerely that we shall all be earnest to make our own better and more beneficial than it has ever been before.

BEGINNINGS OF EVIL.

[From the N. Y. Independent.]

Four hundred and twelve thousand dollars—not far from half a million of dollars—were paid over from the public treasury in this city to the Roman Catholic Church during the past year. This looks alarming; but we shall presently show that the amount is nothing in itself compared with the other grants made to the same denomination. It is, indeed, specially ominous, because it is the first practical operation of an entirely new principle in our legislation; but the four hundred and odd thousand dollars will not seem much when compared with other and more liberal gifts which we New Yorkers have been pouring into the same outstretched hands. For example: in 1866 we—that is to say, our municipal representatives—gave to the Roman Catholic archbishop, for a nominal consideration of one dollar a year, half a block of ground on Madison Avenue, now worth $200,000. In 1852 we gave to the same sect, for $83 consideration, the fee of a whole block of ground running from Fifth to Fourth avenues, which is now worth a million and a half of dollars. In 1864 we paid this sect $24,000 for the privilege of extending Madison Avenue across this very ground which we had thus flung away; and we added a donation of $8,928 to pay the assessments.

In 1846 we gave them half the next block on Fifth Avenue for one dollar rent, and in 1857 we generously threw in the rest of the block—it was not worth making two bites of a cherry—for another dollar; and this block is now worth another million and a half of dollars. Thus we have during the time mentioned given in real estate nearly three millions and a half of dollars to the Roman Catholic Church in New York.

But there is something special about last year's grant. The other donations were outbursts of generosity; this is a legal tax, representing a new principle of church endowment.

CATHOLICISM ON LEARNING TO READ.

[From the Liberal Christian.]

One of the most outspoken expressions of repugnance to popular education is from the Shepherd of the Valley, a Roman Catholic newspaper once published at St. Louis, where they say:—"We are not the friend of popular education as at present understood. The popularity of a humbug shall never, we trust, lead us to support it. We do not believe that the 'masses,' as our modern reformers insultingly call the laboring class, are one whit more happy, more respectable, or better informed, for knowing how to read. We think that the masses were never less happy, less respectable, and less respected than they have been since the Reformation, and particularly within the last fifty or one hundred years—since Lord Brougham caught the mania of teaching them to read, and communicated the disease to a large proportion of the English nation. The idea that teaching people to read furnishes them with innocent amusement is entirely false. It furnishes the majority of those who seek amusement from it with the most dangerous recreation in which they can indulge.

JUDGE SHARSWOOD ON INFIDELITY.

[From the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.]

A recent decision rendered at Philadelphia by Judge Sharswood, of the Supreme Court, is to the effect that a charitable bequest to an Infidel Society is void. The case, which was in error to the Court of Nisi Prius, is in substance as follows:—Levi Nice bequeathed property to the "Infidel Society of Philadelphia," on the following terms:

"Immediately after the death of both my said grand nieces, then it is my will that my real estate aforesaid shall go to and be held in fee simple by the Infidel Society in Philadelphia, hereafter to be incorporated, and to be held and disposed of by them for the purpose of building a hall for the free discussion of religion, politics," &c.

Judge Sharswood held that, inasmuch as the said Society was not in existence at the time of the making of the will, and as it was moreover improbable that it ever would exist—at least, not for a long time—the bequest was invalid, for it had reference to the possible existence of a society which again depended on the possibility of the State's incorporating it, and, as Lord Coke says:—"A possibility upon a possibility is never admitted by intendment of law." The reason why the judge thought the creation of such a corporate society was improbable was, that if the nature and objects of the corporation were to be inferred from its name, it would be an association of Infidels or unbelievers for the purpose of promulgating Infidelity, or a denial of the doctrines and obligations of revealed religion. It must be so understood according to the commonly received meaning of the term. Such an association, it would seem, could not be incorporated under any of the general laws of the Commonwealth. The acts of April 6, 1791, 3 Smith, 20, and of October 18, 1840, Pamph. 2, 1841, p. 5, provide for the incorporation of Societies for any literary, charitable, or religious purpose, and beneficial Societies or associations. It could scarcely be considered as within either the letter or spirit of these acts. The possibility that there would be such a Society during the particular state of life was, therefore, too remote to render the devise competent to take at the time. Had the testator mentioned an Infidel Society in existence at the time of the making of the devise, that would have been another matter; but he made it an essential quality of the Society thus selected that it was "hereafter to be incorporated." No Court would ever be likely to administer such charity, for the administration of which there were no trustees in existence, and, therefore, the devise as a charity was void. After stating the above reasons for his decision, the judge went on to say:—

"In placing the decision on this ground, however, it must not be understood that I mean to concede that a devise for such a purpose as was evidently contemplated by this testator, even if a competent trustee had been named, would be sustained as a valid charitable use in this State. These endowments originated in England at a period when the religious sentiment was strong, and their tendency was to run into superstition. In modern times the danger is of the opposite extreme of licentiousness. It is necessary that they should be carefully guarded from either, and preserved in that happy mean between both, which will most conduce to the true interests of society. Established principles will enable the Courts to accomplish this. Charity is love to God and love to our neighbor, the fulfillment of the two great commandments upon which hang all the law and the prophets. The most invaluable possessions of man are faith, hope, and charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity. It is not easy to see how these are to be promoted by the dissemination of Infidelity, which robs men of faith and hope, if not of charity also. It is unnecessary here to discuss the question under what limitations the principle is to be admitted that Christianity is part of the common law of Pennsylvania. It is in entire consistency with the sacred guarantee of the rights of conscience and religious liberty contained in the constitution of the State to hold that, even if Christianity is not part of the law of the land, it is the popular religion of the country, an insult to which would be indictable as directly tending to disturb the public peace. The laws and institutions of this State are built on the foundation of reverence for Christianity. To this extent, at least, it must certainly be considered as well settled that the religion revealed in the Bible is not to be openly reviled, ridiculed or blasphemed, to the annoyance of sincere believers who compose the great mass of the good people of the commonwealth. Updegraff vs. The Commonwealth, 11 S. & R. 304. Vidal vs. Girard's Executors, 2 Howard (U. S.) 198. I can conceive of nothing so likely—so sure, indeed—to produce these consequences, as a hall dedicated in perpetuity to the free discussion of religion, politics, et cetera, under the direction and administration of a Society of Infidels. Indeed, I would go further, and adopt the sentiment and language of Mr. Justice Duncan in the case just referred to:—“It would be a nursery of vice, a school of preparation to qualify young men for the gallows and young women for the brothel; and there is not a skeptic of decent manners and good morals who would not consider such a debating club as a common nuisance and disgrace to the city.”

CHRISTIANITY NO PART OF THE COMMON LAW.

[FROM JUDGE STALLO'S "SECULARIZATION OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION."]

The doctrine thus seriously (and in view of the exigencies of their case necessarily) broached by our opponents, that Christianity is part of the common law of our State, because this law has its roots in Christian civilization, is a momentous doctrine. It is pregnant with the most serious consequences. It draws in question the civil rights, as I believe, of nearly one-half of our citizens. I propose to examine it, therefore, candidly, fearlessly, and, as far as I may, thoroughly. If this is a Christian country, in the sense that the non-Christians have no rights which the Christians are bound to respect, or in the narrower sense, that the Christians enjoy rights and privileges which the law denies to non-Christians, the time has come for the reflux of the wave which has brought so many millions of European thinkers and laborers to the shores of the new Western world.

While entering upon the new inquiry into the truth or falsity of this great fundamental theory of our opponents, I am puzzled in limine to understand, what is meant by the sounding phrase, that Christianity is part of the common law of the State. The law—positive civil law—either imposes duties or it confers rights. If Christianity is part of the law of the State, then there must be certain duties enjoined upon the citizens which are peculiarly Christian, or certain rights which none but Christians possess. Now the duties enforced by the State, the duty to respect your neighbor's life, his person, his property, his good name, to refrain from murder, robbery, theft, defamation, etc., are not peculiarly Christian duties; they are enforced or at least enjoined by all States whose citizens are civilized in any modern sense. They are enjoined and enforced because their observance is essential to the very existence and good order of society, and not because they are Christian virtues. I know of no duty which the State recognizes as a merely Christian duty. Similarly I know of no right which the Christian holds in preference over the professors of another creed or of no creed. The Jew, for instance, can hold property. He can acquire it by inheritance, or by devise, or by purchase. He can sue and be sued. There are the same remedies, civil and criminal, for wrongs inflicted upon a Jew, as for those done to a Christian. The Jew can be a witness in a court of justice, for the Constitution provides that “no person shall be incompetent to be a witness on account of his religious belief.” The Jew has the right to vote. He can hold any office, for again the Constitution provides, “that no religious tests shall be required as a qualification for office.” A Jew may sit upon the bench and administer justice, “without respect of persons,” between Christians, as a Jew now sits upon the bench in New York. A Jew may not only administer the law, but help to make it. A Jew sat last winter in the Ohio Legislature, and there is nothing in the Constitution to hinder that the majority of the Legislature may be Jews—a case which, according to the theory of the plaintiffs, would present the remarkable anomaly of a body of Jews making Christian laws. A Jew was recently appointed by this Court Commissioner of the Southern railroad. Jews have sat in both Houses of Congress. A Jew may be President of the United States, if he has the requisite other qualifications and can obtain the requisite number of electoral votes. A Jewish Temple or Synagogue is exempt from taxation no less than a Christian church. I might proceed indefinitely with this enumeration of rights, but I have gone far enough to show that there is no particular, definite civil right, which Jews, Christians, and non-believers do not share in common. And in view of this I am not able to see the force of the assertion so frequently and so confidently made, that Christianity is part of the law of the State. It is strange, that any one should at this day refer to the nebulous deliverances of Judge Story in his Commentaries of the Constitution (secs. 1870-1879), and seek to discredit, as an obiter dictum, the emphatic language of our own Supreme Court in the case of Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio State Reports, 357.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—“I saw in your last issue an appeal in behalf of those who would like to take your paper, but cannot afford it. I laid it down, thinking that, as I had caused it to be sent into five families for the same reason, the appeal did not touch me; but it was of no use to argue that way. I felt as if I had no right to close my ears, or rather eyes, to such a request, so I enclose a money order for eight dollars, to help on the best Home Missionary enterprise I know of. THE INDEX meets my expectations exactly; bold, fearless, no compromise, cutting straight to the mark. What a change time makes in one's ideas and faith! When you declared that you renounced the Christian name, I endorsed the words of —, ‘he is a bold man,’ but could not help feeling, as if you had almost taken your stand outside of civilization, for that word and Christianity seemed of the same import; to-day I try to spread THE INDEX because I feel its stand-point to be the true one. Outside of Christianity I am,—compelled to be there by the belief in the manhood of Jesus and the fatherhood of God.

Your article on the McFarland case caused me to see how much I had been in the habit of taking assertions about the humanizing effect of Christianity on trust. It is a common saying that woman owes her present position in America and Europe to Christianity. I don't believe we have a right to modify, amend, and enlarge the original Gospels, and call the production the same thing, only taken in the spirit instead of the letter. I have half a mind to study the New Testament, to discover what the state of society would be, if its rules were strictly followed and obeyed, in contrast with the present. I suspect most Christians would be very unwilling to make the change.”

—“Number 5 of your excellent little paper came yesterday, and I have finished reading the Lecture. It is literally true that I cannot find words to thank you. In the fulness of time comes THE INDEX, and I am already made better by it. I long to share my enjoyment with others, but as yet know of no one in this orthodox community who is able to bear the strong meat which every number contains. May I not be found wanting when the opportunity comes, if it ever does, to give of what it makes my heart ache to keep to myself, and yet of what I know my friends and acquaintances here are not ready to appreciate. Years ago I read H. W. Beecher's sermons in the Independent, for three years,—then stopped, because of his inconsistencies. Now, I begin reading Mr. Abbot's in THE INDEX, and am conscious of being on firmer ground as well as higher. This morning my soul has been lifted up to one of those everlasting hill-tops or mountain-peaks whence may be seen not only the world and humanity as it is, but as it will be, and I long to be helping in the onward march. Next to the Lecture, perhaps, the ‘voices from the people’ are of the most vital interest to me. Oh! I am glad that such a paper as yours is an actual fact at last, and almost proud that it is published, not in Massachusetts, but among the Gentiles in my native State. May you have more and more to encourage you.”

—“I am glad to see the first number of THE INDEX. Though small in size, it is large in power, and I hope will accomplish all that your most earnest wish desires. Your Fifty Affirmations are quite as satisfactory as could be wished. I do not see but one of them to which I can object and that is the first one. If you mean that all efforts of man to perfect himself come under the head of religion, then religion means a great deal more than I ever thought it did. I wish you every success in your effort. If you care to have the — on your list of exchanges, I will send it you, and if it will be an equivalent for your paper for 1870, let me have it, and if not, I will send you the price. I mean after a little to order three or four copies for some persons who need it.”

—“Enclosed find two dollars, which I understand will pay for your paper one year. I want it from the beginning. I have watched your course with deep interest. It feeds my soul to see an independent man, —one who is free from the fetters of the past and present,—one who can follow a principle to its logical results, and is honest enough to acknowledge it openly. May success attend your efforts.”

—“A paper of the kind has been a want long and keenly felt by numbers of people, and its publication will be hailed with joy. Wishing to make its acquaintance at the earliest possible moment, and not knowing any other way to get it, I apply to its editor.”

—“I have received the first three numbers of your paper and have read the first one, and I am well pleased with it. There is a vigor and freshness about it that is gratifying, and you may count on one subscriber here.”

—“The most of our people here are a worldly sort of folks; who would rather trust their salvation to their hereditary faith as passed down to them by their ancestors, than trouble themselves to examine into the truth of its foundation.”

—“My husband and I both feel very much interested in your position and work. There is a great truth at the heart of your affirmation, and a moral grandeur in your unqualified utterance of that truth. It is with unspeakable satisfaction that I read your lecture in this first number, especially that part of it which defines ‘The higher Faith.’ Your ‘Fifty Affirmations’ deserve, and need, and will repay close study. May you feel strength and receive support to go on with your work. I believe your position is the one that must be taken by all who seek ‘Spiritual Freedom.’ That, and not Protestantism, is the Power that must arise in its might against that monument of the past which still over-awes so many souls—Catholicism. O, that the human world might grow into ‘that sense of spiritual unity with boundless Being’ which is the essence of Religion.”

—“Enclosed please find 25 cents, for which please send me a few copies of THE INDEX, number 3, dated January 15th. I want them to distribute among my friends. I cannot express how much pleasure I experience in reading THE INDEX. I have for many years left the word Religion out of my vocabulary; but I am willing to accept it again in the shape of Free Religion. I cannot embrace any of the Religions claiming to be Christian; they are too narrow. I must have a universal religion.”

—“Will you have the kindness to send me a specimen copy of THE INDEX? I am the pastor of a M. E. Church, but, I trust, am alive to the spirit and demands of the times, and desire to know what is going on in the religious world. In my ministry thus far I have been a constant reader of one or more papers and magazines like what yours will doubtless be, and may perhaps become a reader of your paper. Yours for the truth.”

—“Having seen it stated in several papers that you propose to publish a paper—THE INDEX—for the purpose of discussing religious questions, &c., I wish you to send me the first numbers containing terms, &c. Have read your views, &c., while you were in Dover, N. H. I am a reformer and a believer in progress in ideas. Attend the Unitarian meetings, &c.”

—“Please receive a Post Office order for two dollars, and send me THE INDEX for one year. I bid you ‘God speed,’ and consider it a glorious privilege to have an opportunity of assisting in the honorable warfare you are waging with superstition, prejudice, and irrational ideas with regard to man's mission and destiny.”

—“Enclosed will be found cashier's check on New York for Twenty Dollars for which please send THE INDEX for one year to each of the following named persons. With my best wishes that your paper may prove eminently successful and be productive of great good.”

—“I give below four names of persons I think will subscribe for THE INDEX.

I should particularly like to have them read the ‘Fifty Affirmations’ in the first number, if you can spare the copies.”

Benevolent ladies are requested to send in cast-off clothing, to be repaired and refitted for use by the scholars. Donations of cotton cloth, calico, and other materials, are respectfully solicited from all who feel interested in this object.

Mrs. M. J. Barker has kindly consented to act as Agent for THE INDEX, and will call on our city subscribers in person to receive their subscriptions.

THE STARS.

[From the German of Matthias Claudius.]

Oft, in the hush of midnight deep,
When all my toil is done,
And every eye is closed in sleep,
I watch the stars alone.

Like lambs along the meadows wide,
Their scattered flocks move slow;
Or, crowding pearl-like side by side,
In glittering files they go.

How fair and pure, how numberless,
Those sparkling points of fire!
Long I admire their loveliness,
Nor can enough admire.

Then into this full heart of mine
These words in music steal,—
“There is in life a more divine
Than all its woe and weal.”

Then on my couch I lay me down;
Yet echoes still the song,
And, pondering life's mysterious boon,
Sleepless, I lie and long.

The Index.

FEBRUARY 19, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

LAST week the “Voices from the People” were crowded out of our columns, notwithstanding the extra space afforded by the SUPPLEMENT. They pour in more rapidly than we can find room to print them in; but we give to-day a larger space than usual to this department of THE INDEX.

A certain Dr. Barnard has been taking subscriptions to THE INDEX in Michigan, and receiving the money, without any authority from the INDEX ASSOCIATION. We know nothing of any such person. The public are warned against paying their subscriptions to parties not known to be responsible.

THE “Truth Association” print a little sheet called Truth at Hammonton, N. J. It can be had three months on trial for ten cents, by applying to News Agents or by addressing the Association. Its spirit is earnest, and it aims to do good in practical directions. The following extract indicates its character:—

SHALL WE COME OUT?—Yes, by all means, earnestly and frankly, in favor of every Truth. But if a Church member, stay where you are, if you can conscientiously, and work for Reform; for what we need is not a new religion, but more of the old without its superstition. You can do more for Truth where you are. Never for one moment forget that what is needed to hasten the advent of the “Coming Church,” is a more practical application to every relation of life of that which all Churches profess—“Love to God and Man.” This is just what you wish to have put into practice. Agitate, AGITATE, AGITATE. Insist that your Church shall take active measures against Monopolies, Injustice, Intemperance, and every form of Unrighteousness, and in favor of Universal Education, Co-operative Industry, Rational Recreation, and every practical method of elevating humanity.

We fear the Truth will hardly approve our way of looking at things. But let us all strive to better society, each in his own way.

Love is the soul's homage to spiritual beauty.

THE LEGAL RIGHTS OF INFIDELS.

In another column will be found the recent decision of Judge Sharswood, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, “to the effect that a charitable bequest to an Infidel Society is void.” The decision in this particular case is unquestionably in accordance with law, since the Philadelphia Society was not in existence when the bequest was made, and since no bequest to a non-existent corporation is valid. Judge Sharswood, however, goes out of his way to decide that “even if the Society had been in existence, the bequest would still be invalid,” on the ground that such a Society would be a nuisance, and consequently not entitled to the rights and privileges of Christian Societies.

This latter decision is a mere obiter dictum, and of no binding force, because there was no actual case to adjudicate upon. We suspect, however, that this decision also would be legal, supposing such a case to occur hereafter. Christianity has been ruled to be a “part of the common law” in Pennsylvania; and if this ruling means anything, and is not a dead letter, it must mean what Judge Sharswood declares it to mean. There is no iniquity in the actual case; but there would be iniquity in the hypothetical case. The right of free speech would be suppressed, because Christianity is part of the common law in Pennsylvania. The absurdity and injustice of this procedure are directly traceable to the union of Church and State which is still perpetuated in that commonwealth, notwithstanding the fact that the Constitution of the United States forbids any establishment of religion by Congress, and thus lays broad and deep the foundations of religious liberty and equality. The spirit, at least, of the Constitution, would prohibit the establishment of Christianity by any State. Such an establishment is contrary to the fundamental principles of American freedom and modern civilization.

The real grievance, therefore, in the decree of Judge Sharswood, is not in any actual injustice done, nor even in that which is threatened; but rather in the prior fact that, in Pennsylvania, Christianity is the State Religion. This fact is the permanent defiance of justice, the permanent outrage on the rights of non-Christians. It casts obloquy on all dissenters, makes the public expression of dissent perilous, and creates a spiritual aristocracy of believers,—the most odious of all aristocracies. The State is thus made to affix a stigma to the free activity of the human mind, and to invade the legal rights of those who persist in thinking independently for themselves. There is a pitiable bigotry in Judge Sharswood's intimation that “the free discussion of religion, politics, etc.” (no matter under whose “direction and administration”), would be productive of evil consequences to society. Is it a cause of grievance to other people that a company of peaceable citizens should assemble quietly in a hall of their own for purposes of orderly debate among themselves? So long as other people feel aggrieved at such gatherings, it is plain that respect for spiritual freedom is at a very low ebb in the community. Pennsylvania is away back in the dark ages; and Judge Sharswood does but drag out into the reluctant daylight of the nineteenth century the ugly Cerberus of her mediævalism.

It is fortunate for THE INDEX that Toledo is not in Pennsylvania, but in Ohio.

RELIGIOUS RAIDS ON THE TREASURY.

Francis Lieber, Chairman of the Committee of the Union League for exposing diversions of public moneys to sectarian uses, reports that, in New York city alone, more than $500,000 were thus diverted during the year 1869. His report gives all the items. We give below the aggregate amounts received by the various denominations. It will be seen that the Protestants have accepted these funds as well as the Catholics, the only difference being that, while the latter got whole loaves, the former had to say grace over the crumbs.

Roman Catholic	$412,062 26
Protestant Episcopal	29,335 09
Hebrew	14,404 09
Reformed (Dutch) Church	12,630 86
Presbyterian	8,363 44
Baptist	2,780 34
Methodist Episcopal	3,073 63
German Evangelical	2,027 24
Miscellaneous	44,085 12
New York Magdalen Benevolent Society	5,000 00
Protestant Half Orphan Asylum	3,064 85
Wayside Industrial Home	3,000 00
Free School New York Turnverein	3,800 00
School N. Y. Juvenile Society and Orphan Home
School	4,336 00
An Evangelical Church	300 00
Mission Church, 2d Ave., 125th st. (Congregation'l)	594 27
Dover Street Free School	2,000 00
Union Home and School	10,000 00
	7,000 00
Lying-in Asylum, Marion street	5,000 00
Grand Total	$528,742 47

This is a disgraceful exhibit. No one would object to appropriations for purely charitable objects; but by what right do the civil authorities appropriate the public revenues, raised by taxation of the whole people, to these sectarian objects? It is high time that the community should come to its senses, and demand, in a tone audible even by Democratic politicians, a summary stop to this most dangerous abuse. It is a leak in the dyke which, unless speedily repaired, will enlarge with incredible rapidity, inundate the country with an ocean of corruption, and sweep away the defences of all public liberty. The American people have a right to call upon the New York Legislature to repeal immediately the statute which permits this flagrant violation of American principles.

FEAR AND LOVE.

Rev. Dr. Bellows recently preached in the Boston Theatre. The Daily Advertiser, after giving his text—“The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him,”—briefly reports his sermon, closing with the words:—“There was very little love without fear; and, until one feared God, he could not love him. True love was that in which fear and love were blended together.”

The text was taken from the Old Testament, and expresses its prevailing spirit. The Hebrew Jehovah was, in the popular conception at least, little better than a gigantic man, with human passions and frailties,—jealous, vindictive, cruel, now burning with rage at some insult or neglect, now pacified by repentance and dissuaded by submission from his hasty intentions of revenge. To believe in him was necessarily to fear him; and the Hebrews did both. “Thou shalt fear thy God,” says Moses. “The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom,” says David. “Be thou in the fear of the Lord all day long,” says Solomon. “Hide thee in the dust for fear of the Lord,” says Isaiah. And so on.

In justice to Christianity, it should be pointed out that the prevailing spirit of the New Testament teaches a nobler doctrine. John the apostle says (I Ep. IV, 18):—“There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love.”

We must admit, however, that John is here in advance, not only of Dr. Bellows, but also of Jesus himself as reported in Matt. X, 28:—"And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Theodore Parker used to say that the Devil was the Fourth Person of the Trinity; but, with the character here suggested, it would be as correct to say he is the First.

"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of"—folly.

TOO FLOWERY.

EDITOR INDEX:—

You were kind enough to ask me for an expression of some of my views for the columns of your paper, although you know we differ in some material points. Being too well aware of my inability to vie with you in expressing thoughts, I will nevertheless attempt a few lines, seeing I can do it with the easiest thing in the world, and that is, fault-finding.

I have perused now the first six numbers of THE INDEX with due attention, and find them so well filled with sweet laudatory, spiced with Attic salt, that I think a little pepper will do the treat no harm. To illustrate what I have to say, I will translate as well as I can an introduction from one of Zschokke's most handsome passages:—

"Believe what reason dictates, and the heart counsels. No faith can be prescribed or inoculated. It is different with the axioms of reason, which have only to be pronounced to become approved and accepted by everybody, because the law of reasoning is the same in all men. But it is different with faith. It is not given nor accepted. It is a spiritual flower, sprung from the situation, nourishment, strength, weakness, or wants of the Gemieth. [The English language has no proper word for this most beautiful of German expressions; mind comes nearest to it, but does not give the whole.] Therefore faith is different in all human beings. That of a Kamtschadale would be no more appropriate to me than mine to him. Faith is a blossom of the soul; from the blossom you can tell the tree. Do not destroy the blossom with rude hand, if you dislike it in another, because you will run the risk of rendering the whole tree fruitless. But if you wish to do good, cultivate the stem, give it better soil, more suitable nourishment. Ennoble and improve the soul, and she will improve and ennoble her faith."

Now what I want to say is this; you are trying continually to tinker too much with the flower or the blossom. THE INDEX is filled with religion from beginning to end, and (allow me the pun) it is altogether too flowery! At least for me. I want a little more solid food, and so, I guess, do many others. No matter how clever all these explanations of Free Religion are, to me they are all only descriptions of a golden flat-iron, to use a homely expression. This simile will show you better what I understand by Free Religion, than if I should fall into the same error I complain of, and attempt an explanation. I would rather give you in some of the future numbers,—by translation, if unable to do it by original work,—a sample of what I consider more solid food.

G. M.

[We shall be very glad to receive the translations of our valued friend. Solid food for thinking minds is what we strive to furnish; and if THE INDEX is now too flowery, we hope he will help us to make it more floury.—Ed.]

PRACTICAL RIGHTEOUSNESS.

I remember in my youth attending a Quaker meeting. The congregation sat in perfect stillness for an hour and a half, and then a small old man arose, slowly laid aside his hat, worn until then, and stood up in an obscure part of the house, and said, in a low voice, but clear enough to be heard throughout the quiet assembly,—“I have but a poor opinion of any religion that does not make the individual better.” No other word was spoken. None other seemed needed. This short testimony laid hold of the spirit matter, and stood a witness for the truth.

Now in these later days, as I sit in the congregation, I do not find the spirit of peace as in that quaint old house upon the slope of the hill, where the soul's stillness made opportunity for the shining of the light within, and I think often of that still small voice which said so little and taught so much; and many times do I apply the old man's test to that religion that fails to make its professors manifest in their daily life righteousness or well-doing. Individuals there are, lending ear to gossip that goes far to injure a fellow-being; for them, and for the religion that teaches not better, I wish for more short, potent sermons coming from an obscure corner, that would tell them of how little value was that ceremony, call it by what name they might, which had not the strength to vitalize them into a better life.

To-day a company of women stand in judgment, and in a small circle condemn a sister, and she a wretchedly poor widow, whose constant labor fails to keep her children warm or fed. God and her own sore-tried heart know how prayerfully her fingers have wrought to do her best; and they, knowing not, and willing to censure rather than assist, whisper words that, in their uncharitableness, go far toward the ruin of a soul; so far at least, as to blight a fair name and to torture a broken spirit. Their religion does not teach them to take by the hand those of good report and those of evil report, and to cherish where they find a suffering sister; and thus thy life with them goes on unsweetened with love or charity; thus the hungry are unfed, the naked unclothed, and the cold, trembling hand that asks for one touch of human pity, feels no warmth of sympathetic comfort. Oh! every hour my soul prays for a religion that lives in good works, and makes every man and woman better.

HOPE.

LETTER TO A YOUNG FRIEND.

BY A LADY.

You ask why H— discards the name Christian, while he still holds Christ to be the great teacher of the world." He does not believe Christ to be the teacher of the world any more than Socrates, or Plato, or any other good man. He discards the name Christian just as he would the name Mahometan. He does not believe that Jesus was any more the Savior of the world than Mahomet was. He thinks that the name Christian properly implies a belief in the Messiahship of Jesus, and since he does not at all believe in that, he is in no proper sense a Christian. Jesus is the name of the man, and H— believes him to have been a good and true man; Christ is the name of his office, just as President is the name of Grant's office. Christ means the Anointed One, i. e. the King. Now H— does not believe that Jesus was anointed, in any peculiar sense, to be the Savior of the world, any more than that some one man was chosen to be President of the United States for all time, whose word was to be the law for every one who came after him,—a law which no one was to alter or change. Do I make it plain to you? Jesus was great and good and true and beautiful; but is that any reason why people must always and everywhere believe him to be the one, among all good men, who is to be implicitly obeyed and followed? Washington was great and good too, but would it not be rather absurd for the people of this country to say:—"Washington was raised up in our time of need, and he led us out of our troubles, and made us a free nation; he is our President and we will never have another. He did the best that could be done; no one can ever do better. Whatever he said must be true and right, and henceforth we will do as he says. To show our faith in him to all the world, we will call ourselves Presidentists; that name will show that we believe him to be the one man chosen from all others to be our political teacher and Savior. No matter if he is dead and buried,—he lives in the next world, and can see and know all that is done here now. No matter if the times and the people have changed,—he was the man that was needed then, and if we do not do just as he commanded and call ourselves by his name, we shall all go to destruction. Henceforth and forever he is the only President of the United States, and must be obeyed and imitated as exactly as possible."

Would not every sensible person protest against such absurdity as that? And yet it seems to me very much like that, to insist upon a belief in Christ. No one under such circumstances could be called a Presidentist who did not believe that Washington was the only President we had ever had, or could ever have, and so no one can be called a Christian who does not believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Savior of the world,—the only Christ and Savior that ever lived. This is what I say, not H—; but I think he would agree with it.

MIRACLES.

The question of the adequacy of human testimony to the proof of miracles is one which has been disputed for centuries, and the world is perhaps weary of the dispute. We venture, however, to advance a view of the subject which we believe to be novel and entitled to consideration.

A miracle is literally a wonder or a wonderful thing; but regarding the adequacy of testimony to prove a miracle, in this literal sense of the word, there can be no room for dispute. The difficulty arises only when we use the word as signifying a supernatural event, an event which is a deviation from the laws of nature. This latter is the sense in which the word is commonly used, and, without this element of the supernatural, miracles would be wholly useless for the purposes of those by whom the adequacy of testimony to the proof of them has been principally maintained,—of those who have endeavored by the evidence of miracles to give the seal of divine authority to some alleged revelation or prophecy. An event, however wonderful or unprecedented, if it happen in accordance with natural laws, clearly cannot have this effect. The first sun-pictures were very wonderful, and wholly unprecedented; but as it was believed that they were produced in accordance with natural laws, and were not the result of any special divine interference, no one thought of attributing divinity or inspiration to the first photographers. A miracle is supposed to prove either that the apparent worker of it is himself possessed of divine power, or that such power has been specially exerted in his behalf; and such proof it certainly fails to give, unless it be a deviation from the laws of nature,—unless it be an event which could not have happened without a direct interposition of divine authority.

Having defined what a miracle is, let us next consider the reason of our belief in human testimony,—the ground of our confidence in the evidence upon the strength of which we are called upon to believe in the occurrence of miracles.

It is evident that a necessary element, without which such belief and confidence could not exist, is to be found in the fact that we believe human testimony to be governed by fixed laws,—to be subject, like everything else of which we have any experience, to the unyielding laws of nature. If the laws which have heretofore governed human testimony were to be suddenly changed or violated, it is plain that all our conclusions, drawn from such testimony, would be liable to error, and we may conclude that all that we are entitled to assert concerning the most clear and convincing testimony is, that it is true unless there has been a deviation from such laws, and that the improbability of the falseness of the completest testimony is only the improbability of such a deviation. When, therefore, human testimony is offered in proof of a miracle, which, as before defined, is itself a deviation from the laws of nature, the proof must wholly fail, for it is just as probable that the testimony is false as that the miracle has happened. Whichever alternative we adopt, the disbelief of the testimony, or the belief in the miracle, we alike in either case admit the happening of that improbable thing, a deviation from the laws of nature. And he who, on the faith of human testimony is willing to believe that a miracle has been wrought in the restoration, for instance, of a dead man to life, commits the absurdity of admitting a breach of the laws relating to human life, in order to avoid admitting a no more improbable breach of the laws governing human testimony. The conclusion seems to be inevitable that, if we could have in any case the strongest conceivable human testimony to the occurrence of a miracle, we ought properly and logically in such case to be left in a state of complete doubt and uncertainty whether to decide the testimony true or the miracle false,—the probabilities on either side being equally balanced. All that we can in such case by any possibility determine is that the working of the laws of nature has been in some way interfered with. We may feel the jar of the disordered machinery, but the point to which the supernatural interference has been directed must of necessity be beyond our sight. Whether it has affected the laws governing human testimony by changing for the moment the truthfulness, the sanity, or the perceptions of men, or whether the laws which have been broken in upon are those which relate to the matters in which the alleged miracle has been wrought, those for instance which prevent dead men from being restored to life, must be wholly beyond our power to decide.

It is to be noted, however, that in the preceding argument we have assumed the evidence adduced in support of the alleged miracle to be the most conclusive evidence possible,—such that we were forced to conclude that there had been a deviation from the laws of nature somewhere,—either in regard to the testimony or in regard to the thing testified to. But it is to be remembered that the natural laws which govern human testimony are so complicated and their workings so difficult to understand, that we seldom, if ever, meet with any testimony of such a clear and unequivocal nature that we are entitled to say positively that there must be a breach of the laws of nature if it be not true. All evidence that is now adduced in proof of any miracles is liable to many objections, such as the ignorance of the original witnesses, the remoteness of the time, the imperfection of the channels through which the testimony was reduced to writing and transmitted to us, and the general credulity of men relative to alleged supernatural occurrences,—a credulity which must be admitted to have procured for us many distinct classes of alleged miracles, of which the greater part cannot possibly be true, the miracles of one religion being generally antagonistic to those of another.

Such are the considerations which lead us to the conclusion that human testimony is not adequate to the proof of miracles. We have not attempted to prove that miracles have never occurred, or that it is impossible that they should occur, or that their occurrence may not be proved by other means than through human testimony,—we have only endeavored to show that the attempt to prove their occurrence by the aid of this kind of evidence must necessarily be futile.

REVELATION AND WORSHIP.

BY C. D. B. MILLS.

The Liberal Christian in its last issue (Feb. 5th) animadverted severely upon the discourse lately given by Mr. Frothingham, in Boston. Doubt and denial, it thinks, are fast reaching their utmost limits with those who follow after Radical Religion. Taking the newspaper reports of the character of the discourse as trustworthy, the editor makes bold to "defy any one to show wherein its teachings are superior to or otherwise than the refined pagan philosophy of the Athenians, etc." (a very grave offense, surely, if only true); "We turn from Mr. Frothingham's philosophy as from darkness and death. To us it is cheerlessness and despair."

Mr. F.'s subject was "the Revealed and Hidden God." It is a very subtle theme, difficult beyond all comparison to handle, and he may possibly not have expressed himself here with full clearness and fine precision,—may not have dealt sufficiently in the affirmative, leaving his hearers at the end mainly in the negative. Of this we know not, having only the newspaper reports, partial and perhaps not accurate.

But in what we presume to have been the main doctrine of the discourse, Mr. Frothingham was, we doubt not, altogether right. He aims, we judge, to overthrow the narrow, mechanical conceptions men so much indulge in, regarding the Deity. God, they deem, is very much like themselves, a being of limitations, of form, person, place. We do not ordinarily see him, because we do not stand near enough to catch his shape and presence. Now and then he has manifested himself, and the record is preserved of his visits, very precious to the world. In Jesus Christ he was revealed, and his will and purposes came fresh and direct to mankind in that person. Some day we shall come nearer ourselves, and on certain great conditions shall be permitted to behold and enjoy him personally forever.

Upon this gross anthropomorphic conception has grown up the entire structure of belief in special revelations, in sacrifices, prayers and special religious exercises of every name and nature. It underlies all the systems of positive enjoined religion the world over. Certainly it has brought blight enough upon the soul of man, not to deserve to be perpetuated, not to deserve to be exempt from exposure and renunciation everywhere.

The Infinite reveals himself not as form or person, not as participating in history, as we know history or may conceive it participated in by any of our fellows. He is the unspoken voice, the formless form, the unseen reality. He has never been revealed to any eye or ear, so that sense should apprehend him. He transcends all, and is other than all. Conception is impotent to grasp him. He speaks to us in Law, in those supreme types and truths which are the radiance, the symbolism of the everlasting. Their utterance is his scripture, the sentences of these his book. In worship of the great verities and virtues are found the presence and peace of God. Here we approach him, commune with him, behold his face. Under other character we are not to expect to see, know or apprehend him. Life is a journey, fitly a perpetual approximation to the infinite goal, reaching nearer to truth and substance, leaving seen for unseen, time for the eternal, form and person for spiritual and impersonal, the reality of all. Parmenides made a near approach when he called it being, the substantial element, the living fact, that inheres in the world, that at once dwells and soars, bearing and beckoning us on ever to inmost and highest.

Here are we to build our altars, pay our devotions, and quaff to the full satisfaction for our souls. In the great affirmations which the spirit sees as it transcends the sphere of form and person, and dwells in substance, it finds rest and strength. Here is shrine for constant worship, a presence to commune with greater and more sufficing than person, a warmth of affection deeper and more refreshing than love. Upon these grounds men may have a religion that shall be enlarging, quickening, full of life and power.

To stop short of this is to pause in a carnal conception, which will prove a disappointment and a mockery, and carry down quickly to the grossness of idolatry. The Liberal Christian, like its fellow sectarists, must have its visible God and Christ, and rest in the historic revelations. It doubtless says truly, when, referring to Mr. Frothingham's doctrine, it declares—"There is no orthodox view with which we are acquainted, which is not richer and more satisfactory to us than this." Any idolatry, however gross and revolting, is more acceptable to a worshipper of the outer, than a vigorous appeal to come up higher and rest in the supersensuous. Each shall find his own.

We have a phase here of the battle that is going on, and get a glimpse of the great transformation that is surely taking place. The old God and Christ men have supposed themselves to know and rest in, are to be lost, to fade from the mind. Lost, but God shall be found again and more, in those ethereal conceptions, the living ideas which are his revelation, full of pervasive presence and power. Christ shall die, but shall rise again. The Jesus men have worshipped, now departed, shall be more than made good in that Jesus of hint and intimation, that apparition for the hour, which receiving as hint, subordinating thoroughly, they shall in a true sobriety of love and welcome appropriate. By eternity we read time, in the light of God we apprehend the world. And by resting in the invisible and everlasting, men shall first know the meaning of form, shall interpret symbol, finding therein a wealth and worth, a transcendent undying significance they had never known or dreamt before.

SUPERNALISM.

"Omne ignotum pro magifico."

Having now, for about half a century, been more or less familiar with what are called Mystical Phenomena, I propose, in as brief a space as possible, to give you the result of my observations. And, first, let me explain my use of terms:—

1. Naturalism. By this term is to be understood that there is in Nature and the constitution of things one self-controlling Force, the motions of which are sufficient for producing all the physical and mental phenomena which come within the range of human observation. Man is not a failure. In the constitution of this world there is no mistake; it is a perfect world, governed by perfect laws. And there inheres in manhood all the elementary forces necessary for securing its own highest good. Hence what humanity most needs is a knowledge of Nature's laws and self-culture.

2. Supernaturalism. Alleged supra-mundane "revelations," interfering with the affairs of this world.

3. The "Mystic Rap"—the representative type of all forms of Supernaturalism, and its alleged phenomena. Physical phenomena, for which science can assign no adequate cause, are mystical. And, we use this term, therefore, because the modern form of Supernaturalism commenced by rapping; and for some years it was known by no other name.

4. Mediumism. By this term is meant all those human movements which are based upon faillite in the Mystic Rap. And, that this distinction is required by the subject, will appear, if we consider, that this rap is sporadic, while mediumism is epidemic. The latter, therefore, is a human movement, while the former is produced by forms of force which interrupt the laws that appertain to this world.

While Supernaturalism may have had various phases in the effects it has produced in the minds of men, yet we shall find that in its fundamental characteristics, whether ancient or modern, it is one and the same thing to humanity. Thus—

1. It comes to us from the invisible, the unknown and unknowable. The presumption is reasonable that whatever Intelligences there may be outside of this world, they belong to the world they inhabit, and not to this world, by whose laws they cannot be controlled.

2. Revelations from an invisibility can have no authority in matters of faith or duty, because they cannot be duly authenticated. Intelligence and force may appear in the Mystic Rap, but this demonstrates nothing in respect to personal identity, absolutely nothing. Here is "Moses" who assumes to be a "Medium" between me and the Jewish idea of God. And Moses says, this God speaks to me through him. Now, how can I know who the personage is, or whether there be any personage who speaks through Moses? How am I to know whether it be a man or a woman? No "revelation" alleged to be made from another world is susceptible of authentication. And—

3. All forms of Supernaturalism, from first to last, are based upon the false assumption of a failure in humanity, some defect in the constitution of this world. It assumes that there is some defect in the constitution of the human mind which renders Supernaturalism necessary.

FOLLOWING JESUS.

To F. E. ABBOT:

My Dear Brother,—Your remarks, appended to my letter published in THE INDEX, invite a reply. It would have been given sooner, if I had not been prevented by illness.

I desire to write now, as briefly as possible, about the Messiahship and a standard of action. You think Jesus claimed that he was the Hebrew Messiah. You appear to find that supposed claim the chief reason why you "stand squarely outside of Christianity." I have found a very satisfactory solution of this question—"Was Jesus the Messiah?" In reading, one day, what Jesus said concerning John the Baptist, I found the rational explanation of the Messiahship Jesus believed he possessed. In Matthew, XI, 14, you read these words:—"And if ye will receive it, this is Elias which was for to come." Now Jesus did not think that Elias the prophet had come from the underworld and lived again in John the Baptist. He meant only that John filled the place of the prophet. So did he (Jesus) fill the place of the Messiah. At first, probably, he thought of reigning as David. His kingdom was to be of this world. The banners of Rome should fly from Judea, and the standard of the "Lord's anointed" should wave over the chosen people. But that expectation passed. He saw a greater Messiahship than ever the prophets dreamed of. He would deliver his people from their sins. He would anoint their eyes that they might see God. He would be the anointed—the Messiah—indeed. And ever since that thought burst upon me, my brother, I have had no difficulty in believing in Jesus' Messiahship.

I do not trouble myself, therefore, about what Matthew thought or said. It does not perplex me to read what the writer of John's Gospel has written. The reporters who write down the words of Kossuth do not understand the patriot. The printers who put in type the verses of Mrs. Browning do not take in her meaning. The Evangelists are only honest, credulous reporters to me. The teacher is above them all.

I believe, my brother, in the need of a standard. Of course, I do not put the authority of Jesus above that of my own conscience and reason; when I have humbly sought enlightenment from God and all his great sons and daughters. But I do this. I sit down in my serene, holiest moments—in those which by their peace and aspiration and joy I believe to be my best—and then I meditate on all I have learned of the world, of man's needs and Jesus' life and words. In such moments, my reason and my conscience accept him as the Great Teacher and the Great Example, and I will let no lower mood take him away as the standard of my life.

In the declaration of belief which I have drawn up for my society, these words appear,—“accepting Jesus of Nazareth, who taught the absolute religion of love to God and Man, as the world's greatest teacher and example, and desiring to imitate his life and study his words, etc.” Now, by imitation of his life, I do not mean the copying of any particular habit or deed. I do not ask my people to wear sandals or attempt to heal with clay a blind man's eyes. I do ask them to love God and Man—to study the Beatitudes and the Parables. For my own part, my brother, that life lived in Judea, those words uttered on mountain and sea-shore, help me much. Such words as these, “For the Son of Man came, not to be ministered unto, but to minister unto others,” “If ye love them which love ye, what reward have ye—do not even the publicans the same?” come into my mind with power to lift me to greater service and deeper love.

I would like to write much more, but I remember that your paper is small. I cannot accept your definition of religion. I mourn that you and others whom I love should feel it necessary to leave the Christian Church. I believe that I can show you how rational and how precious is my following of Jesus, while I worship one God and Father.

Cordially yours,

HENRY BLANCHARD.

MRS. LINCOLN AND MR. STANTON.

[From the Army and Navy Journal.]

An anecdote from Mr. Stanton's own lips, last Summer, told in kind defence of Mrs. Lincoln, shows the instantaneous right action of his mind when he first became Secretary. We use his own language:—"The second day after I took office, one of those indescribable half-loafers, half-gentlemen, came into my office, and handed me a card from Mrs. Lincoln asking that the man be made a commissary. I said, 'There is no place for you, and if there were, the fact that you bring me such a card would prevent my giving it to you; and I tore the card up. The next day he came with a kind of small triumph in his eye, and handed me a formal letter from Mrs. Lincoln, making the same request. I said, 'I told you yesterday there was no place for you—there will never be while I am Secretary.' I tore up the letter, saying, 'I will see Mrs. Lincoln.'

"During the day I called upon her and said, 'I thought it only proper to call upon you, madam, regarding a card and letter I have received from you.' She said, 'Yes, Mr. Secretary, I thought that as wife of the President I was entitled to ask for so small a favor.' I said, 'Madam, we are in the midst of a great war for national existence. Our success depends upon the people. My first duty is to the people of the United States; my next duty is to protect your husband's honor, and your own. If I should make such appointments, I should strike at the very root of all confidence of the people in the Government, in your husband, and you and me.' She said at once, 'Mr. Stanton, you are right, and I will never ask you for anything again,' and she never did."

THE ANTI-SLAVERY AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

EDITOR COMMONWEALTH:—The following is a copy of the resolution passed by the American Anti-Slavery Society, at its 30th anniversary, or "Third-Decade meeting," held in Philadelphia, Dec. 3 and 4, 1863. It was passed on Friday, Dec. 4th, and was originally written on board the steamer "Empire State," on the Sound, by Charles Sumner:—

"Resolved, That the voice of the people is heard through petitions to Congress; and this convention earnestly recommend that the voice be raised in petitions for an amendment of the Constitution declaring that slavery be forever prohibited within the limits of the United States."

I have the original copy in Mr. Sumner's handwriting. It was written Dec. 2, 1863, as we were going up the Sound, he on his way to Congress, and I on my way to the Anti-Slavery Convention. The resolution was passed without a dissenting voice. A committee was appointed to prepare a memorial. In a few weeks petitions numerously signed, were forwarded to Mr. Sumner, of the Senate, and also to the House. In a few weeks more, I believe during December, 1865, a bill to amend the Constitution, declaring that slavery be "forever prohibited within the limits of the United States," was introduced. The wording of the resolution was the wording of the bill. I think it passed the Senate during January, 1864, and sent to the States, and in a few months was ratified by three-fourths of the States, and became part of the organic law of the republic.

This is in brief the history of that great event of the nineteenth century which forever excludes slavery from the republic so far as law can do it. It was the death-knell of slavery on this continent, and it is to be hoped throughout the civilized world.

I shall deposit this slip of paper with that resolution on it, in the handwriting of Charles Sumner, in Boston or Cambridge Library, for the use of the future historian of African slavery on this continent. William Lloyd Garrison was the President of the convention that adopted it.

HENRY C. WRIGHT.

Gloucester, Jan. 26, 1870.

Baron Rothschild is understood to have been rather eagerly pressing his claims recently for an English peerage. He has much money and bonds, and Mr. Gladstone was disposed to indulge his vanity by raising him to the House of Lords. But the Lords still object to the presence of a Jew among them. They will have to give up that antiquated prejudice some day, but meanwhile it has sufficed to disappoint the hopes of Baron Rothschild. He must content himself with the "solid pudding," in exchange for which many Peers would willingly give up their empty titles.—Westerly Banner.

A man once went to an eccentric lawyer to be qualified for some petty office. The lawyer said to him,—“Hold up your hand; I’ll swear you, but all creation couldn’t qualify you.”—Seaside Oracle.

We continue this week the publication of extracts from the Annual Report of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association for 1868. The extracts given last week explained the objects of the Association. In this issue we take that portion of the Report which sets forth the INSTRUMENTALITIES.

We have a purpose in doing this at this time, aside from circulating the information. The Executive Committee are very desirous to attempt something more than has yet been done in the direction of the instrumentalities here indicated. And it is well, therefore, to call public attention to the possibilities in respect to methods and agencies.

After speaking of public meetings as an instrumentality, the Report continues thus:—

"But the public meeting, as a means of reaching public opinion, especially in large cities, is becoming of less and less importance as the modern agency of the printing-press develops its gigantic power. And it would be strange if an organization so modern in its conception and so progressive in its aims as the Free Religious Association, should not avail itself of this peculiar instrumentality of the nineteenth century. On adopting this instrumentality, the question, it is true, would immediately arise, 'What shall the Association print? Shall it publish, without any attempt at discrimination or selection, a conglomerate of all the religious opinions and speculations that might be found both in and out of Christendom?' The theoretical answer to this question is ready at hand, being given in the principles, just discussed, on which the Association is organized. The Association may legitimately print anything that comes within the aim and scope of those fundamental principles,—that seeks to promote the interests of pure religion, unadulterated with any sectarian or dogmatic purpose; that applies rational and scholarly methods to religious problems; and that endeavors to effect a religious fellowship, combined with the largest individual liberty, on the ground of common aspirations after truth and righteousness rather than of common theological opinions. Though the Association has no system of truth to promulgate as a finality, no fixed set of opinions to propagate, yet there are truths which it may publish, inquiries and meditations of deeply thoughtful and religious men which it may give to the world, results of scholarly investigation which it may be the medium of presenting to the people. The test in this matter of publication which the constitution establishes, is, in fine, not that a writing should harmonize with a certain standard of opinion, but that it should proceed from a reverent religious purpose,—a religious and not a sectarian purpose,—and that it should show ability and fairness of treatment. And it should not be impossible to find persons so thoroughly imbued with the spirit of these principles on which the Association is based, as to be able practically to answer the question, 'What to print?' whenever it arises, without violating that spirit; to solve it so as to preserve the large liberty and free opportunity which the Association offers, and at the same time to protect it both from obsolete dogmatic speculations on the one hand, and crude, ill-digested speculations on the other.

But aside from questions of theological belief, on which there is most dispute, and would be, therefore, the most difficulty in the adjustment of practical methods, there is much other matter which this Association might appropriately publish. The subject which is to be discussed in our Convention to-morrow evening—"The Relations of Religion to Philanthropy and Social Reform"—is a subject which needs in its various aspects to be presented directly to the people through the agency of the printing press. And there is another vast field of thought and labor, as yet but little explored,—connected with that of philanthropy and social reform, yet hardly lying within it, contiguous also to the field occupied by the Social Science Association, yet involving more directly and individually than that the obligations and sanctities of religion,—concerning which this Association might properly endeavor both to get light and to give light. The field referred to is that of home and social life. What can be done to lift our homes off of the plane of mere material provision and physical drudgery, where so many of them now are, and to infuse into them a stronger element of intellectual and moral purpose? What can be done to elevate society above its present intellectual and moral barrenness, and make it fruitful in stimulus to mental effort and to higher achievements in character and life? The question may be extended to ask, What can be done to consecrate material enterprise and to purify trade, so that they shall be made to subserve the intellectual and spiritual destiny of man? If any one can say anything to help solve these questions, the Free Religious Association can do no fitter work than to scatter the answer broadcast, so that it may go into every home and every shop and counting-room in America. The Association might properly ask for careful reports on these subjects from persons competent to the task, the reports to be made a part of its public meetings, and afterwards printed. And it might, also, publicly solicit essays bearing on the solution of these questions.—prize essays, if funds for the purpose should be put into its hands.

The suggestion that the devising of methods for elevating the tone of home and social life is one of the legitimate works of this Association, gives hint of another of its possible practical agencies, which, for want of a better title, may here be called the social instrumentality. In every community and neighborhood where there are persons, few or many, who are interested in the principles and objects of this association, let such persons be encouraged to come together, in their parlors or in a hall, for free conference and consultation on all questions involved in these principles and objects. Especially could such groups do good service in forwarding the aim last mentioned,—that of improving the condition of domestic and social life. And these groups would naturally seek to put themselves into communication with the Executive Committee of this Association, as a central bureau for both collecting and imparting information. The Association might furnish them, so far as they should wish, with its published reports and essays, and they in turn would furnish it with the results of their own efforts and experience, which would become a valuable element in the preparation of other reports and documents. And so in the freest way, with the least possible machinery, and yet in perfect accord with scientific methods, these scattered social groups would become active centres of influence in sustaining and carrying forward the work of the Association.

Such is a summary of the agencies through which the Free Religious Association may appropriately attempt to accomplish its objects. Others may be developed in the progress of time, for its methods must be left as free as are its principles. But these—the public meeting, the printing-press, and the social instrumentality as above defined—seem to be in accord with present demands, and to grow naturally out of the principles on which the Association is based. It is not proposed to set up or to use any ecclesiastical machinery; for it is not the object of the Association to build up a new sect, nor will it compromise itself with any existing sect.

And as a special argument in favor of the immediate and zealous adoption of these measures for practical work, in addition to what has been said above on general principles—an argument which it would seem should have weight with all religious people of whatever name,—let it here be stated that there are vast numbers of people who will listen to moral and religious appeals coming from this free Association, but whose ears are closed against all appeals that come with the stamp of any specific religious name, whether "Christian" or other. Justly or unjustly, they have decided so firmly against the claims of the "Christian" system of religion, that there is no breaking through that decision. Their reason and self-respect have been so offended by common methods and assumptions of the Christian Church, that they are suspicious of every approach that is made under the countersign of that name, and throw themselves at once into an attitude of resistance. Now must not every person who sincerely desires the moral and spiritual good of his fellows, admit, that for this class of people, at least, the claims of the name, even though capable of proof, may be held in abeyance, while an attempt is made to reach and develop in some way the natural spiritual instincts and aspirations? Many of these people are longing, not to say suffering, for the gospel of free truth and light and love. Many of them, through no help outside of their own souls, have found that gospel; and though no church owns them, and the popular creeds brand them as heretic and infidel, they feel themselves owned of God, and are full of trust and peace. But many are wandering, groping in the dark, feeling themselves alone; needing moral and intellectual help, and still more, needing brotherly sympathy and encouragement; while their energies, for the want of being directed to some high moral purpose, are likely to run to waste and corruption in material and sordid pursuits. American society is suffering from this cause more than the religious community seems to be conscious of,—from this secret, deep-seated scepticism in respect to the instituted beliefs and forms of religion, and want of a fixed and earnest religious faith in the place of that which has gone. And some other appliances appear to be needed to reach the disease than those in use among the established sects,—appliances as free and elastic and progressive as is American society itself. The Free Religious Association, with its principles and objects, so large and spontaneous and democratic, should be able to do something to supply this need. Its foremost and constant aim should be to help develop a religion in America commensurate with America's boundless political and material opportunities,—a religion that should thoroughly penetrate and mould all civil institutions, consecrate and spiritualize material enterprise and wealth, and produce a faith in ideas, and a fidelity to moral conviction, and a practical love and charity, which, manifested in the daily life and character of millions of human beings, should outvie in grandeur the majesty and power of the continent itself.

An English clergyman went to a hotel to order a dinner for a number of clerical friends. "May I ask, sir," demanded the waiter, gravely, "whether the party is High Church or Low Church?" "Now, what on earth," cried the clergyman, "do my friends' opinions matter to you?" "A great deal, sir," rejoined the waiter; "if High Church, I must provide more wine; if Low Church, more wittles."

A picture in a Holland church, "The Sacrifice of Isaac," represents Abraham on the point of accomplishing the solemn act of infanticide with a musket. The anachronism was equalled in this country some years ago by a popular magazine. In a picture representing the giving of the law to Moses, a neat post and rail fence was shown running along the base of Mount Sinai.—Toledo Blade.

LETTER FROM J. STUART MILL.

The following letter from J. Stuart Mill was read before the Washington Convention:—

AVIGNON, December 11, 1869.
DEAR MADAM:—I should have reason to be ashamed of myself, if your name were unknown to me. I am not likely to forget one who stood in the front rank of the Woman's Rights movement in its small beginnings, and helped it forward so vigorously in its early and most difficult stage. You and Mrs. Mott have well deserved to live to see the cause in its present prosperity, and may now fairly hope to see a commencement of victory in some of the States at least. I have received many kind and cordial invitations to visit the United States, and were I able, the great convention to which you invite me would be a strong inducement to do so next year. My dislike to a sea voyage would not itself prevent me, if there were not a greater obstacle—want of time. I have many things to do yet, before I die, and some months (it is not worth while going to America for less) is a great deal to give at my time of life, especially as it would not, like ordinary travelling, be of mental rest, but something very different. I regret my inability the less as the friends of the cause in America are quite able to dispense with direct personal co-operation from England. The really important co-operation is the encouragement we give one another by the success of each in their own country. For Great Britain this success is much greater than appears on the surface, for our own people, as you know, shrink much more timidly than Americans from attracting public notice to themselves; and the era of great public meetings on this subject has not arrived in our country, though it may be near at hand. I need hardly say how much I am gratified at the mode in which my name was mentioned in the National Convention at Newport, and still more at the tribute to the memory of my dear wife, who from early youth was devoted to this cause, and had done invaluable service to it as the inspirer and instructor of others, even before writing the essay so deservedly eulogized in your resolutions. To her I owe the far greater part of whatever I have myself been able to do for the cause, for though from my boyhood I was a convinced adherent of it on the ground of justice, it was she who taught me to understand the less obvious bearings of the subject, and its close connection with all the great moral and social interests of the cause. I am, my dear Madam, very sincerely yours,
J. S. MILL.

THE LAST VERBAL INNOVATION.—Some wag thus touches off Senator Sumner's word, "Ridiculousity."— Slowly rolled forth the novel sound—
"Ridiculousity,"
From out the classic mouth of great
"Preponderosity;"
And through the Senatorial hall
With great velocity
Echoed from mouth to mouth the word—
"Ridiculousity!"
Sure Worcester never dared to write
"Ridiculousity;"
Nor Webster, either, murmured they,
With grim ferocity.
Is there of terms gigantic then
So great a paucity,
That we must coin this fearful one—
"Ridiculousity?"
—Boston Commonwealth.

At a ball given in honor of Prince Arthur in Washington, he requested Miss Sherman, the daughter of Gen. Sherman, to dance with him, being the only lady who was thus honored throughout the evening. The young lady, instead of setting aside previous engagements, and promptly and joyously accepting the attention, as court etiquette permitted to the royal guest, smilingly referred to her card, and informed the Prince that she was engaged for the set for which he asked her company. This she did in the most frank and courteous manner, and she was complimented on all hands for her republican courage, and declared to be the bravest girl of the period.—Toledo Blade.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.—There is a taint in his blood—he springs from a bad stock—he has no sympathy with free institutions, no love for the people. All his leanings are dynastic, and, by professing faith in Destiny, he has provided himself beforehand with an excuse for any crimes he may commit. He will always think it sufficient to attribute them to the overruling influence of his star. Against such a man the citizens of a free country cannot be too much on their guard.—J. A. St. John's "Life of Louis Napoleon."

A negro was caught in a gentleman's garden at Roanoke, N. C., the other night, in close proximity to a lot of fine cabbages. When interrogated as to what he was doing,—"Good Lord! dis nigger can't go nowhar to pray, without bein' troubled!" The next day it was discovered that he had prayed some half dozen heads of cabbage off their stalks.—Investigator.

The "INVESTIGATOR" is devoted to the Liberal cause in Religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of thirty-eight years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

FRIENDSHIP.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Oct. 24, 1869.]

"The laws of friendship are austere and eternal, of one web with the laws of nature and of morals.

There must be very two, before there can be very one. Let it be an alliance of two large, formidable natures, mutually beheld, mutually feared, before yet they recognize the deep identity which beneath these disparities unites them."

Emerson, Essay VI (First Series).

"Friendship both makes prosperity refulgent, and adversity, by dividing and sharing it, more endurable. . . . They seem to blot out the sun from the universe who blot out friendship from human life,—than which we have from the immortal gods nothing better, nothing more delightful."

Cicero, Laelius, VI, 22: XIII, 47.

The ancient Greek philosopher, Empedocles, observing that the forces of attraction and repulsion seem to pervade the universe, conjectured that all attraction might be, at bottom, friendship, and all repulsion enmity. Similar is the lofty guess of the great American seer, that the law of gravitation is one with the law of love. Thoughts like these are indeed fanciful, and conduct to cloudland; yet, however akin to the early tendency of mankind to personify the mysterious forces of Nature and to conceive them after human analogies, they nevertheless spring out of a deep yearning to find some middle term between Nature and Man,—a deep consciousness that, despite the world-wide chasm between the invisible life of Man and the visible life of Nature, there is somewhat in common betwixt the two, which bridges the chasm and makes them one. Certain it is, that he who loves is most perfectly at home in the universe. The undercurrents of creation set all in that direction. The harmonies of Nature are all pitched to that key. Hence the loving soul is at peace with itself and with all that is,—enters into the heart of that absolute beatitude which ever abides in the depths of Being, and which overflows outwardly in the perennial beauty of earth and sky. Nature is, at the core, everlasting repose; the storms and tornadoes which ruffle the surface of the vast ocean of existence, and which threaten at times to convert the cosmos into chaos, never penetrate to the abysses of eternal calm. If through the bewilderments of endless change, the intricacies of unceasing motion, the appearance and disappearance of new forms and combinations, Nature still remains forever one in virtue of all-pervading law, then amidst the transient there everlastingly exists the Permanent; and the Permanent is peace.

There is, therefore, a peace in Nature,—is there not also a peace in Man? Show me a man whose life is rooted in love,—who has discovered the great secret that the outpouring of self is the inpouring of God,—and I will show you a profoundly peaceful man. This is the soul that has no fear,—that dwells in the boundless universe as by his own fireside,—that bears within himself an unfailing fountain of gladness and content, and becomes an oasis of salvation to every thirsty, perishing wanderer of the desert. The peace of the soul is love,—am I weakly superstitious in surmising that the peace of Nature is also love? Is there no profound oneness between Man and Nature,—no deep root of unity beneath their evident disparities,—no universal life that throbs equally in the ebbs and flowings of cosmical phenomena and the measured systole and diastole of the human heart? Be it as it may, to me, at least, love appears the glowing centre of the universe. Infinite in essence as in manifestation, incomprehensible in the multiplicity of its metamorphoses, even seemingly self-contradictory in the eye of bewildered man, I believe that Love is the origin of all that is, and that he who loves most deeply is he who enters most intimately into communion with the Universal Life.

To a mountain-peak lost in the clouds of heaven do I thus trace upwards the stream of human affection. It gushes from no ignoble spring. That which is loftiest and divinest in man is the fountain-head of friendship. No two souls were ever yet mated for all time on any low plane of thought or feeling. What concerns me first of all in my friend is the quantity of his humanness,—the cubic contents of his human nature; for the highest in you or me is not our individual idiosyncrasy, our private peculiarity, but rather that which we hold in common with all mankind. I shall see in my friend the common, elementary constituents of character, which are possessed in varying proportions and degrees by all; but I want to see them in generous quantity, in mass. Every man has something quite his own, traits or features which distinguish him from all others; but it is not these that give him his substantial value. The highest attribute of a man is manhood,—that is, excellence in the virtues which are common to the race, and spring up, like grass, the wide world over. Public as the daylight, universal as the air which fills our lungs, is that which in any man lies at the basis of character; and he is the truly great man who develops this universal human nature in himself, repressing the merely egotistic or egotistic. Not that he despises his own individuality,—far from it; but his greatness consists in the fact that it is his individual peculiarity to be a man on a large scale, to possess a maximum share of what all possess in some degree. The proportions vary, the elements are constant.

Now since friendship is the highest possible relation between man and man, and since no one can bring to this relation more than he actually is, is it not clear that a small man can never be a great friend? Each friend bestows himself upon the other; but he cannot bestow more than he has. If he ventures to overdraw his deposit in the bank of character, sooner or later his paper will come back protested. This is the reason why so few intimacies ripen into friendships. Magnificent promises need magnificent fulfilment; it requires a magnificent nature to love magnificently. How can a shallow soul escape humiliating self-exposure, when its professions have outrun its capacity of performance? It feels itself uneasy on the sunny heights of friendship, and retreats precipitately, but with a secret anger at being detected, to the shady plains of gregariousness. Think twice,—measure your own depth with care,—before you assume a relationship you may be unable to sustain. So intense a reverence do I cherish for the high sanctities of friendship, that I would rather dwell friendless in the world than fail to discharge nobly and abundantly its great obligations. If I am a dwarf, let me not ally myself to the giant. If I am a man who can complacently indulge myself in an act of meanness, or condescend to a trick, or in any case conduct myself in any spirit but that of the most absolute justice and the most high-toned honor, then let me fear to encounter the penetrating eye of an integrity loftier than mine,—let me shun the shame of unveiling myself before one whose grave glance is a silent rebuke to my quailing spirit. He who aims at aught less than the highest, condemns himself, by the inexorable law of affinity, to associates who aim no higher. Friendship,—the blending of noble souls,—is reserved for those who scorn ignoble thoughts as worse than death.

Here, then, we find the foundations of all high companionship, in those humble virtues that belong to universal man, yet shine sublimely in the few alone. Love of truth and goodness,—there is no friendship without this. In every alliance worthy of that great title, the bond that knits together is of asbestos, indestructible by fire,—hard as adamant to the tooth of time; perishable is not united to perishable, but the God in one embraces the God in the other. "In thee," said the dying Bunsen to his wife, as she bent to smoothe his pillow, "in thee have I loved the Eternal!" [In dir liebte ich das Ewige!] Yes, the Eternal,—for that which calls out all high and pure affection is the divine element, the God in man. There is, therefore, nothing arbitrary or accidental in the coming together of friends. "We talk of choosing our friends," says Emerson, "but friends are self-elected." A certain inevitableness underlies the formation of every deep friendship. A thousand intimacies, based on conscious selection, perish and come to naught; but when the friend appears, all contrivance is superfluous, the banns are proclaimed by fate, and no escape is possible. No soul ever loved truly, that could have helped loving. "Deep calleth unto deep"—the voice evokes the echo, whenever Nature arranges the conditions, as inevitably as cause produces effect. Caprice or whim has no influence in a friendship which unites the eternal, the divine element, in kindred souls. Laws as fixed as those which assign the orbits of the heavenly bodies preside over the motions of human hearts. Conditions as rigid as those which determine the formation of crystals, determine the crystallization of affection into permanent union. Let me indicate some of these, not with any design of treating them exhaustively, but merely with a wish to throw some light on what concerns us all.

No friendship can exist which is not based on a mutual recognition of equality. Love ennobles; and those who are kindled by its great inspirations meet as peers. No disparity of age or condition or education or reputation,—in short, no inequality of mere circumstance,—need be fatal to friendship, however unfavorable to its formation. But in all intercourse of friends, these things dwindle to what they really are,—accidents, and nothing more; they must be forgotten, put out of mind, despised, in presence of the great fact of love. Thus friendship appears as a stern leveller of all worldly distinctions, an abolitionist of all that which petty souls most highly prize. Cicero, (Laelius, XIX, 69) notes this law of equality as of prime consequence. "The chief thing in friendship," he writes, "is, that the superior shall be equal to the inferior" [maximum est in amicitia superiorem parem esse inferiori]. If friendship did not set human worth above all else, and, like death, equalize high and low, rich and poor, learned and ignorant,—if it failed to pour contempt on all conceits of human pride out of reverence for the eternal verities of the soul,—then would it cease to be the divinest educator and uplifter of humanity, and sink into a mere refinement of polite patronage. The mountains have ever been the abode of freedom; and, on the mountain-heights of friendship, all freemen stand erect as equals and brothers. Nor is this equality an arbitrary requirement, but rather based on the very nature of things; for, as the great Roman well observes, "In proportion as each is filled with the spirit of self-reliance, and so highly fortified by wisdom and virtue as to stand in need of no one, and to be in all respects self-centred, in the same proportion does he excel in the power of making and retaining friendships" (Lael. IX, 30). Or, as Emerson more tersely expresses the same thought, "The condition which high friendship demands is ability to do without it" (Friendship, p. 164). Only he who lives a life grounded in itself can enter the august alliance of friendship, or sign its treaty as an independent power.

Another prime condition is sincerity, direct and frank and fearless dealing of friend with friend. If there be no confidence sufficient to warrant the waiving of all disguises, then communion of a high character becomes impossible. Bias, one of the seven wise men of Greece, is reported to have said—"One should so love as if he should at some time hate,"—a saying detestable for its distrust of human nature. Where fear exists (and all suspicion is fear), love is impossible. The moment two friends begin to feel that a particular subject must be avoided in their conversation, constraint straightway ensues, and separation is at hand. None but the frank and brave spirit can be a friend. So delicate is the relationship, that the breath of distrust blights it at once. How fatal, then, would be dissimulation! Love cannot survive a lie: its very life is truth, and to violate this is to deal it a stab in the dark. To utter and to live reality, to burst the bonds of conventional hypocrisies and move in unrestricted freedom, to abide the test of knowledge of each other in the conviction that better knowledge shall lead to larger love,—thus, and thus alone, shall they deal with each other who have been baptized in the sacrament of friendship.

Another condition is mutual respect. Here is the indispensable grounding, the corner-stone of the temple. Without the cohesive force of moral unity and esteem, how frail a thing is human affection! Moral order and beauty, congruity with noble standards of feeling and action, is the demand that must be met before friendship can exist. There are doubtless leagues, offensive and defensive, formed among men whose ends are evil, and who mock at the restraints of conscience as idle superstition; but they are feeble as ropes of sand. Somebody is sure to turn state's-evidence; or some new conflicting interest dissolves a compact based on interest alone; or jealousy does its disintegrating work, and good will expires in hate. Better respect without friendship, than friendship without respect. We can dispense with the one, but the other is indispensable. Unless my friend and I build our union on the solid granite of the moral law, making that our foundation which is also the foundation of the whole moral universe,—unless we can meet without feeling a secret obligation to apologize or make allowance for each other's defection from strict integrity,—then a thick cloud will gradually settle down upon our intercourse, and rob it of its beauty. If I must feel humiliated before you, because obliged to make demands on your indulgence for my moral obliquities,—or if I must in my heart make excuses for some moral lapse of yours, and smother my deep disapproval in a forced feeling of pity for your unfaithfulness to high honor,—it will be impossible for us to meet with confidence eye to eye,—impossible for us to feel that mutual esteem without which all love declines and dies. Friendship may survive, however deeply wounded, those moral offences which spring from fierce and overpowering temptation; but it is suffocated in an atmosphere of low moral aims. Only on deep love of goodness, uprightness, and truth, shall any high fellowship be based. Give me the right to respect you, friend, or release me from my bond. Without that secret reverence for each other which is wrested from the soul by the spectacle of grand purity of purpose, and grand fidelity to the moral ideal, in vain shall two friends make profession of eternal love,—in vain shall they strive to perpetuate that high affection of which virtue is the inspiration and the soul. We are not masters of our own hearts; we are not able to escape the stern workings of that law of God which exacts nobility of character as the ground of all spiritual alliance. The lofty encounter of friendship is above the reach of those whose innermost life is unconsecrated by enthusiasm for the true, the beautiful, and the good. Prove to me that you are capable of sacrifice for humanity, willing to dispense with the world's baubles for the sake of sacred realities, devoted in sincerity to objects that transcend your selfish interests, or in vain shall I seek to lay at your feet the deep homage of my soul. Without the consciousness of mutual self-dedication to the highest, we shall be barred from that Olympian converse of thought and feeling which alone deserves the name of friendship. Respect yourself at all costs, or resign the hope of that supreme fellowship whose first law is the law of self-respect.

Equality, independence, sincerity, mutual respect which is based on self-respect,—these are the great postulates of a friendship that shall endure forever on the lofty heights of ideal love. "Because nature cannot be changed," Cicero exclaims, "therefore true friendships are immortal." It is the eternal in you and the eternal in me that flash into recognition when our souls become one. Out of our deepest religiousness, at last, must our union grow. The lofty and tender sentiment, the divine sympathy in eternal things, which marks the completest unity of allied natures, is rooted in the consciousness of God. Only as we feel ourselves made one with the universe, brought into harmony with the life of the All, shall we enter into that high communion which is named friendship. What is friendship, but the discovery by two souls that all soul is one? Not by our idiosyncrasies, but by that which is universal in us, do we attain the perfect life of converse in the spirit. And that consciousness of the One Divine which makes possible to us our loftiest intercourse with congenial minds, lies also at the root of the sentiment of the universal brotherhood of man. In all men alike is the possibility of friendship on the highest plane; it is their low degree of development and their wilful selfishness which alone debar them from its realization in life. The same repose in the universal life of God which enables two friends to enjoy the pure delight of spiritual fellowship, enables, nay, compels them, to recognize the fundamental unity of their race, and to cherish that inner consciousness of it which is the true love of man. Thus it is no robbery of the race to concentrate affection on a kindred soul; for this very affection sows the seed of a universal love for all souls alike. In the love of God, we become friends to each other, and, in a larger sense, friends of mankind as well; and in this broadening out of the private into the public, of the individual into the universal, friendship achieves its highest perfection, and crowns itself with worship of the Divine.

FRIENDSHIP.

[From the Cincinnati Commoner.]

Of all classes of human relations, friendship is the least cultivated. Domestic ties are sacred with us, professional duties are faithfully performed, subject to a due percentage of grumbling, a few among us have an idea that they are citizens as well as men, and that citizenship includes certain public responsibilities; but friendship after very early youth is nowhere in the field, and is distanced by every other affection that can be named. We have hallowed it by no religious sentiment, and thrown round it no sacredness of obligation when once undertaken; even our closest friendships are things of chance more than of choice, and come and go with the tide of events like the driftweed of the ocean; for it is by no means certain that the man we call our friend this year will be any thing nearer than a mere acquaintance next year. We know nothing of the old classic romanticism which created Orestes and Pylades; and that odd fraternization in use among certain of the Slavonians to this day, when the sworn "brother" of a man is trusted with his business, his honor, his very wife, as a second self, is just as foreign to us—a phase of feeling to which we have no parallel, no false likeness even in our more prosaic code of manners. On the contrary, my own familiar friend of modern life is most often he who leads us into rotten speculations in which he secures his gain by our loss, who runs off with our daughter and makes love to our wife, and uses against us the knowledge which our very trust has given him. In fact, life is too full of competition for the mutual unselfishness and ready sacrifice of friendship; and we have substituted in its stead that general habit of good-fellowship which we mean when we call a man clubbable par excellence, and by this term express our highest idea of his personal qualities. And besides the weakening of the tie by competition on the one hand and by the communism of club-life good-fellowship on the other, the complicated state of society at the present day makes it very difficult to keep up any thing like that intense unity of feeling and action which younger and simpler societies find natural and easy. There are so many things to be thought of and provided for in the day's work; and among these comes the wife, whose likes and dislikes must needs more or less determine her husband's relations with his friends. And we know that very few wives adopt their husband's old friends with cordiality; while some do not even tolerate them at all, and scarcely one suffers them to be as free of the house as they were of the chambers. Hence there is scarcely any hearty friendship, implying unreserved confidence and absolute trust, possible between men of a certain position; and after schoolboy days and quite early manhood the very word itself is used only symbolically, and ceases to be of vital power or substance.

If friendship is hard to maintain between man and man, it is still more so between man and woman; so hard, indeed, that most people hold it to be impossible. Yet many women think it feasible; all wish it; and probably a few have proved it. But these are necessarily so few that they can not be taken as a class, nor their experience accepted as more than the proof of a rare possibility. Still there are hundreds of women to whom a man's friendship is their ideal of human affection. They do not want the excitement of flirting, or the peril and consequences of serious love-making; they want only the security and assurance of simple friendship; but an intense friendship—none of your vapid general courtesy and universal charity affairs—a friendship that means devotion and brotherhood in one, and that ensures exclusiveness in its own degree. Not necessarily exclusiveness in all relations, but only in its own; for many of these friend-desiring women will accept quite cheerfully the fact of the wife, who seldom sympathizes with her husband's platonic attachments; but if the wife will suffer them, they will permit her, and make the best of such obstruction as she may cause. They are rarely allowed this exercise of their forbearance. Here and there an old family lawyer or doctor, who knows all about their affairs and ailments, and has the whole row of household skeletons all by heart, sticks by them through the changes and chances of their lives; and the world does not talk, for somehow a long professional connection seems to give a kind of prescriptive right to close personal friendship, and no one thinks any harm of the tie. And sometimes an old lover who has married, and makes a good husband enough, retains so much feeling for the idol of his youth, now probably passing into the fading flower, as to take her affairs in hand, and protect her interests, perhaps at considerable trouble to himself, and have her constantly to his house like his sister—as he tells his wife—calling her by her Christian name, and making her almost one of his own family, with simply the house-door between. This can be done sometimes with good sense, good temper, and steady principle all round. But even these not excessive manifestations of interest can be shown, as a rule, only to widows or spinsters; not even to separated wives; for when once a woman marries, she loses her male friends more thoroughly than even a man loses his. Even if she is separated, men are shy of befriending her; if she is living with her husband, the thing is out of the question.

THE LIBERATION OF RELIGION FROM STATE PATRONAGE.—At the last meeting of the Executive Committee of the Liberation Society, the Secretary submitted a statement of the proceedings taken by the Nonconformists of the island of Jamaica, and by the Society at home, to prevent a renewal of the Jamaica Clergy Act, and especially to prevent the adoption of any scheme of concurrent endowment. Resolutions were passed, expressing the highest satisfaction at the intelligence lately received, that the Act would not be renewed, and that the Ecclesiastical Establishment had come to an end, and particularly at the announcement of Sir John Grant, that he had abandoned the idea of giving State grants for missionary purposes to any religious denominations. The volunteers of Jamaica were congratulated on the result of their firmness and vigilance, and the belief was expressed that the event would hasten the extinction of the Establishments, or the grants for religious purposes, existing in other colonies.—London Daily Telegraph.

UNORTHODOX LONDON.

South Place Chapel, Finsbury.

[From the London Daily Telegraph for Jan. 19, 1870.]

Being that not singular anomaly in the Church of England, a clergyman at present uncharged with clerical duties, I have employed my leisure in the examination of forms of belief other than my own. I have felt much interest in the study, and, I believe, have derived considerable benefit from it. I intend, under the above heading, to chronicle my wanderings "beyond the Church"—the Church of England, that is, "as by law established." That there is much to be gained from such a study is beginning to be tacitly conceded by the Established Church itself, since recent ecclesiastical movements have been little else than a bringing together from opposite extremes of elements hitherto deemed uncongenial and incompatible. The "Mission" or "Revival" of 1869 bore witness to careful explorations over the whole religious world, from the North Pole of Nonconformity to the most torrid regions of Romanism. That journey I propose systematically to make, and to set down its results for the benefit of stay-at-home travellers. On the plan of working from the circumference to the centre, I set off on a recent Sunday morning, resolved to make my first study at the widest possible radius, the very Ultima Thule of religious London. I name it "unorthodox" London, simply on the principle that "orthodoxy is one's own doxy, and heterodoxy everybody else's doxy." I state clearly at the outset that the task I set before myself is simply to describe, not to criticise or sit in judgment. If it be necessary at all to touch on my own religious convictions, it will be enough to say, that I believe all those systems and forms of belief, whose outward manifestations in worship which I note, contain a greater or lesser measure of truth; and I can only picture them as they present themselves to my mind, where I shall endeavor to give them all "a clear stage and no favour."

My religious wanderings commenced, then, probably as near the reputed North Pole as possible—namely, at South-place Chapel, Finsbury. Mr. Moncure D. Conway delivers a lecture here on Sunday mornings at 11.15; and I select from my MS. notes one on "The Church built by Voltaire," as containing something like a summary of the doctrines set forth here. In a published sermon, "Our Cause and its Claims upon us," Mr. Conway thus describes the religious body in which he ministers as "almost the only—certainly the chief—free Theistic Society in London." The chapel itself is that formerly occupied by W. J. Fox, and is close to the Moorgate-street Station of the Metropolitan Railway. The subjects of Mr. Conway's lectures are regularly advertised in the daily papers of Saturday. He is generally felicitious in his titles. For instance, the subject chosen for a discourse about the time of the opening of the Ecumenical Council at Rome was "Madonnas of Everyday Life." In this he spoke of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception as "an insult to maternity," and the worship of the Madonna as the logical sequence of the Protestant doctrine of the Incarnation, being, moreover, simply the deification of the female principle in Nature. His Christmas sermon, again, "Christ and Herod to-day," was a comparison between the birth of Christ—the account of which was treated as legendary—and the conception of truth in the human soul from the operation of the Divine Spirit on the heart. Herod represented the world, ever ready to crush the "Christ-principle." On the occasion of my visiting South-place Chapel, I found myself one of a very small but evidently earnest and intelligent congregation, with a larger proportion of females and poor than I had expected. The Chapel is, of course, plain in the extreme, and contains none of the paraphernalia of worship except a pulpit, from which all the service—if one may so term what precedes the discourse—is delivered. Of service, however, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, there is scarcely any. Mr. Conway, who is a bearded and by no means clerical-looking gentleman, mounts the rostrum in the garb of every-day life, and commences proceedings by giving out a hymn from Fox's Collection, which is effectively rendered by a good trained choir. There is no pretence of congregational singing. This is done for the worshippers by the choir; and from my point of view, of course, such an arrangement seems to give to the worship a degree of coldness, and to destroy the social element which so largely enters into our conception of public worship; though at the same time I am aware, from painful experience, that in our own churches, where the theory is different, the result often comes to be the same—that is, the choir does all the singing. Three "lessons" follow—one from the Old Testament, one from the New, and one from some religious work of more modern date. On the three occasions when I have been present, this last reading has been selected respectively from the works of Theodore Parker, from Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," and from the "Ancient Chaldean Oracles." A second hymn is followed by a brief extempore address. Then comes an anthem; and during the performance of this, the congregation avoids the wearisome ordeal one has to undergo in a cathedral by sitting instead of standing. There is nothing out of place in this; for, as I said, there is no congregational element either in hymn or anthem. The evident intention is to foster a devotional spirit in those present by bringing them to listen to sacred music.

Another very striking peculiarity is, that there is no approach to anything like prayer. The whole service consists of preaching and singing. The sermon is read from manuscript, in a slightly American accent, with very little gesticulation, and only just sufficient emphasis to prevent it from being monotonous. Its matter is practical and scholarly, the language often warming into genuine eloquence, and deepening into pathos.

On the subject of Voltaire, Mr. Conway began by giving an account of his own visit to the philosopher's house at Ferney, near Geneva—"that old battle-field of religious thought, where Calvin thought to make himself a Protestant Pope, and burnt Servetus for questioning the Trinity; where Arminius was educated in the Calvinism he did so much to destroy; and where Voltaire concentrated the spirit of Scepticism." As he walked in the grounds, amongst the crowd of visitors were two young "Divinity students" from Oxford, who were ready with their antidotes against Voltaire's teaching, and repeated the current story of his awful death. "The priests did all they could to make it awful," said a Frenchman among the group, "but it was really a noble death. When asked to recant, he turned his face to the wall and said, 'Let me die in peace.' He appealed from the priests to God." "But," said the student, "did not Voltaire do much to destroy men's faith?" "Not so much as Jesus and Paul," replied the Frenchman. "Then, again, he put nothing in the place of the faith he destroyed." The Frenchman pointed to the little church built by Voltaire, on his grounds at Ferney, with the motto over the porch, Deo erexit Voltaire. That church was the text of Mr. Conway's discourse. "That church," he said, "is the symbol of Protestantism in the world. The man who weeds and ploughs does as much for the future harvest as the man who sows the corn. Voltaire saved us from the Pope. Through his agency the Reformation took root in the intelligent classes. He set Protestant divines on the path to worship a God who could be served without degradation. He was, in fact, a sceptic, which scepticism alone could sift the wheat from the chaff." "The Oxford Divinity student," continued Mr. Conway—whose conception of Oxford men differs, it seems, from that commonly in vogue—"shuddered at the word 'sceptic.' But why shudder? No nobler word was ever uttered in any language. The Greek word which gives it to us means 'to consider,' and is derived from skia and ops, signifying 'to shade the eye.'" (I beg distinctly to state that Mr. Conway, not myself, is responsible for that etymology. "It thus means to look intently so as to protect the vision from the garish light of prejudice. Priestcraft has contaminated many other noble words, such as 'freethinker' and 'heresy.' But on these sceptics and freethinkers, the whole right of private judgment rests. There is no middle course between Scepticism and Rome." Mr. Conway went on to argue that, as Professor Huxley defined Scepticism to be the duty—nay, the religion—of science, as in worldly matters we reached our conclusions by suspension of judgment; so, in the highest interests of all, he dared not discard the judicial method, to walk by blind tradition and prejudice. "We live," he said, "in a time of unparalleled religious agitation, and the sudden influx of light must bring some discomfort to eyes long bandaged." He compared this to the liberation of the debtors from Whitecross street; some of whom wished to stay longer in their prison, and one who had been, to our disgrace, incarcerated for twenty-seven years, stared vacantly about him in the streets when set free. "Such," he said, "is the case in religious revivals. Men seek to go back to the old Whitecross street walls. The cases of Dr. Manning and J. H. Newman are typical; and this was the feeling against which Voltaire fought like a martyr. He would not do homage to the Man of Nazareth in life; but," he added, in an eloquent peroration, "doubtless, when his last breath was drawn, that crucified One would be the first to welcome him, and to say—'Thou, too, hadst thy Pilate and thy Cross!'"

The great practical deduction dwelt upon was, that there is a destructive as well as constructive work in religious reform—"a time to build and a time to pull down;" just as in the Hindu faith the gods of Production and Destruction were equally energies of Brahma. The Establisher and the Iconoclast work for the same end. Jesus built no Temple; he destroyed Pharisaism. Luther put no Church in the place of Rome. The destroyer is never popular, but he is none the less noble. He works by faith, just as the eye of the sower foresees the full harvest. So was Voltaire's work "in the deep furrow." Thus did he build that little church, whilst cathedrals crumbled round him. He knew man's deep need of religion: that church bore witness to it. Deo erexit Voltaire!

Such is an exceedingly crude outline of a sermon which, I fancy, the worshippers at Southplace would be content to take as an epitome of their tenets. No mere analysis, however, can convey a fair idea of these discourses; which, whatever else they may be, are full of thought. Of the religious principles of this strange outlying body the same authority says, in a published sermon:—"Hair-splitting theology, historical criticism, metaphysics concerning Christ—surely, as long as Unitarians can only give these to human souls, they may as well leave them where they are. But there is, I trust, another, a liberated Unitarianism—or rather the son and heir of it, weaned from its timid mother—which feels the whole earth to be man's altar, the broad universe his temple, humanity his Bible, conscience his priest, reason his prophet. To that great faith we who sit here may not have attained; but I faintly hope that to its magnificent summit we are heartily aspiring." So, too, with regard to the numerical strength of the body. "Two hundred people, already convinced, spend here one hour and a half every week; for the rest of the time this property does nothing at all upon its vast work."

Having sojourned so long at the North Pole, I made one step southwards, in the shape of a visit to the Society of Independent Religious Reformers in Newman street, where Dr. Perfit officiates. My mind misgave me that I should be somewhat out of order in visiting this religious body after South-place; but I find, they are really a step in advance in the admission of prayer into their service. Dr. Perfit shows considerable grasp of his subjects—the one I heard him treat was "The Right Use of Reason in Religious Debates"—but his style is somewhat vituperative. The whole tone of the proceedings in Newman street differs from South-place, where, if he can only tolerate hearing some of his favorite dogmas torn to shreds, a visitor can scarcely fail to be interested in the religious phenomenon presented to him.

So far our subject has scarcely taken us among definite religious communities. These are simply groups of disciples gathering round individual teachers. Our next excursion will take us into the region of recognised ecclesiastical bodies, equally removed from those of whom we have now spoken, and from the regions dignified with the dubious title of Orthodoxy.

A SLANDER ANSWERED.

[Extracted from a Sermon by O. B. Frothingham.]

One of the most popular preachers of the time, living in another city, made this extraordinary statement lately in a sermon:—"The man who is an atheist will lie, and cheat, and steal." What is an atheist? An atheist is a man who rejects certain definitions of God. He may have thoughts about God, the world, Providence, the order and regulation of the universe, which he cannot express in any definition. He may have feelings about God, the order, wealth, beauty, and glory of the world, which he cannot express in any thought; and it may be the very depth of his piety, it may be the profoundness of his belief, that forbids his calling himself a believer in any customary sense. But this goes for nothing; he is an atheist, if he rejects the definitions.

Now think of it! A man who rejects certain definitions of God, will lie, and cheat, and steal. The man who said that in the pulpit would hardly say it in the parlor. The man who said it as a religious teacher, never would have said it in the company of men of the world. The man who said it in the name of God, never would have said it as a fellow-man among his fellow-men. It was religion, so called, that put that sentiment into his mouth. Have you any words—I have none—to describe the libel that it is upon humanity? What a wholesale judgment, of slander; what a sweeping denunciation; what a boundless extravagance of uncharitableness; what an absolute denial of kindness! No man of the world would say such a thing as that. The man of the world, the man of business, the man of pleasure, the man of literature, the editor, philosopher, mechanic, engineer, never would say it. The man of the world knows that, practically, it makes no difference how a man defines God. He knows that whatever a man's definition of God may be, he will obey the laws of society, if he is a rational man. He knows that men who are so-called atheists, may be good husbands, kind fathers, generous citizens, noble friends, self-denying and self-sacrificing, philanthropic, doing and daring much for the right. The man of the world knows perfectly well that those who are called infidels or atheists, may be as worthy members of society, as good friends of truth and justice, as any that live. And the man of the world knows, too, perfectly well, that a man may rank God according to the strictest creed of orthodoxy, may recite the articles of faith every Sunday, with bended head and revering lips, and yet may cheat, and lie, and steal in the street. The man of the world knows that the prisons are full of people who professedly believe in God. A large part of the crime of this city of ours is perpetrated by Roman Catholics. Are they atheists? Are all the revenue frauds perpetrated by atheists? Is Wall street populous with atheists? Is every defaulting clerk an atheist? Is every burglar an atheist? Is every man who breaks into a bank-safe an atheist? Is every man who drives a false bargain an atheist? There must be a great many atheists, then, in the world. A curious testimony met my eye lately. The convicts in a certain State prison sent a petition to the manager that no more hymn books might be sent to them; they wanted nothing but Bibles, they wanted nothing but inspired literature.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I am indebted to a friend for your prospectus. I received it by mail with his strictures written in pencil on the blank sheet, which I herewith enclose, that you may know what 'Free Unitarian' friends say of you:—

Outside of Christianity means outside of the religion taught by Christ, than which nothing is more unselfish, more pure, more God-like. Standing outside of this religion, which has thus far furnished all the true light regarding man's duties to his neighbor, himself, and to God, which we have, it seems to me he professes to be able to criticise, analyse, and thereby disparage the effects of sunlight without prejudice (!), because himself outside of it and enveloped in darkness, having shut himself up in a cave, and using only wax candles, for the purpose of fitting himself for the task. Outside of Christianity all is darkness, Paganism, Heathenism. What does the man mean? To Christianity he owes all the light, knowledge, and liberty he has. Ungrateful boy! to leave his mother that he may without prejudice criticise her character, and thereby show his independence and smartness!

I returned the following reply:—

'Friend —, Thank you for yours of the 11th enclosing Prospectus of THE INDEX. I will subscribe. I like the Prospectus. A few words on your criticism —' Outside of Christianity all is darkness.' I am surprised! You are a mystery to me! How it has been possible for a man to make the progress you have made in free thought and practical reforms and still hold such idolatrous devotion to old mythological terms, is to me a mystery. Why have you not become more critical than to employ the term 'Christianity,' when you manifestly mean the religious sentiments of Jesus? When you intend to speak of Jesus of Nazareth, why do you still use that old theological (or more properly mythological) nick-name CHRIST? JESUS was the genuine flesh and blood individual that, through the promptings of his own soul, spoke forth the pure religious sentiments of love and forgiveness, that seemingly form no part of Christianity. Christ was a hypothetical character of Jewish mythology, and subsequently the mythological idea was superstitiously applied to the person of Jesus. Christ is the ideal character of Christian theology—the second person of the Trinity, the 'very God,' 'crucified from the foundation of the world,' 'whose blood was shed as a ransom for our sins,' etc.—in short, the Hypothetical Demi-God of Christian mythology. Christianity is that stupendous theological system that you and I discard. Why do you still worship old hypothetical terms when you reject the hypothesis? Be consistent and call things by their right names."

THE QUEST.

Through weary days and restless nights,
I wandered o'er the earth alone;
I scaled the mountain's dizzy heights,
Where furious winds unceasing moan;
And still I hoped and sought in vain,
And turned me to my search again.

I roamed through forests dense and wild,
Whose sombre glades no ray illumed;
Eager I sought, by hope beguiled,
The spot where Friendship's garden bloomed.
Despair still followed on my track,
Weary and faint I struggled back.

Then I the fruitless search gave o'er,
And deemed that fate would always frown;
I vowed to chase a dream no more,
And on a bank I threw me down,—
When, nestling closely by my side,
A modest amaranth I spied.

Trembling I plucked the immortal prize,
And hid it deep within my breast.
How genial then the o'erclouded skies—
How rich the guerdon of my quest!
Seasons may come and seasons go,
But Friendship's flower no death can know.

The Index.

FEBRUARY 26, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

The entire edition of our third number is exhausted, and the editions of numbers one and four are nearly so. We cannot, therefore, furnish at present a complete set of the back numbers. If there is a sufficient demand from the public, these numbers will be reprinted. The name of every new subscriber who desires a complete set will be put on record; and if we reprint these numbers, they will be sent free to every such address.

Next week, on account of the necessary absence of the editor, THE INDEX will appear without his customary supervision; and it is hoped that allowance will be made for all mistakes that may possibly occur.

ANSWERS.

In another column will be found certain questions respecting the use of the Bible in the public schools, addressed to us by an unknown correspondent. It is the usual practice of editors to take no notice of anonymous communications—a practice we adopt. But we make an exception in the present case, and propose to answer these questions as unambiguously as possible.

1. The reading of the Bible should not be allowed as a religious exercise in schools supported by public taxes, for the simple reason that these taxes are imposed for educational, and not religious, purposes. No matter whether all the scholars are obliged to join in the exercise or not,—no matter whether all are obliged to listen to it or not,—the school-taxes are raised under false pretences, if they are used for any but educational purposes. No religious exercise, whether reading from the Bible, singing hymns, offering prayer, or any other act of worship, can be permitted without converting the public schools into religious institutions to that extent. This general objection is strengthened by the facts that reading the Bible without comment is not only a religious, but also a Protestant Christian, exercise; and that Catholics as well as Protestants, Jews and “infidels” as well as Christians, must pay the school-taxes. We are therefore opposed to any and every use of the Bible in religious exercises in the schools.

But “Inquirer” suggests that the Bible may be used as a “text-book,”—thus betraying a half-consciousness that it ought not to be used in the schools for religious purposes; and, since halfness is the chief characteristic of Protestantism, we surmise that “Inquirer” is a Protestant. Text-book for what? Let us see.

For science? The Bible will hardly serve as a text-book for geology in these days, or for astronomy, or for any other science known to us. It is at present the chief obstacle to the advance of the sciences, and would be worse than useless as a scientific text-book. The Berlin clergyman Knaak, denying that the earth moves round the sun, illustrates the kind of science which is derived from the Bible.

For history? The criticism of Niebuhr and his successors, pitilessly exploding the myths and miraculous narratives of Livy, has been applied to the Bible by Ewald, Bunsen, Strauss, and a host of others, with similar results. No well-informed school-committee would recommend the Bible as an historical text-book; and, foreseeing its treatment in the hands of competent instructors of history, we suspect that “Inquirer” himself would rather see the Bible quietly withdrawn from the schools altogether than treated as a text-book in this manner.

For morals? Some have defended the use of the Bible in the public schools as a text-book of morals; and possibly “Inquirer” may refer to their arguments. But the Bible will fare no better as a treatise on ethics than as a treatise on science or history. The worst morals are taught in the Bible as plainly as the best. The maledictory Psalms are as much a part of it as the Beatitudes. There is the same need of careful and independent discrimination in its ethical as in its scientific or historical teachings.

The only subject on which the Bible is really a text-book is religion—Jewish and Christian; and it is precisely this subject which, on account of the conflict in public opinion concerning religion, ought not to be taught in the schools at all. We are therefore opposed to the use of the Bible in the schools “even as a text-book.”

2. We believe that the law should strictly prohibit all use of the Bible in the schools as a religious exercise; and that there is no reason for using it as a text-book on any subject which ought to be taught there.

3 and 4. We believe there is no more reason for excluding the Declaration of Independence, the national hymns, essays containing religious allusions, or declamations from Webster, Curran, Parker and others, simply because they allude to God or Heaven, than there is for excluding Homer or Virgil for alluding to Zeus and Jupiter, Tartarus and Elysium. These works are all used for literary and other legitimate educational purposes. If the Iliad or the Æneid were used in the worship of mythological personages, they should be excluded for the same reason that the Bible should be excluded,—because they would be used for religious, and not educational purposes. Or if they were used to inculcate the ethics of Hellas and Rome, they would be as ill-fitted for text-books as the Bible. They are used, however, with perfect propriety, for purposes of literary culture and the study of ancient languages, notwithstanding their mythological allusions; and when thus used, we should be the last to exclude them from the schools. Neither would we prohibit any purely literary use of the Bible itself; although it is so plainly impossible, at present, to use the Bible for any purely literary purpose, that we should look with extreme disfavor on any attempt to smuggle it into the schools under pretence of its literary character. Our objections on this point will be obviated when rational views of the Bible are thoroughly disseminated throughout the community.

5. The answer we have just given to interrogatories 3 and 4 contain by implication our answer to this interrogatory. The radical position on the subject of using the Bible in the schools is altogether too strong to be reduced to absurdity by any such irrelevant questions. Of course no “censor” should be appointed to sift out of general literature all its religious allusions. We, at least, cherish no ambition for the appointment, nor shall we volunteer to draw up a catalogue of objectionable works or passages. THE INDEX is not the Pope’s Index Expurgatorius.

We have thus answered the questions raised with directness, and, we trust, with courtesy. But we would not be understood as treating the Bible with contempt. For its many beautiful and noble words, we feel as true an appreciation as the stoutest stickler for its enjoined use in the public schools. They make a part, and a very precious part, of the religious literature we have all inherited from the past. But they are so mixed with other words which can be approved neither by an educated intellect nor by an enlightened conscience, that thoughtful persons are compelled to winnow the wheat from the chaff. This, however, has nothing to do with the main question. If every verse in the Bible taught a lesson as grand as the Golden Rule, none the less would the Bible be used improperly, if used for religious purposes in our common schools. As long as the people are divided in religious sentiments and convictions, just so long will it be a grievance to a portion of them for the State to show any partiality towards the religious sentiments and convictions of the rest. The schools are for ALL. Let them, then, be so managed as to aggrrieve NONE.

A FREE EVENING SCHOOL FOR MEN AND BOYS.

The following circular explains itself:—

TOLEDO, Feb. 9th, 1870.

DEAR SIR:—We desire to call your attention to an Evening School recently opened in this City. This school is designed to meet the wants of a large number of young men and boys whose daily labor renders it impossible for them to attend the public schools, and whose instruction in the more elementary branches has been more or less incomplete.

This class of persons is already large in our city, and continues to increase with the growth of the city. A number of earnest ladies and gentlemen have volunteered to teach in this school, many of whom are teachers in the public schools.

A very comfortable room has been gratuitously furnished for this purpose, and the Board of Education has provided excellent desks and all the apparatus of a well appointed school room.

Among those whom you employ there are doubtless many who would gladly attend, if aware that a warm welcome would be extended to them.

Will you so far co-operate with this effort as to call the attention of such persons to this Evening School, and impress upon them the advantage of attending its sessions?

Writing, Arithmetic, Geography and Book-keeping will be taught, besides such other elementary branches as may be desired.

Books furnished free to all who need such assistance.

The School will be open Tuesday and Friday evening of each week, from 7 to 9 o'clock. Room No. 20, third story, Lenk's Block, corner of Monroe and Summit streets.

Very Respectfully Yours,
J. J. BARKER,
GUIDO MARX,
H. E. HOWE,
Committee.

At the third session of the School, Friday evening, Feb. 11, forty-four pupils presented themselves. The following letter was also received, which we print by permission of the writers:—

TOLEDO, O., Feb. 9, 1870.

Ladies of the Benevolent Society:

We, the undersigned, colored citizens of Toledo, after reading the advertisement of the "Free School," have taken the privilege of asking the Society if it would be against the rules of your fraternity for colored students to attend? If not, we would be pleased to enter, and take such studies as you may think advisable. We hope to be accepted.

Respectfully yours,

MRS. EMMA BROWN,
MISS MATTIE YOUNG.

Please address to 170 Adams street.

The next day one of the teachers called on the writers of the above, and explained that, for various reasons, it was judged best to begin with an Evening School for men and boys alone; but that, if this experiment succeeded, it was hoped soon to open a similar school for women and girls on different evenings, and that the writers would be heartily welcome. They were entirely satisfied with this explanation.

It seems proper to state in this connection that colored pupils are cordially invited to attend, not only the Free Evening School for men and boys, but also the Free Sewing School for girls, which is held Saturday afternoons in the same place and had fifty-six scholars on Feb. 12. The projectors of these schools offer to all alike, without regard to color, a chance to supply inevitable deficiencies in educational advantages, but in no way propose to interfere with the public schools. Sixteen pupils of the latter who applied Friday evening, Feb. 11, were, accordingly, refused admittance. All the pupils admitted showed a very earnest desire to learn. It is hoped that the public will perceive the great importance of the work attempted in these two schools, and help forward the enterprise in all practicable ways. Donations for the Evening School may be handed or sent to the Committee at any time; donations for the Sewing School should be left at No. 20 Lenk's Block, on Saturday afternoons.

No man ever yet worshipped God truly that did not first worship some woman, says Elizabeth Cady Stanton.—Toledo Blade.

[Shall we say that no woman ever worshipped God truly that did not first worship some man? Why not, if the sexes are equal? We are sorry to see such extravagant remarks on either side, and trust that the above is a perversion of what was really said.—Ed.]

AN EXTINGUISHER.—Mrs. Stanton, while on her way to Jacksonville, Illinois, met a young gentleman in the cars with a head about the size of an apple, who, buttoning up his coat with a pompous air, said: "I heard you last night, but I am not yet prepared for Woman's Suffrage." "I am sorry," replied Mrs. S., "for I fear you will block the wheels of progress for a century."—Woman's Advocate.

A Methodist preacher says:—"Take your religion with you to the sea shore, the springs, and the mountains, retain its spirit, and in order to do that, jealously maintain its form. Too many of us are like the little girl who, at the close of her evening prayer, one day said:—'Now, good-bye God, good-bye Jesus. I'm going to Boston to-morrow!'"—Exchange.

[It used to be Chicago, not Boston. The change locates the "Methodist preacher."—Ed.]

QUESTIONS.

EDITOR INDEX:—Will you oblige me with answers to the following questions?

1st. Is it your belief that the Bible should be utterly excluded from the Public Schools, even as a text book, or are you only opposed to the forced reading of it as an exercise in which all must join?

2d. Do you believe that the law should prohibit all use of the book, as it does immoral or licentious works?

3d. If so, do you not believe that the Declaration of Independence, and such of the national hymns as allude to God, should likewise be excluded?

4th. Should not essays containing religious allusions, and declamations from Webster, Curran, Parker, and a host of others, containing like allusions, and especially speaking of God and Heaven, also be prohibited?

5th. In fine, should not a censor be appointed, in order that all allusion to Deity or religious faith may be excluded from the school-room, lest the children should become impressed with the idea that this life is but a preparatory school from which humanity goes forth to a higher, nobler and purer state of existence in a Great Hereafter?

I have carefully read your article, "Romish and American Education," but am unable to ascertain precisely to what extent you go. INQUIRER.

FROM OVER THE WATER.

REV. MR. ABBOT;

Dear Sir,—I never saw you and you never heard of me, but I hope you will pardon me if I seem unceremonious in sending you a letter.

Some kind friend has sent me the first number of your paper, THE INDEX. A Platonist in philosophy and a disciple of Jesus in religion, you would scarcely expect to find many points of agreement between me and yourself. But this is in no wise a matter of regret with me. The more honest truth-seekers there are in the world who differ from me, the better it is for me; for then I may hope, through their labors, to get hold of some portions of truth which else I might have missed.

For this reason I am glad that "Free Religion" is to have a weekly newspaper. Let all sides of every subject be brought out. Let truth be tried. Let the people be trusted. A few old ladies, of either sex, who have been called to croon over sectarian nurseries may be terrified, and may start back in alarm, but that is of little consequence. Each seer must see through his own eyes, and his one responsibility is to make a literal report of what he sees. The thought-world is like a many-stringed instrument where each thinker is set to strike a chord, but where, after all, the grand performer is God, and under him, if each subordinate strike his chord with all his might, the harmony of the whole cannot fail to come out.

So, Mr. Editor, if you care nothing for greetings from a stranger, possibly the congratulations of an opponent may have some slight interest for you. Be bold. Be free. Strike home and strike hard.

You stand for the natural element in life; I stand for the spiritual. All I have to say in conclusion is: Go on. Give my superstition no more quarter than I mean to give your skepticism, and may God bless you in your work, and make you faithful and keep you true. J. EDWARD BRUCE.

"SECTS IN MEDICINE."

BY H. B. BAKER, M. D.

In an article written with the above title in THE INDEX of Jan. 15th, schools of practice in medicine were compared with sects in religion. As I understand that thorough discussion, with truth as its object, is encouraged, I will endeavor to continue that comparison.

In the letter upon which that article was based, Dr. Horsch declined to join a Homeopathic Medical Society because, to quote his own words, "It would be inconsistent with my convictions to become a member of any medical society with the names Allopathic, Homœopathic, Eclectic, etc., prefixed." He shows that he appreciates the fact that a part is not equal to a whole, and that, if a small part be assumed as the whole, a very insignificant idea of that whole may result. Without doubt the various schools of medical practice are comparable to sects in religion; let us examine separately some of those most prominent.

Homœopathy was founded upon a notion which was by some supposed to be a true idea, as at first there seemed to be evidence in its favor. The notion was first formed by observing that certain remedies sometimes produced diseases similar to those in which they were known to have a curative effect. Thus the use of sulphur was observed sometimes to cause an eruption on the skin similar to that which it was used to stop; and other remedies were observed to be sometimes followed by symptoms similar to those which they were otherwise successfully used to control. At that time, to certain persons, these induced abnormal conditions seemed to be precisely similar to those diseases in which the substance was remedial, and from this supposed induction they deduced a law that was supposed to apply to all diseases and remedies,—namely, that all diseases were caused by a specific agent or substance, and that each disease had its special remedy or antidote which in every case was the same substance which produced the disease. This, I think, is a fair rendering of the supposed law upon which Homœopathy is founded, and the foregoing is supposed to be a brief but truthful account of the origin. If it be proven that several of the diseases which frequently afflict human beings can be caused by using for the production of each a certain amount of a special agent or substance, and that each of these diseases is universally made to cease by the use of a certain other amount of the same agent or substance, and if these cases be numerous and there are found no exceptions, then the deduction is natural that there is a general law applicable to all diseases. It is still, however, a deduction, liable to be displaced by after inductions. Although in times past the evidence has been such as to convince many that there was a true Homœopathic principle or law, have we now, after further research, the above named, or sufficient data to establish the deduction? (In order to complete the notion something more than is stated above is needful; it must be shown that each disease has only one special cause. This is now known to be untrue—as for instance inflammation of any part may be caused by any substance capable of irritating and exciting sufficient increased functional activity.) When the microscope came to be used in the study of Pathology the disease known as Scabies (itch) was found to be caused by, and dependent upon, the presence of a living parasite, the Acarus Scabiei; and that anything which destroyed or removed these parasites caused the disease to disappear. It was thus shown that in this case sulphur was not a specific remedy, and as it is not assumed that by its use living beings can be created, it is also shown not to be the specific cause. The evidence from this disease has been abandoned by Homœopaths as not tending to prove the truth of their hypothesis. It furnishes, however, a favorable chance to test its truth, for in this case the cause seems to be positively known and is a special one. If the Homœopathic hypothesis were true, then, as in this case a number of parasites are known to be the specific cause, a certain other number of the same parasites should be the specific remedy; but as a matter of fact the absence of all parasites is required, and it is therefore seen that the law is not general, or at least that it is necessary to except this case. If an injury be caused by the use of a knife or other cutting instrument, it is not contended that the use of any other instrument or of the same instrument in any other manner will remedy the injury. This furnishes another exception.

If a disease be caused by the application to any part of the body of a chemical substance not under natural conditions coming in contact with it, it is not claimed that the application of any other amount of the same substance will stop the disease; in fact, the exceptions are so numerous that it is at once seen that the notion is not a general law.

Still it seems probable that in this, as in all great and widely spread popular notions, there is an element of truth; and although, if the whole practice of medicine be confined to one notion or truth, it is degraded and rendered insignificant, the foundation principle should be sought out and incorporated with the great collection of the principles which go to make up the science of medicine.

The element of truth in the Homœopathic system may perhaps be appreciated, if we consider that health consists in the proper exercise of every function of the body; that this is only possible under certain conditions of matter and force; that consequently any material variation from these normal conditions will cause derangement of one or more functions, and this derangement will tend to cease when its cause is removed. If that cause be the presence of an abnormal amount of a certain kind of matter or force normally constituting a part of the immediate surroundings of the body, then it is clear that a return to the normal amount will place the body again in its proper conditions for health; in other words, a certain amount of the deranging cause is in all such cases the proper remedy.

The limit of this law is readily seen by considering the opposite view of the case, for if the cause of the derangement be contact with some kind of matter or force which does not normally constitute a part of the immediate surroundings of the body, then a return to proper conditions for health involves the entire removal of the cause; the presence of a greater or less amount of the disturbing cause will not in such cases be compatible with the most perfect health.

To illustrate the law, and its exceptions,—oxygen is normally present in the air immediately surrounding the body. Its presence in proportions within certain limits is an essential condition to health. If the amount be diminished or increased beyond the limits, functional derangement results, which is remedied by a return to the proper amount. In this case a certain amount of the cause is the proper remedy for the derangement. Certain substances normally come in contact with the stomach as food or natural stimulants to its functional activity, but if the amount be too small or too great, derangement results; a return to the proper amount furnishes conditions essential to health. Again, certain conditions of force or motion are essential to health. For instance, human life is only possible within certain limits of temperature. The body must be maintained at about 98° F. in order that the changes which constitute life and healthy function may go on; any departure from the natural amount of heat will cause derangement of function, which can only be remedied by a return to the proper standard. In all these cases a certain amount of the disturbing cause is the proper remedy. On the other hand, the Acarus Scabiei (itch mite) is not one of the substances normally in contact with the body; the presence of the least proportion or number of them is not essential to health or happiness; on the contrary they cause structural and functional derangement, and in this case a certain proportion of the cause is not the proper remedy for the disease. The body is not naturally in contact with cutting instruments; cutting the body is not essential to the performance of its functions; no larger or smaller cut will remedy the injury of another cut; in fact we never hear of homœopathic surgery. If a thorough classification be made, arranging in one class all those cases in which the law applies, and in the other class all the exceptions, I think it will be found that the law applies to all kinds of matter or force normally present in the environment of the body, upon the presence of which its functional activity depends; although it is not true that the remedial quantity is uniformly minute, as is readily seen, for instance, in the case of oxygen, which is continually required in generous amount, and in fact is seldom present in a quantity too great. Of course, in those cases to which the law does not apply, the more minute the quantity administered the better, as the complete absence of the deranging cause is the normal condition.

Allopathy is the practice of creating one disease to cure another, or at least of producing a condition opposite to the disease. "The system of curing by opposites"—"contraria contrariis curantur"—is the maxim upon which it is, or rather is said to be founded, for this system was invented by the founders of Homœopathy in order to distinguish the opponents of their system, and it may be doubtful if it has ever had an existence as a distinct system except in the imagination of Homœopaths. It certainly has not at present any considerable number of advocates as a complete system; although in a certain sense the principle will apply to some cases. Thus it is well known that inflammation is stopped or continued by the use of remedies which under healthy conditions produce diminished functional activity,—a condition which is in a certain sense the opposite of inflammatory, inflammation being considered as an abnormal increase of functional activity. The principle of Allopathy, no doubt, contains an element of truth.

Eclectic signifies selective, and those who first adopted this title, as descriptive of their manner of treating diseases by selecting their remedies, began their career by rejecting or refusing to select from a certain class of remedies which had been employed by other medical practitioners, implying by their action that everything worth knowing respecting this class of remedies was already known, and that it was impossible that any good use could ever be discovered or made of them—which is at least a great deal to say of anything which has been created, as things so frequently prove of great value, when rightly used, which have been before considered worthless and even hurtful. Without doubt, however, the principle of selecting remedies for each particular case is a proper one, provided those rejected in each case are still considered and studied as possibly useful under some conditions for other purposes. It would seem that the larger the number of agents or substances from which to select remedies, the greater chance of securing those best adapted to the various ills to which flesh is heir. Rejecting or refusing to select from a certain class of remedies, the so-called Eclectics are a sect who act upon a partial truth as if it were the whole.

These several schools of practice may be properly compared to sects in religion; but while the various forms of religion are only now being examined, compared and classified, and the elements of truth in all brought together and built up into a science, a complete and Free Religion; that work has long since been accomplished for the profession of medicine. The fundamental truths of all the different schools of practice have been incorporated with other truths of vastly greater importance, which have been gained through study of the sciences, Chemistry, Anatomy, and Physiology; and to-day a vast array of Regular Physicians all over the world are receiving truth from whatever source it comes, and are each succeeding year better prepared to point out the way of physical life and health. While there are colleges where "the student is trained as narrowly in the doctrines of each particular school of practice, as children are trained in the doctrines of a particular sect in religion," at all the leading regular Medical Colleges, however, the case is different; the student has instruction in Chemistry, Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology and Materia Medica; this, together with the aggregate of past experience which is embodied in the works and lectures on theory and practice of medicine, of obstetrics and of surgery, furnishes the foundation upon which the student builds his system, but the Professor of theory and practice of medicine, during his course, is careful to give an explanation of all the prominent sects or schools of practice, and the element of truth upon which each is founded. Even this is not absolutely necessary; for the small amount of truth of each school is incorporated with the science of which it naturally forms a part, as for instance, the fundamental truth of Homœopathy is included and taught in Physiology, that upon which the Eclectic school is founded in Materia Medica and Therapeutics; (as is also that of Hydropathy); while the truth indicated by the Allopathic System has been learned by experience and is taught in works and lectures on Practice, as well as in those upon Materia Medica and Therapeutics. This large array of regular physicians who have earnestly labored to build up a free and liberal science of medicine, as distinguished from the many sectarian schools of practice, have, as is well known, long been dissatisfied with the old religious beliefs, and have impatiently awaited the progress of events. They who have studied the laws of progress in general, as well as in their own profession, fully believe that the progress of religion will conform to the general law, and great numbers of them are to-day watching the evolution of a Free Religion with perfect confidence that it will be established, for they have seen and participated in a similar work for their own profession. Probably on this account they sympathize more deeply and fully with this movement than any other class of people. To many of them this paper, THE INDEX, will come as a joyful messenger of welcome tidings long expected, and I confidently predict that among its many subscribers and encouragers will be found a goodly number of their names. [This is the fact. Ed.]

THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

BY JOSEPH KNIGHT.

Within the past year several important questions have arisen to vex the public mind—the advent of the Chinese, the increasing power and influence of Mormonism and its adherents, and right on the heels of both a new question, agitating pulpit, press and people—the reading of the Bible in the Public Schools. An occasional protest from some Free Thinker or Roman Catholic, were only the premonitory symptoms that broke out, and took form at last in Cincinnati in an organized opposition in the Board of Education of that city, to the exercise. The publicity given to the discussion that ensued, drew forth from far and wide, a variety of opinions. The most powerful champion of the Bible, we are told, was a distinguished Unitarian clergyman of that city, who has since, in several published discourses, taken strong ground against this innovation, striking right and left among Infidels and Romanists. The printer's ink was hardly dry on the pages, when another clergyman of the same denomination, whose name was once the synonym for liberality and the broadest culture, took substantially the same ground. In a late issue of the Liberal Christian, he raises the alarm that the Roman Catholics wish to supplant our common school system by schools of their own, supported by the State. He claims that this effort to throw the Bible from the public schools, is only the entering wedge for other and more important concessions from the Protestant party. He says that "the Catholics have two edges to their sword. First, they demand the exclusion of the Bible from our common schools, because it is there in violation of the religious liberty guaranteed by the Constitution. The moment any concession is made to this claim, they present the other edge of their weapon which is this:—Education without religion is Godless, Heathenish, Christless, and ruinous, and thereupon refuse to send their children to the schools. They further claim that as they have the same right to education at the public expense as the Protestants, they will educate their children at Catholic schools, wholly independent of Protestant influences, and in any manner they like." We have too high an opinion of the shrewdness of the Catholic party, to think they would take such a position as this. A more contradictory or illogical position could not be conceived. If they desired to establish sectarian schools, what stronger argument could they bring than the fact that Protestants, by the use of the Bible in the public schools, had established a precedent which they were warranted in following? Perhaps one-fifth, or more than this in the large cities, of the scholars of the public schools, are Roman Catholics. Their parents are taxed to support these schools, and they have a right to demand freedom in the matter. These scholars are compelled from day to day to listen to the reading of the Scriptures, full of contradictions of their form of faith. All the parents ask, so far, at least, is that they shall be spared this unpleasant exercise. If they desire to establish free Catholic schools, they have taken a very bungling way to bring about such a result. The very fact of their having demanded this change from a rationalistic stand-point, would alone deprive them of any argument in favor of it. In some Boards of Education the Protestants are in the majority. If they insist on the Bible being read, where they have the power to compel it, what shall prevent the Roman Catholics, where they have a majority, from forcing the distinctive teaching of their ideas? If the Protestant party insist upon this point, we can only foresee infinite trouble, and the final wreck of our common school system. If they yield, this giant foe is disarmed, this resurrected "Scarlet Woman" is again vanquished. Passing from this, we come to another phase of the question. The Roman Catholics are not the only opponents of this exercise. A large body composed of Spiritualists, Unitarians, Jews and others, joined with them in voting to abolish it. Their children attend the public schools, and are compelled to listen to the reading of passages of Scripture, which, to say the least, admit of various interpretations. In the High School of a city, less than two hundred miles from New York, there has been in use a Hymn Book called "The Songs of Zion," published by the American Tract Society. This school was opened every morning by prayer, reading of the Bible, and the singing of such hymns as—

"There is a fountain filled with blood," —and one in which this verse occurs—

"Grant one poor sinner more a place
Among the children of Thy grace,
A wretched sinner, lost to God,
But ransomed by Emanuel's blood."

In the index of subjects, we note the following heads:—"Christ," "Invitation and Warning," "Redemption," &c. A half hour was thus daily frittered away in these exercises. Could religious fanaticism demand more than this? We doubt whether either of the distinguished champions of the Bible, to whom we have referred, would send their children to such a school, or would long endure such an obvious attempt at proselytism, without protest. The indiscriminate reading of the Bible in the public schools, is just as objectionable to many good people, as the singing of Calvinistic hymns would be to these gentlemen. How can we come to a righteous and fair settlement of this question? The only way that offers, is to remove the bone of contention. The public school is not the place for distinctive religious teaching of any kind. At times opportunities offer when a judicious teacher can impress upon his scholars the grand landmarks of morality, such as truth, manliness, honor, &c. By such teaching and the example of a beautiful life, Dr. Arnold made Rugby the first school in England, and endeared himself to his scholars, as no teacher ever has before or since. Arthur Hugh Clough, in writing to a friend, said that he counted it one of the greatest blessings of his life, to have been under the teaching and influence of such a man. Surely in these days of many churches and much preaching, of missionary zeal and enterprise, the religious education of the youth of the land will not be neglected. Within the churches we can all have our isms, and if we choose we can carry them into our homes, our business, or society. But let us have one free and unfettered institution, where our children can meet on the ground of a great necessity and a common humanity. If the Roman Catholic church should ever make such extravagant demands as some suppose it will, we can do no better than to trust the great hearts and sound minds of the people. No great wrong ever went long unrighted. Witness the rising of the people, in the first years of the war, when the slave power, threatening and defiant, made every loyal heart tremble for the safety of the nation, and remember the sequel. Gathered from all lands, with every form of faith, by the magnetic influences of freedom, they calmly watch the progress of events, ever ready, like Holger Danske, in the Danish mythology, who sleeps with armor on and sword drawn, ready to awake and do battle for his country, when her liberties are endangered.

A PRAYER TO GOD.

BY M. DE VOLTAIRE.

I address myself, therefore, no longer to men, but unto thee, O God, the Creator of all beings, all worlds, and all ages; if it be permitted such feeble creatures, lost in the immensity of space, and imperceptible to the rest of the universe, to ask anything of thee, who hast given all,—of thee, whose decrees are immutable as they are eternal. Deign to look down in pity on those errors which are inseparable from our nature; and let them not prove our misfortunes! Thou hast not given us hearts to hate, or hands to destroy each other. Grant that we may mutually assist one another to support the burden of a painful and transitory life. Let not the trifling differences between our numerous imperfect laws, our idle opinions, our several conditions, so disproportionate in our eyes, and so equal in thine; let not the idle shades of rank or party, which distinguish the several atoms called men, be the signals of hatred and persecution! May those who celebrate thy name by wax, light at noon-day, tolerate such as are content with the light of the sun. Let not those who put on a white linen surplice to tell us we must love thee, hold in detestation such as preach the same doctrine in a coat of black woollen. May it be the same thing to adore thee in a jargon from an ancient language, as in a similar one formed on a modern one. May those whose garments are dyed red or purple, who domineer over a small part of a little heap of this earth, who possess a few round pieces of a certain shining metal, enjoy without vanity what they may call riches and grandeur. May others behold them without envy; for nothing is there in such vanities, thou knowest, to be envied; nothing is there in such grandeur of which to be vain. May all mankind remember that they are brethren; may they behold tyranny over the mind with abhorrence, and excrete the violence that robs industry of the fruits of its labor. If war be sometimes necessary, let us not destroy one another in the midst of peace; but employ our transitory existence in praising, even from Siam to California, in all the different languages of the earth, thy goodness, to which we are indebted for the present moment of that existence.

BE GENTLE TO THE LITTLE ONES.—A mother who was preparing some flour to mix into bread, left it for a few moments, when little Mary—with childish curiosity to see what it was—took hold of the dish, which fell to the floor, spilling the contents. The mother struck the child a severe blow, saying with anger, that she was always in the way. Two weeks after, little Mary sickened and died. On her death-bed, delirious she asked her mother if there would be room for her among the angels. "I was always in your way, mother; you had no room for little Mary! And will I be in the angels' way? Will there be no room for me?" The broken-hearted mother then felt that no sacrifice would be too great, could she have saved her child.—Lafourche (La.) Republican.

An exchange tells of a negro who insisted that his race was mentioned in the Bible. He said he heard the preacher read about how "Nigger Demus wanted to be born again."

GERMAN INDEPENDENT CONGREGATIONS.

The Free Religious Association is on terms of friendly intercourse with the Association of the German Independent congregations in this country. An official communication was received by us a year ago from the Executive Committee of the German Association, containing a statement of the history and plan of their organization, and proposing such representation and co-operation in our movement, as could be effected without interfering with the independence of either body. To this communication a cordial response was made at the time, and the President and Secretary of the German Association were invited to attend our annual meeting in Boston, last May, as representatives of that large section of the general free religious movement which their organization embodies. Unfortunately, they were unable to comply with the invitation. But a good many of the members of the German Free Congregations have also made themselves members of the Free Religious Association, and have manifested a warm interest in its welfare. It is felt on both sides that the two bodies are working in the same direction. These German Independent Congregations are among the significant religious signs of the times; and we propose to give here a little sketch of the movement of which they are the result, as contained in the communication above spoken of. The letter was written by Mr. Alexander Loos, of Philadelphia, the Corresponding Secretary of the German body. We quote verbatim, excepting that in two or three instances we have taken the liberty slightly to change the phraseology, to make it conform a little more to English idioms.

"The principle of Protestantism, as proclaimed in the Reformation of Martin Luther, failed, in spite of its inherent truth, to assert itself in the development of the Protestant church, on account mainly of the timidity with which those who claimed to be its rightful representatives and interpreters, shrank from following it up to its last consequences, and from proclaiming with true moral courage, the absolute freedom of the individual in religious matters from any other authority than that of reason. But the mighty impulse which the Reformation had given to the regeneration of science, and to intellectual development in general, could not be stayed; and its results can clearly be traced, in that steady and all-embracing advance of the natural sciences and philosophy, which characterizes the centuries following the Reformation, and which has led in our time to the frank and full assertion of the absolute supremacy of reason in the domain of the human intellect, on the part of all those who are entitled to any claims as leaders of their race, and as honest seekers of truth. The blind obstinacy with which the church and its representatives attempted to stay this tide of human progress, by piling up against it the petrified tablets of their creeds, necessarily produced another rupture, and gave rise to that religious movement in Germany, which, about twenty-five years ago, led to the nearly simultaneous formation of independent organizations, coming out of the Roman Catholic as well as out of the Protestant Church. While these new organizations necessarily reflected somewhat the differences traceable to their different antecedents, they soon discovered, as they followed the natural course of development, their essential unity in the acknowledgment of the supremacy of reason, in all religious matters; and this unity found expression in the formation, during the year 1850, of a union of all free religious congregations. This movement naturally aroused suspicions and invited the most arbitrary and bitter persecution on the part of the governments, especially against the leaders of the movement, some of whom, in consequence, sought and found a hospitable refuge in these United States. Here they still faithfully cherished the ideas, for which they had suffered persecution and martyrdom in their native country, and labored to win new disciples for them, in the land of their adoption. The result was the formation of similar independent congregations on this continent, which, on the 7th of April, 1859, entered into a union under the name of the "Association of the German Independent Congregations of North America."

These Independent Congregations, (known among the Germans as "Freie Gemeinde") are, as their name indicates, absolutely independent of each other as to the affairs of each society, and only join in the general association, for the sake of the general objects of religious liberty and progress, for which all the societies severally and collectively are laboring. There are some ten or twelve societies actually belonging to the general association, in different parts of the Northern and Western States; and as many more local organizations under somewhat different names are practically co-operating with the general association, though not nominally joining it. There is also a considerable individual membership from the German population scattered through the country. And the influential organization known as the "Turner-Bund," which comprises about 150 local organizations of "Turners," has at one of its recent conventions practically declared its adherence to the principles on which the "Association of the Independent Congregations" is founded. The two bodies are co-operating in many respects for the same ends, and make in the aggregate a strong power among the Germans in this country.

The President of the "Association of the German Independent Congregations" is Mr. Fred. Schuenemann-Pott, of Philadelphia, and editor of the official organ of the Association, published monthly in the German language under the title, Blätter fuer freies Religioeses Leben. He also travels a good deal through the country, giving lectures among the German population in behalf of the free religious principles, of which he is an able and zealous defender. The last general convention of the "Freie Gemeinde" was held at Sauk City, Wisconsin, in October, 1868.

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAYER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

CURIOUS EPITAPHS.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

A writer in the London Scotsman has a crop of epitaphs, several of which are quite fresh.

Here is one on a person named Chest:—

"Here lies at rest, I do protest,
One Chest within another;
The one of them is very good;
Who says so of the other?"

On a very old man:—

"He lived to 105 because he was strong,— 100 to 5 you don't live so long."

On Martha Shiel:—

"Poor Martha Shiel has gone away;
Her would if her could, but her could not stay;
Her had 2 bad legs and a badish cough;
It was her two bad legs that carried her off."

Mr. Proctor's antipathy to medical men did not save him from the common fate of humanity:—

"Here lives John Proctor,
Who lived and died without a doctor."

On Professor Walker, who wrote a treatise on English Particles:—

"Here lies Walker's Particles."

On Doctor Fuller:—

"Here lies Fuller's earth."

On a dustman:—

"Cease to lament his change, ye just,
He's only gone from dust to dust."

Dr. Chard's medical practice seems to have been large, if not particularly successful:—

"Here lies Dr. Chard,
Who filled half this church-yard."

The following is a quaint mixture of specific information and sentiment:—

"Here lies two babes as dead as nits,
Who died of agonizing fits:
They were too good to live with we,
So God took them to live with He."

On another babe:—

"Since I was so quickly done for,
I wonder what I was begun for."

The maker of the following epitaph is clearly of the opinion that Jones's ruling passion will be strong after death. Its profanity spoils it:—

"Here lies the body of Joseph Jones,
Who ate while he was able;
But once o'erfed, he dropt down dead,
And fell beneath the table.
When from his tomb to meet his doom
He'll rise with other sinners,
Since he must dwell in heaven or hell,
He'll choose where he'll get the best dinners."

On a woodman:—

"In Kent so good I was lopping wood,
And down fell from a tree;
I met with a check and broke my neck,
And so death lopped off me."

There is no evidence that Jonathan Pound was an Irishman, but his epitaph contains an unmistakable bull:—

"Here lies the body of Jonathan Pound
Who was lost at sea and never was found."

Rev. Mr. Dye, of Fairfield county, Connecticut, was travelling through Western Ohio, mounted on a tall, lank, raw-boned animal (a good frame to build a horse on), when he came to the junction of two roads, and not knowing which might lead him to his destination, asked a ragged, dirty looking urchin, which of the two roads would lead him to W—. The boy, in a rough and uncouth manner, said, "Who are you, old fellow?" Mr. Dye, being greatly astonished at the child's incivility, replied, "My son, I am a follower of the Lord." "A follower of the Lord, eh? Well, it makes mighty little difference which road you take, you'll never catch him with that hoss."—Temperance Standard.

NAPOLÉON AS A HATER.

Napoleon hated much and bitterly. He hated Pichegru, he hated Moreau, he hated Toussaint L'Ouverture—the poor, brave black man—he hated his brother Louis, he hated Madame de Stael, he hated Pitt, he hated the Queen of Prussia, he hated Sir George Cockburn, he hated Lord Bathurst, he hated Sir Hudson Lowe—not a very loveable man under any circumstances, it may be admitted; but still it was a little too bad of Napoleon to loathe the unhappy Governor, as he did as soon as he set eyes upon him, and after his first interview with him, to send away untasted a cup of coffee, declaring that the Governor's very looks had poisoned it. But I have no wish to re-open that old St. Helena sore. Let by-gones be by-gones.

The camp-bed at Longwood was not precisely a bed of roses; and at fifty-one, ruined, banished, in jail, separated from your wife and child, blistering on a rock, or shivering in a leaky bungalow, with your coat out at elbows, mutton at two-and eleven pence a pound, and no salad oil obtainable—with the knowledge of having slaughtered a good many innocent men, and left many thousands of widows and orphans—with all this, and an ulcer eating away your stomach, it is rather hard not to be allowed to hate your neighbors with feverish fierceness.

But the earlier hatreds of Napoleon were far less excusable, and they were the worst of all hatreds—the little ones. He was pettily jealous of Moreau and Bernadotte. He was afraid of the shrewdness, and envious of the wit of Madame de Stael, and hated her accordingly. His dislike of the patriot of St. Domingo was as ludicrous as it was wicked, and, with infernal ingenuity, he caused the hot-blooded negro, accustomed to swelter in the tropical sun, to be cooped up in a cold, damp casement, there to have chills and rheumatism till he died. He hated his brother Louis pettily, miserably, because Louis was quiet, unambitious, and conscientious, and, caring nothing for his crown, was still determined to do his duty to his subjects after he had been thrust on the throne. He hated Sir Sydney Smith, too, with a mean, personal hatred, because he drove him from before St. Jean d'Acre. He hated Ducis because he would not pen fawning lines in his praise; and Admiral Brueys—whom he would have struck with a horsewhip at Boulogne, had not the Admiral laid his hand on his sword—because Brueys, as a sailor, knew his duty better than he.—Saturday Evening Post (Phil.)

A NEW GODDESS.—L'Union Chretienne quotes the following from a German Roman Catholic theologian, Dr. Oswald. It gives new deductions from the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, which are thoroughly logical and necessary. The dogma of the Assumption of the Virgin is another perfectly logical result of the same dogma. Given this dogma and the theory of "development," and all the prudent details which the human imagination can invent must come up one after another, and demand to be received as the doctrine of the Church.

"We maintain the co-presence of Mary in the Eucharist. This co-presence is a consequence of our Marian theory, and we must not shrink from any consequence. We believe that, in the elements of the Eucharist, the presence of Mary is complete, that she exists there entirely, body and soul. Of course it is necessary to admit, as preliminary to this, the state of glory and the ubiquity of the virgin body of the Holy Mother, but, for us, these are things which are already proved. Besides, and this is the essential thing, we must familiarize ourselves with the idea of a mutual and permanent inter-penetration of the body of Christ with the body of the Virgin, in one sole and the same place, that is to say, in the holy elements. In fact, what have we especially in the holy elements? It is the body of Jesus, his blood and his flesh, far more than his soul. Now from whence did he derive his body, if not, previous to his birth, from the body of his mother; and afterwards from the virgin milk with which he was nursed? Then, since physiological accuracy is not here the important thing, and since maternal dignity is expressed most of all by the milk (which, moreover, is derived from the blood), we have to regard the virgin's milk as that part of Mary which exists (primo loco) in the Eucharist, and then, as an ultimate consequence, the entire body and soul of the holy Virgin is simply added to this. The blood of the Lord and the milk of the Virgin are there present together in the Supper. Then, in the chain of creations celestial and terrestrial, Mary is the link which, clinging to the Love of God, attaches humanity to divinity; so that Mary is not only the centre of humanity, but the centre of the entire universe."—The Living Church.

RELIGIOUS ORTHOGRAPHY.—"Come, brothering and sisters," says the leader, "I trust you'll okkepy the time. Let us be up and a doin' or a sayin' suthing for the Lord. If you have a word of exhortation, say on; if you feel nothin' but a glory, let it out!" Notwithstanding this encouragement, there were frequent and prolonged silences. At length a man rose in a distant part of the room, and, after vigorously clearing his throat, began at a high, nervous pitch: "Bruthren and sisters, I'm a poor ignorant creacher, as you know; I hain't had no advantages up there to Squit, where I was raised; and I've putty much forgot what little I did git into my head. But there's one thing I hain't forgot, and I hope I never shall, nither in this world nor to all eternity. Bless the Lord, bruthren and sisters, I hain't forgot how to spell Jesus—Ji-is-o-u-s!"—N. Y. Independent.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

In 1860—13,784.

In 1866—24,401.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of sidewalks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

THE MIRACLE QUESTION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Oct. 31, 1869.]

"Men believe that all those who explain miracles by natural causes or seek to comprehend them, deny God, or at least the providence of God. They think, forsooth, that God acts not at all, so long as he acts by the wonted order of Nature; and, on the other hand, that the forces of Nature and natural causes are idle, so long as God acts: they conceive, therefore, two powers numerically distinct from each other; to-wit, the power of God and the power of Nature." (Spinoza, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, Cap. VI, §§ 1, 2).

"Miracle, whether against Nature or above Nature, is sheer absurdity." (Ibid. § 29).

"Providence is nothing but the order of Nature." (Ibid. § 39).

"For all who are a trifle wiser than the mass of men know that God has neither right hand nor left, neither moves nor is at rest, inhabits no locality but is absolutely infinite; and that in him are contained all perfections." (Ibid. § 58).

What is a miracle?

The term is very loosely used. Great and important controversies have been carried on concerning miracles, their credibility and incredibility, which might often have been settled promptly by the adoption of some simple and clear definition. The first thing for me to do this morning, is to state exactly what I mean by the word.

Every physical event or change takes place in strict accordance with universal natural laws, as a result of natural causes. Under the same circumstances, the same causes produce always the same effects. If you put quick-lime and water together, there will always be a great evolution of heat, and slaked lime will always be the product. Repeat the process a million times,—the result will always be the same. This constancy in the operations of Nature, this regularity and uniformity in all natural actions, is expressed by the term law; and when we speak of the invariability or universality of law, we mean that UNDER THE SAME CIRCUMSTANCES THE SAME CAUSES PRODUCE ALWAYS THE SAME EFFECTS. Hence we say that all events, or (not to raise here the question of freewill) all physical events, are natural, i. e. in accordance with the universal laws of Nature.

But, in saying this, it does not follow that we can discover the natural causes of all events, or comprehend the natural laws in accordance with which they take place. If this were so, science would have accomplished her perfect work, and study would be henceforth superfluous. A great many events occur whose causes and laws are still unknown, and the progress of science consists solely in the gradual enlargement of our knowledge in these respects. Thousands of changes take place every day within reach of our observation, of which we can as yet give no scientific explanation. The phenomena of climate, the changes of the weather, etc., are very imperfectly understood; nay, the processes perpetually going on in our own bodies are, in great measure, a secret beyond the reading of even the profoundest physiologist. But, strange, mysterious, perplexing as events often are, we still feel justified in saying that all events are natural,—produced by natural causes, governed by natural laws. All human experience confirms this confidence, and would have been impossible without it. Increase of knowledge invariably reveals the close connection of all new phenomena with the old chain of cause and effect,—consists, in short, in the discovery of this connection. When, therefore, I say that all events are strictly natural, I but state the result of all human experience down to the present time.

Now when any strange event is reported to us,—any event as yet unparalleled in our experience,—two questions must be answered. First, what are the facts? Secondly, what is the explanation of the facts? The first question must be answered by an appeal to testimony; and the stranger the event is, so much the stronger must the testimony be. In proportion to the unusualness of the event, must be the strength of the evidence that it actually happened. Any event which does not actually contradict what we know of Nature, may be proved by sufficient testimony of the right kind; but if it is, or seems to be, in contravention of our positive knowledge, we cannot believe that the alleged facts are real,—or, at least, that they are correctly and fully reported. There is a practical limit to the power of testimony in producing belief. Suppose I come to you, for instance, and say that I saw yesterday a dog gnawing a bone in the street, you would believe me at once; if I say I saw him eat up a lamp post, you would charitably think me crazy, or delirious,—but you would certainly disbelieve me. Nor would it help my case to seek to prop my statement by getting others to corroborate it,—you would conclude that we were all crazy together, or trying to perpetrate a hoax, or insulting you. Nothing could convince you that a dog could really masticate and swallow an iron post. It is plain, therefore, that, while the testimony of man can prove anything in harmony with what we know of Nature, it cannot prove to us anything which is at variance with well-known natural laws. A great many very strange things doubtless happen; but, before we can become convinced of the actual facts, the evidence must be strong in proportion as the facts are strange; and even then, there is a practical limit, determined by our own good sense, which cannot be overpassed.

Who, for instance, dreams to-day of believing the miraculous cures of the blind man and the man with a crippled hand by Vespasian, although gravely attested by Suetonius [Vesp. 7] and Tacitus [Hist. iv, 81]? The Emperor is narrated by both historians to have wrought the former cure by anointing the blind man's eyes with spittle, thus strikingly recalling the similar story told of Jesus; and Tacitus adds that "living eye-witnesses attest both cures even at the present time, when there is no gain in the falsehood" [utrumque qui interfuerunt nunc quoque memorant, postquam nullum mendacis pretium]. In ordinary matters the concurrent testimony of these two historians would be decisive; why, then, the incredulity with which this story is generally received? Because ordinary matters require only ordinary testimony, while extraordinary statements like these require stronger proof than can be given. It would take a miracle to prove a miracle. Strange facts can be believed, if they do not contradict known laws of nature; but if they do contradict such laws, they are incredible by well-trained minds.

The question of fact, then, being settled, the question of explanation remains. It may, or may not, be possible, to explain facts which are strange, but well authenticated. An event is said to be explained, when referred to a class of similar events whose causes are known. But a proved fact may still be anomalous, provided its anomalous character consists in transcending, not contradicting, this experience. Unexplained facts are the raw material of science. But in regard to them all, science always makes the assumption that natural causes and natural laws, as yet undiscovered, exist as their true explanation. The simple fact, therefore, that an event is as yet unexplained, does not make it a miracle, in the proper sense of the word, although, in recent times, theologians have endeavored to give the word this meaning, in order to escape objections they could not meet. Spinoza himself, the earliest thinker, perhaps, who for philosophical reasons distinctly rejected the ordinary idea of miracles, retained the name in the sense of an event "whose natural cause we cannot explain by the analogy of any other customary event" (Tract. Theol.-Pol. Cap. VI, § 13). In this sense, however, miracles become so common, so cheap, as to lose all theological value. Their evidential force, as proofs of a Divine Revelation, depends entirely on their being conceived to be wholly outside the sphere of Nature,—outside the great natural chain of cause and effect. They prove nothing, unless they prove the direct intervention of God in Nature for the purpose of making a peculiar communication to man.

Unexplained facts, therefore, are not miracles proper, unless conceived to be due to other than natural causes. We are thus led to the true conception of a miracle, the true definition of it, as AN EVENT IN NATURE WHOSE CAUSE IS OUTSIDE OF NATURE,—that is, AN EVENT EITHER CONTRARY TO, OR ABOVE, ALL NATURAL LAWS. Here we attain a definition which sets in a clear light the reason why Science and Theology have contended so persistently over the miracle question. Science asserts the strict universality of natural law; Theology asserts miracles as historical exceptions to natural law. The battle is between Yes and No, and it is idle to look for any compromise. Bear in mind, if you please, the definition of miracle here given,—an event in Nature whose cause is outside of Nature.

The great Spinoza, whose influence in the world of thought has been that of an intellectual giant, has, in the passages chosen for my text, pointed out the absurdity of conceiving Nature and God as two powers, distinct and capable of conflict. What is this power thus set over against God, which he must first subdue and overrule, before he can manifest himself to man? What are natural laws but the self-imposed methods of his own activity, the regular channels of his outflowing life, the uniformities of self-manifestation determined by Eternal Thought? It is this exclusion of God from Nature which is the root of all possible atheism. If I were driven, as Christian Theology would drive me, to conceive of God as existing outside of Nature, and obliged now and then to make an irruption into it for the purpose of proving his own existence, I could not possibly retain a particle of faith in him; I should become, what I see many a man of noblest instincts and powers has become already, a complete disbeliever in his existence. It is the conception of Nature as identical with the living self-manifestation of God, that keeps the altar-fires of faith still burning in the inward temple of the soul; but it is part and parcel of this conception that miracle is impossible. Whatever events occur in Nature (and I pretend not to pre-determine them), they must be natural,—they must, therefore, be Divine; for Nature is nothing but the activity of God. I thus lay the axe at the very root of atheism, by discarding utterly all distinction between God and Nature, except that of the Self-Manifesting and the Self-Manifested. It is this hostility between God and Nature, invented by Theology and popularized by the Church, which has made atheism; and the notion of miracle is the root of it all.

In rejecting with such emphasis the idea of miracle, let me not be understood as denying the possibility of any particular fact,—I deny only that theory of proved facts which destroys their harmony with all other facts by assigning to them other than strictly natural causes. All facts have ultimately one cause—that Omnipresent Force in Nature which science, in recent times, has proved to be identically ONE under manifold forms of manifestation. As to the reality, in historical truth, of any particular fact, I demand simply a degree of evidence proportioned to its strangeness. I recognize with deepest humility the exhaustlessness of Nature,—her infinite productivity of new phenomena, combined with absolute unity of law. Far be it from me to dogmatize on what lies beyond the narrow out-look of my cell in this vast "house of many mansions," this illimitable universe of God. "The course of Nature's phases," says Carlyle, "on this little fraction of a planet, is partially known to us; but who knows what deeper courses these depend on,—what infinitely larger cycle our little epicycle revolves on? To the minnow, every cranny and pebble and quality and accident of its little creek may have become familiar; but does the minnow understand the ocean-tides and periodic currents, the trade-winds, and monsoons, and moon's eclipses, by all which the condition of its little creek is regulated, and may, from time to time (unmiraculously enough), be quite overset and reversed? Such a minnow is man,—his ocean the immeasurable All; his monsoons and periodic currents the mysterious course of Providence through aeons of aeons."

With this boundlessness of resources and complexity of laws which Nature reveals to every thoughtful student, it would be presumptuous indeed to declare a priori that any particular event is absolutely impossible,—enough to declare that, be it what it may, it shall still be of the same warp and woof of which the seamless robe of the universe is woven. When I am told that the waves of the Red Sea fled asunder in dismay at the voice and outstretched rod of Moses, and suffered the fleeing hosts of Israel to tread with unwetted feet the highway of safety over its floor of sand, I weigh the fact itself (if it be a fact) in the scales of science, and look for its explanation to some other source than the legends of a barbarous tribe. I inquire, is the alleged fact unique? Has it no parallel? May not some rare phenomenon of the place have coincided with the danger of the hour, and offered a fortunate exit from destruction apparently sure? The story does not stand alone. Plutarch relates that, to Alexander of Macedon, halting on the shores of the Mare Paphlagicum, God opened a pathway through the flood, in order to compass the overthrow of the decaying State of Persia; and Josephus, historian of the Jews, offers this tale as an apology for seeking to create credence in the narrative of Exodus,—as a confirmation of that old marvel of Hebrew History by another instance more acceptable to Roman prejudice. Nor is the fact of this precipitate retreat of the Red Sea unsupported by the allegations of modern travellers, some of whom claim that the "strong East wind," mentioned in the Bible as the cause of the event, occasionally produces at this day the same phenomenon. Be this as it may, I will quote from the Boston Journal for Dec. 20, 1867, an account, borrowed from the New York Tribune, of a very similar phenomenon which happened the previous week at Niagara Falls:

"A strong easterly gale sent the waters of Lake Erie westward, leaving the Niagara River lower than was ever known before. Buffalo Creek was so low, that all the vessels in it were grounded, and Niagara Falls was a rivulet, compared with its native grandeur. The American branch of the Falls was so emptied, that one could travel in its rocky bed without wetting his feet, and mysteries never before revealed came to light that day. Rocks that heretofore were invisible appeared in all their grimness, and great were the terrors of the finny tribes. The Three Sisters, a cluster of islands in the middle of the river, could be reached by foot-passengers, and many crossed where human feet had never trod before. Below the Falls was the wonder of wonders. The water was full twenty feet lower than usual, and the oldest inhabitant gazed in amazement at the scene. Near Suspension Bridge, the famous rock at Whitmer's Mill, which just projects above the surface in common times, and upon which a drowning man caught and was rescued several years ago, towered twenty feet above the level of the exhausted floods."

In the light of this apparently well-attested but singular event, the old story of the escape of the Israelites through the Red Sea acquires some plausibility, at the expense, however, of its miraculous character. A fortunate coincidence may have been handed down to posterity as a miracle, with sundry decorations and embellishments added unconsciously by grateful hearts and active imaginations. In like manner, a volcanic eruption may have destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, as it beyond question overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii; the prophet Elijah may have been struck by lightning, or whirled away by a mighty tornado. But whether we can assign a basis for our guesses, or whether we feel sufficient interest in these old legends to guess at all, is a matter of no consequence. The point I wish to make is this,—that just so far as these stories of ancient miracles can be paralleled to-day, and thus disrobed of their supernatural investiture, so far they enter the domain of the credible, and become subject to the ordinary criteria of history; the evidence for them is no longer ruled out of court, and the germ of truth they contain may be sought for without absurdity. The miraculous interpretation of the fact,—that is, its explanation as due to a cause outside of and above Nature,—must in all cases be set aside as irreligious; but the fact itself must be judged by the common rules of evidence. It is here that the famous argument of Hume becomes valid. If an event is alleged to have happened that directly contradicts all human experience,—as, for instance, the resurrection of a man really and unmistakably dead,—then the question is purely one of testimony. Theology, therefore, comes into court and rests her case entirely on the moral and intellectual weight of her witnesses. Before the Common Sense of mankind, as supreme judge, appear the two parties to the suit,—on the one hand, theology—with her witnesses to prove the truth of the miracle,—on the other hand, science with her witnesses to prove the truth of universal law. Miracle is EXCEPTION TO LAW,—Nature is LAW WITHOUT EXCEPTION; and the issue is between these two.

For the sake of clearly bringing out this point, permit me to use a special instance, and see how the case stands. The gospels relate that one night the disciples beheld Jesus walking on the surface of the water, and that Peter walked equally well on the surface of the water until his "faith" gave way, when he straightway began to sink. The point involved here is, whether it is possible for a human body to walk on the surface of water without sinking.

Now science brings her testimony, that of numerous, intellectually disciplined, and careful observers, all agreeing without a dissentient voice, to show that any object which is heavier than water, bulk for bulk, will sink, and not even float; and that any object, no matter how light, will sink in the water, until the weight of the water displaced exactly equals the weight of the object itself. Now the weight of the human body usually exceeds a little the weight of an equal bulk of water; and although, by inflating the lungs, a man can just succeed in floating, when lying supine on his back, he cannot maintain himself in an upright attitude, except by the very violent exertion of what is called "treading water;" and even then he sinks down to his waist, or deeper. These are facts which science proves by the laws of hydraulics and the universal experience of mankind,—by mathematical deduction and the strongest possible induction.

On the strength of this testimony, Science says that the story in question is preposterous, a mere fable, and cannot be believed by well-instructed persons. Theology, in her turn, brings forward opposing testimony, which consists of three or four very imperfect and frequently incongruous biographies, written a great many centuries ago, by persons utterly unknown. So far from harmonizing among themselves these biographies clash with each other on very important points; and they are all filled with stories of events which, even if testified to by persons proved to be eye-witnesses, would, if said to have happened to-day in this city, find no more credence among Christians than among sceptics. What amount of testimony, what number of witnesses of the very highest character for veracity, would convince any one of you that a man actually walked across the Maumee River yesterday forenoon, without aid, trick, or deception of any kind? A thousand persons, of the best reputation for truthfulness, though all unanimous, could not convince any one of us of a fact so inconsistent with what we know. Why not? Because we should certainly infer that, however honest the witnesses might be, there must be a mistake, an illusion, somewhere; the story would be so strange, so incredible to us, that it would be far harder to believe it, than to believe that even a thousand persons, eye-witnesses, could be deceived by appearances. If this be so,—if we could not believe such an alleged miracle, though testified to by a thousand living eye-witnesses,—what weight should be attached to the testimony of three or four manuscripts of unknown authorship and date? Which is the stronger, the meagre testimony of theology to facts so contradictory of all human experience, or the overwhelming testimony of science to the universality of laws which we can verify all day long, and every day in the year? The persons most swift to credit the wonders of the Bible are the very persons who are most incredulous of the wonders of modern spiritualism; notwithstanding that the latter do not pretend to be miracles, and are attested by thousands who claim to have seen and heard them. For myself, I can believe neither; but, of the two, the evidence in favor of these modern wonders is a million times stronger than that in favor of the Gospel wonders. How happens it, that the very same events, which, if said to occur here and now, are scouted as incredible, become perfectly credible by being transferred to a place a great way off, and shoved back into a period very long ago? Distance plays queer pranks with faith, as well as with sight.

"The Princess Ulrica of Sweden wished to test the reality of Swedenborg's intercourse with the spiritual world. She asked him to report to her the substance of a conversation which she had had with her brother, a short time previous to his decease, of the nature of which she was sure that no living person could have any knowledge. A little while after, to her amazement,—so the story goes,—Swedenborg fulfilled her request. But she would not accept the conclusion which seemed to follow from that test. Her answer was, 'How M. v. Swedenborg has possessed himself of this knowledge, I cannot guess; but I do not believe that he has conversed with my departed brother.'" (Hedge, Reason in Religion, p. 269). This is the spirit which modern miracles call forth; yet, strange as it may seem, it often co-exists with a contented, passive acceptance of miracles vastly more difficult to believe. Why is it that so many thousands of intelligent persons cling so tenaciously to outworn nursery-tales fit only for children?

Dr. Hedge, a Unitarian clergyman of some note at the East, may speak for a pretty wide class of educated minds. "I contemplate the portrait of Jesus," he says, "as presented in the gospel; and it seems to me so great and real, that material nature, with its uses and forces, looks shadowy beside it; so solid and commanding, that all things must needs be subject to it. And, after all, I find in miracles no difficulty greater than I encounter when I reject them. I know of no canon of criticism by which I can eliminate every thing miraculous from the record, and yet retain the rest. If I reject them, I must reject the whole; and, rejecting the whole, I do such violence to historical evidence as would undermine all history, and annihilate the past." (Ibid. p. 278, 279).

In these words there is an almost childish petulance. "If I can't have the whole, I won't have any!" Such a spirit is less than manly. How often we hear it said, "If I give up part of the Bible, I must give up the whole!" and how frequently has the unreasonableness of this assumption been exposed by Unitarian writers! Yet here we find Dr. Hedge echoing the same stale cry. But, be the consequences what they may, the cultivated mind of to-day is called upon to yield these fabulous stories of miracle, as impossible of belief. I admit that, if all the miracles are cut out from the gospels, it becomes exceedingly difficult to construct any connected history out of the disconnected fragments; that our knowledge of Jesus, of his particular sayings and doings, becomes exceedingly small in quantity and exceedingly dubious in quality. By those, therefore, who have tried to work out a coherent biography of him without weaving into it anything of a miraculous character, little has been really accomplished. The features of that great personage who has, by his unrivalled influence, so profoundly modified the course of human development, seem to us as vague and indistinct as those shadowy faces which fancy quickly discovers in the sunset clouds, and as quickly loses. Yet as the same rich light plays over all the shifting piles of vapor, and lends to them, despite their rapid changes, a magnificence and beauty which attest the existence of a sunken sun below the horizon of the landscape, so none the less convincingly do these very stories, notwithstanding their miraculous element, attest, by the beauty of that divine spirit which irradiates them all, the incontestable existence of a sunken sun beneath the horizon of the gospels. The splendid hues of the evening clouds demonstrate, out of sight, a vast sphere of flame; and so does the spirit of love and self-sacrifice which pervades the gospel myths demonstrate, out of sight, a character divinely radiant. Such myths never cluster about mean or trivial souls. The fact, nevertheless, remains, that the historic Jesus is, in all but his large lineaments and dominant ideas, lost forever to human eyes. To all who can contemplate, soberly and dispassionately, the results of critical investigation, the fact that we know little of Jesus save the barest outlines of his career, stands established like a massive mountain; and although Faith, hurrying to find her Lord, distracted because she knows not where they have laid him, cries impetuously to this mountain in her path,—"Be thou removed, and cast into the depths of the sea!"—the mountain stands solid and unmoved.

Yet, deeply as we must regret our ignorance of Jesus in all authentic details of his career, why should any one feel bewildered or lost or shaken in spiritual poise? Miracles vanish like frostwork before the light and heat of the truth; yet the fact of Eternal Law remains, as the groundwork of the noblest faith. The same spirit which lived in Jesus, lives to-day to attest the same everlasting Fountain of purity and peace. The streams at which he drank have not run dry; the inspirations which he quaffed are brimming in our own goblets now. It is idle to seek in the past the foundations or the securities of manly life; if they exist not in our own souls to-day, we have ourselves alone to blame. All wisdom and worth lie in contentment with the Eternal Order of the Universe,—in determination to repeat that order in our own lives. This great Whole, of which we are a part, needs not to be tinkered or repaired by miracle-mongers, but is grounded in Intelligence and Love as changeless as its Law.

THE PEABODY FUNERAL.

"Victoria" (not the Queen, we infer) writes as follows to the Boston Commonwealth concerning the funeral services held in honor of George Peabody in his birth-place, South Danvers, Mass., the name of which town was changed to Peabody a year or two ago, out of gratitude for past favors and a "lively sense of favors to come."—

PEABODY, Feb. 9, 1870.

Wouldn't you like a letter about the funeral, and from a woman, too? Of course I need not say what funeral. Everybody knows. Has not all the world had its eyes on this quiet little town for weeks past, expecting to see it come off? And now that it has come off, don't everybody know all that they can know about it, till I tell them what I know about it?

PEABODY TOWN.

I think I won't begin, as I intended to, by telling you something about myself. One of our most "splendid"—that is the word everybody uses—female-lecturers gave us a talk this winter, and among other things, good and curious, said, "I thank God I was Boston-born." Boston being the only place, of course, where "cultured and progressive" people would permit themselves to be born. Were you born in Boston? Well, I can say that I thank my stars I was not Peabody-born. And why, do you think? Because, principally, this town, though an old one, has been the town of Peabody scarcely two years yet, and so I should not have been old enough to have gone to the funeral, and to have written you all about it afterwards. Isn't that a good reason?

THE ATTENDANCE.

The funeral was a great success. The town has come up to the reasonable expectation of all in doing honor to the great philanthropist. The decorations of the Institute, the church, and of the other private and public edifices, were in good taste, as I should think, who never saw the like before. Some were quite elegant. The well-known hospitality of the good citizens of the town was put to a pretty severe test, but we have only to show how true, warm and generous it can be on occasion. A huge crowd of people thronged the streets of the town from all directions at an early hour, and remained by thousands all day, despite the storm which set in with great severity before noon. Admission to the church was gained to some of us by going early and standing near the door, and then going into the galleries when the door was thrown open. Admission to the lower part of the church was had by the use of tickets, the means of obtaining which remains a profound mystery to most of us. We know that some got them, and some didn't. But though there was some grumbling, as there is apt to be where human nature is, it was clear that a church which would seat but 800 or 1,000 couldn't hold 20,000, and so somebody must stay out. It was all the better to be up-gallery. One could see better, and I soon found that most of us up there came to see quite as much as to hear or to mourn. Pretty soon the family and friends of Mr. Peabody came in. Then a long waiting, which was filled up by those near me in not very interesting talk about various matters, chiefly about "the Prince."

NOTABILITIES.

Finally, the Prince came. Everybody was all eyes at once, and the sad reflection was forced upon me that most of the good citizens of Peabody, who went into the right-hand gallery near the further end, went to Mr. Peabody's funeral to see the Prince! He is apparently a very nice Prince, and I was very glad he thought enough of his good mother's wishes to come to the burial of one she so highly honored. He wore jewels upon his breast, which, I presume, were emblems of "orders;" but I am not "posted" in such things. Mr. Thornton and the suite of the Prince were in full court-costume, and looked to our plain American eyes rather odd and barbarous. Then came in the Governors of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Maine, accompanied by the "staff" of the former. I never saw a "staff" before. It was a painful thing. Such consciousness of responsibility must be a sad burden. It must make existence almost intolerable. Either this "staff" is much mistaken, or else it is the principal support, not only of the Governor, but of an enfeebled Commonwealth also. There were a great many notables present beside these—representatives of State legislatures, of municipal governments, of colleges, libraries, academies, and institutes, of the army and navy, and of the navy of Great Britain. We noticed particularly the tall form of Rev. Dr. Sears as he came in, as noble a looking man as one would ever want to see. He has a face full of sweetness and strength. If he is not a genial talker and a good story-teller, then I am mistaken. I know I should adore such a man for a minister.

ADAMS AND WINTHROP.

Across the church was pointed out to me Charles Francis Adams, whose small stature does not make him very imposing, but whose face shows remarkable keenness and power. After studying that face awhile, I thought I could see why the sharpest and ablest diplomat in all England could not get so much as one move the start of him in that great game of diplomacy in which for years they stood matched against each other. Mr. Winthrop, who was the orator of the day, looked feeble. He evidently has travelled not only into the afternoon, but far toward the sunset, of life. But the force and vigor of his mind seem unimpaired.

THE SERVICES.

The services were uneven, I should say, though I don't go to meeting and funerals as often as I ought, and so am not a first-rate judge. The singing was superb, though I heard somebody say they thought there was no need of going out of town for singers when we have many very good ones at hand. The oration, or eulogy, was all it should be—all even the most ardent had hoped, even knowing the orator, the occasion, and the subject. The Scripture lesson was appropriate and apt; save that there was nothing in it of the great Bible doctrine of the resurrection and immortality—a thing one rather expects in the Scripture lesson at a funeral. I overheard one of our ministers making the same criticism afterwards, and so I feel more at liberty to state my own views.

A SUPPRESSED "ROW."

It is enough to say of the other services that they were not equal to the occasion. But then, there were rumors abroad all day, that a "prominent clergyman," whose name appeared on the programme, refused to do his part. So it fell on young shoulders, and it is no wonder he couldn't carry it easily or successfully. This being "left in the lurch" just at the last moment by the minister is very embarrassing at a funeral, and occasioned much talk, some of which was more emphatic than complimentary. I had no idea ministers ever "kicked over the traces," or "balked," or were subject to "little unpleasantnesses." Whenever I have seen them they have been very docile and lamb-like. Ladies are generally very fond of ministers, you know. I am. So I was surprised and grieved. I hear the "dear man" "cut up savage" with the genial committee who went to smooth things over with him. So there is a "pretty kettle of fish" in our peaceful town, and at a funeral, too, of all places! The reverend gentleman's friends blame the committee; and the rest of mankind, after having the committee's story, think the reverend gentleman's difficulty came from his too ardent desire to "shine." But, if I have got hold of the right story, there is at the bottom of the whole trouble a disagreeable mess of sectarianism, and that always breeds a "row." I can't begin to tell you half of it, and shall not try.

SECTARIANISM.

But it has been clear, so some of the committee say, that a certain member who has been more officious than modest or scrupulous, has meddled from the start for the meanest sectarian ends, and by means of the family whom he has been constantly going to with advice and persuasion has compelled the committee to do several rather ungracious and unpleasant things. The first plan was, we are told, to put the services into the hands of the clergy of the town, and they were notified accordingly. Afterwards, by his interference, backed by certain other members of the committee, these clergymen were shoved off entirely; and certainly, if I could tell you all, by the most underhanded and contemptible means—in some cases, by the unauthorized action of one or two members without the sanction of the committee. Of course this was rather aggravating, and we are told there is but one sentiment among the clergymen and their parishes as to the shabbiness and indecency of the whole thing. I am sure I can't blame them for feeling outraged. I can imagine how I should have felt once, if somebody had proposed, as I expected he would, and having got my consent, as I dare say he would, had then given me the go-by, and taken up somebody else. Ministers are very sensitive, you know—brittle, as one might say, like "China ware," and need to be carefully handled.

TOWN-TALK.

The rumor about town is to the effect that the youthful divine who "did" the services was quite up to the standard of sectarianism of the gentlemen by whose unauthorized interference he was selected for a part, and that he usurped the duties which had been assigned to one of the local clergy before the said "local" could make his appearance from the pew below, notwithstanding he had been informed, before going into the pulpit, that the other had been selected to do this part! I can hardly credit the story. It seems almost too mean to believe; and yet I have reason to know how small and contemptible sectarianism can be when it gets on the "rampage."

I fear the good people who took upon themselves to bury Mr. Peabody according to strict denominational regulations had not learned very much of the spirit of his generous, liberal, unsectarian, and most Christian, career and character. Alas! for the depravity of men, especially churchmen.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I send you enclosed a P. O. order for $6, for which you will please send THE INDEX with all the back numbers as follows,—[names omitted.] I have been a subscriber for, and an attentive reader of the Radical Magazine, for the last three years, and being fully in harmony with its spirit and aims, I find its pages a source of rare enjoyment. It is therefore with peculiar pleasure that I welcome the appearance of another organ, which is to be devoted to no special form of Religion, but builds on the Religious element which is universal in the human soul, which recognizes no authority outside of the human consciousness in any book or church. I believe the race has now reached that point of development in which the grand truths embodied in the Affirmations, may find recognition and acceptance in many souls, inspiring them with a higher trust, a better hope, and leading them to purer and more exalted lives. With this belief I am an earnest and zealous friend of your enterprise, and shall give it aid and encouragement to the extent of my feeble ability. I hope to send more subscribers soon."

—"Please find enclosed P. O. order for $2, to pay for THE INDEX for one year. I have discontinued the Liberal Christian, as I am not pleased with its late tone and spirit. It has turned its face backward and is alarmed at all new truth, be it ever so good. I want the truth as the only thing that can make one free indeed, and love and goodness must follow."

—"In view of the grand religious movement of Keshub Chunder Sen and his adherents, what a pity we cannot have a missionary sent by them to enlighten Christian America. I would give $50 per year for his support. We need such an agency to refute the base slanders of the Christian church, that they have heaped upon the 'Heathen world.'"

—"Having seen a notice in The Radical, that you were to issue a paper called THE INDEX, I enclose one dollar for which you will please send me the paper six months, and I will strive to aid the circulation in this vicinity, for I have read many of your thoughts with much pleasure and profit."

—"THE INDEX improves with each number. The fifty affirmations are excellent; but at the mast head so long seem a little like colors one must swear by, like a creed binding one to more than thirty-nine articles. If I were an adverse critic I should make that point."

—"I have given THE INDEX an editorial notice, and have mailed a copy of the paper to you. If you should feel disposed to exchange, I should consider it a favor. That you may prosper in your undertaking, and that the cause of Free Religion may in you have a glorious champion, is the wish of —."

—"We are rather hungry for earnest words and thoughts just now, and a few of us feel that we have been fed on the hunks of Religion about long enough. And hence bid you welcome whether we quite agree with all your positions or not."

—"Will you please send me five copies of the first issue of your paper. I enclose fifty cents; if they are more than ten cents each, will remit the difference. Any number having your Fifty Affirmations will do."

—"Believe us, you have our best good wishes. Spare not, but talk it bold and strong. There is nothing to be gained by the poor-pussy argument, so make the chips fly and be the Index hand-strong."

—"Your Affirmations are very generally admired. I will work for the INDEX willingly, but so many suppose super-Christian is anti-religious doctrine."

—"I am pleased with your paper and think it may be the means of reaching many who would not read more radical papers. The liberals are too close-fisted."

—"Am very much pleased with the paper, it meets a want I have long felt; several persons have spoken of it to me."

CUPID STUNG.

[Translated from Anacreon.]

On bed of fragrant roses,
In shade of leafy bowers,
The careless Love reposes,
Nor heeds the fleeting hours.

But 'midst the blossoms hiding,
A bee unnoticed lay,
Which, from its covert gliding,
Stung Cupid in his play.

Half running and half flying,
To Venus quick he sped,—
"O mother, I am dying!"
With sobs and tears he said.

"From crumpled rose-leaves darting,
A winged serpent sprung,
And bitter pains imparting,
My aching finger stung!"

But she smiled at his anguish,—
"If you a sting resent,
How, think you, must they languish,
O Love, whom you torment?"

The Index.

MARCH 5, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

The present number of THE INDEX is issued in the absence of the editor at the East. Our readers are requested to make allowance for any typographical or other errors that may occur in consequence.

The Superior Court of Cincinnati have issued a perpetual injunction against the enforcement of the order of the Board of Education, excluding the Bible from the Schools. It is probable that the case will be carried up to the Supreme Court. If anything can be devised more absurd than this cramming of Protestantism down the throat of the community, we shall be glad to hear of it. The end is not yet. The repeal of the Missouri Compromise was no gain to Slavery; the Cincinnati injunction will be no gain to bigotry.

JUSTICE TO THE DEAD.

William Lloyd Garrison criticizes the funeral honors paid to George Peabody as excessive and disproportioned to his deserts. He makes out a strong case. Mr. Peabody gave liberally, and in the main wisely, money that could not long be his and that added absolutely nothing to his own personal enjoyment,—receiving in return royal and popular acknowledgements that evidently did add to it very largely. We do not doubt that he sincerely wished to do good; and he has set an example of munificence which makes other men of immense fortune feel very uncomfortable under the public eye, unless they, too, learn to give. He thus helps dragoon millionaires like A. T. Stewart into their duty, and thereby renders good service to society. But if he had been solely a shrewd speculator, counting on a return of cent. per cent. on his investments, he could have discovered no better use for his funds. The simple fact is that Mr. Peabody's donations, dazzling as they are to the eyes that see the rich man's talent larger than the widow's mite, cost nothing in self-sacrifice, and paid largely in public praise. There is no reason to eulogize him as a man of exceptional goodness. He gave nothing in private charity, and it is said it was his habit to drive a hard bargain. For what he was and for what he did, he should have full credit. But there was nothing about him, except his large donations, to attract any especial attention from the public, or to command its gratitude. And far deeper gratitude is due to services far less conspicuous.

For, be as silent about it as he may, no true American, no true lover of human liberty, can either forget or forgive Mr. Peabody's lukewarmness (to avoid a harsher term) towards the cause of equal human rights in our great civil war,—his pro-slavery sympathies or his opposition to the "Personal Liberty Bill" in earlier days. We count it no duty to forget these things. When challenged by public opinion to join the chorus of laudatory acclamation over the bestowal of loaves and fishes, our tongue sticks in our throat. We should have been more grateful for one hearty word of encouragement, fresh from Mr. Peabody's heart, in the hour when every such word from prominent men was a new recruit to the army, than for all the money he has donated. We value gifts which bring the giver, and can do without them when he stays behind. The humblest soldier that bled his life away on the battle-field or in the hospital, and gave it, as thousands did, because he loved the cause he died for, has earned a thousand-fold tenderer remembrance from the republic than George Peabody. We would honor the one with moderation and large reserves,—we have no words to speak our debt to the other. The American people will love him best who has best loved mankind.

HOMES FOR THE POOR.

A letter from Mr. James Hole, published in the London Daily Telegraph and dated Jan. 17, suggests a modification in the management of the Peabody Fund. He says:—"Let working men's cottages be built, and let the whole cost be lent to the purchaser of such dwellings at the rate of 4 per cent., the whole sum of principal and interest being repayable within fourteen years, the period usually taken by building societies. The subscriptions payable by the purchaser would not be greater than the sum he now actually pays as rent. Arrangements might be made, on behalf of those who from any cause were unable to continue the payment of the subscriptions, for a return of the amount actually paid off, less a deduction for expenses."

Notwithstanding the size and ample accommodations of the buildings erected in London by the trustees of the Peabody Fund, it is reported that they are by no means filled, and that for some reason they fail to attract the classes for whom they were designed. A natural and laudable instinct of independence disinclines the workingmen to avail themselves of Mr. Peabody's plan of associated homes. They want homes of their own. They want seclusion and domestic privacy as much as their wealthier fellow-citizens. It is the industrious and well-behaved workingmen,—those who show the most energy and steadiness of character,—in whom this feeling is the strongest. They do not wish to herd together, but prefer to sacrifice something of physical comfort for the sake of securing an independent home. The preference springs from a good root,—from the sturdy individualism of the "Anglo-Saxon" character. The wisest beneficence will assuredly take it into account as an essential element in the problem how best to help those who try to help themselves, and instead of associated homes, will aim to supply to the industrious poor individual and private homes. Rev. E. E. Hale, of Boston, has already pointed out this better method of helping them. If Mr. Peabody had had a more truly democratic spirit, he would not only have been a truer friend to his country in her great ordeal, but also have accomplished far greater good than has actually resulted from his praiseworthy attempts to better the condition of the "working classes." (We use this phrase under protest, for the non-working classes, whether poor or rich, are the refuse of society.) If he had been less conservative, he would have had no sympathy with an oligarchy based on the principle that "capital should own labor;" and, by having a more thorough comprehension of their real wants, he would have benefitted the poor far more effectively than he has done. We cannot help relating these two things to each other,—the defect in his patriotism, and the defect in his philanthropy. They had one and the same cause, namely, the absence of a deep sympathy with human rights and with the independent spirit which a consciousness of those rights always engenders.

Mr. Hole adds:—"A reading room, common hall, and other valuable improvements are all capable of being introduced under this scheme,—a scheme which has been exemplified on a small scale by Colonel Akroyd, M. P., in Halifax, and also by a few gentlemen in Leeds, of whom the writer was one." We hope to see this scheme carried out, not only in England, but also in America.

A REPLY.

In the Independent of Feb. 10. "Penholder" writes nearly a column from Chicago about THE INDEX. Not a word of bitterness,—not an ungenerous insinuation,—not a sneer. On the contrary, what this orthodox believer says, is so kind in tone, and so far beyond any conscious desert of ours, that we have not "egoism" enough to reprint his words. But he is, nevertheless, as frank as liberal,—makes some direct criticisms, and puts some direct questions, which we have no right to pass over in silence.

1. The Fifty Affirmations, he says, betray an intense "egoism." Possibly. Every man of convictions is, in one sense, an egoist; and we have as strong faith in Free Religion as "Penholder" has in Christianity. It may be egoism to trust one's own insight into truth; but it is no more egoistic to believe in the Commonwealth of Man, than it is to believe in the Kingdom of Heaven. If conviction is at first hand, not borrowed on trust, it is egoistic; and what the world needs most profoundly is men of original convictions. It is no personal ism that we are interested in,—rather ideas of universal sweep, which are forces sufficient for the reconstruction of society, and the purification of character. Devotion to these is not, in the bad sense egoism, but altruism,—not absorption in self, but earnest endeavor to bring a blessing to mankind.

2. "It must be cold out there, Mr. Abbot. 'Faith in Man' is a dreadfully cold thing alongside of 'Faith in God' and 'Faith in the Christ, the Savior of Man.' "No! It is FAITHLESSNESS that is cold. Faith in man is the enthusiasm of humanity,—the heat and light and life of God in the human soul. It is the white-hot centre of a divine fire, beside which all other fires are snow and ice.

3. "I am afraid it would not help my fellow-laborer who tries to comfort poor shipwrecked fellows that are stranded in our county poor-house; I am afraid it would not help that merchant friend of mine who goes to the Bridewell every Sunday morning, and who tells thieves and prostitutes about Jesus the friend of publicans and harlots." What else helps them? What sends any one to the rescue of the poor and outcast, but faith in their humanity,—faith that a nobler self lies latent under the vice and crime of their outer lives? It is this faith shown by another in their native nobility, hidden like a jewel in the dung-hill of their moral degradation, that touches and melts their hearts into new hope and fresh aspiration after better things. Your appeal will come with ten-fold greater power, when you stop talking about this "love of Jesus" for them, and show your own love by helping them out of the ditch. Awaken their self-respect,—give them a fair chance in society,—lift off the weight of social proscription that crushes them down into the mud,—open a career for every hopeless and disheartened victim of wrong public opinion; and, our word for it, Faith in Man will be an angel here on earth, lifting the criminal and the prostitute into the honest life they have sighed for in their hearts this many a long year. Yes—your test is a good one. Judge between Christianity and Free Religion by their fruits. Stop this waste of money in building expensive churches,—dismiss these costly choirs,—cease these everlasting exhortations about salvation from imaginary devils, and drive out the devils of ignorance, and vice, and pauperism. Secure by wise reforms the RIGHT SOCIAL CONDITIONS for virtue and intelligence, and then stimulate each poor fellow to try once more, with the aid of your sympathy and strong, helping hand. This is the work of Free Religion,—not the lengthening out of church-membership rolls. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

4. "Being a man of heart, you can be shaken by things that may come upon you. What then? You must have something to take the place of the Christ then." True—we can picture possible and probable events that almost stop the beating of the heart. But vicissitude is the lot of man, and must be borne. There is no escape, with or without the Christ. We will bear it in the manliest fashion that we can, making no boast of heroic endurance, nor yet quarreling with the inevitable laws of Nature. To us, these laws are God's. We would not change them. We ask no exemption from them. We seek no favors that are not granted to all without respect of persons. We have faith enough in the infinite Rectitude and perfect Benignity at the core of Nature, to live from day to day without fear of what must befall. This, at least, is sure,—we must win our own victories, or endure our own defeats. Sorrow must come. If we can bear it,—well. If not,—well also. But we should scorn our own weakness, if cowardly fear for to-morrow were to affright us from convictions or duties of to-day.

THIS SIDE "THE GATES."

"The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand."

If but those pearly gates so bright
Would only open to my sight,
And let heaven's glories stand revealed
To eyes that now alas, are sealed;
Show me the radiant shining One,
Beaming with love—his vengeance gone;
The golden streets, the cloudless sky,
The spotless robes, the tearless eye;
'T would be assurance, ah! so blest,
I'd gladly turn to that "sweet rest,"
Leave earth's wild jar, its pain and care,
To dwell forever peaceful there.

Or, could I see, as others do,
Within those gates an earth, all new,
Purged clean from every earthly stain
Of sin and misery and pain;
Where every wish that's now denied
Would then be more than gratified;
If 't would not seem like selfishness,
I'd gladly prove such happiness;
But is not this too like the thought
Of the rude savage who, unfought,
Believes that heaven's a hunting-ground
Where game forever will abound?

Thus near the gates will Reason stand,
And shut them with a stern, cold hand,
Bidding me turn my eyes away
And trust the Power that holds to-day,
Who surely in His wondrous plan,
Will do the very best for man!
Cease dreaming vain, though blissful, dreams!
Look well to earth, which brighter seems
When we no longer will compare
Its facts with fancy's visions fair;
These make our life the "covered way,"
And death the opening unto day.

Be still, ye questioning doubts that rise!
I would not pierce the veiling skies;
Beneath them I'd new beauty find,
Nor walk through earth's Elysium blind.
I will not for the future fear,
But take the good that's now and here.
I'd make the bright things still more bright;
I'd love the dark things, if they're right;
I'd say with cheer, I will,—not must,— Accepting with the firmest trust
Even the pains that God doth send,
As proofs that He is still my friend

If this new faith in things that are
Could keep our thought from wandering far
To seek the beautiful, the good,—
If in our hearts we only could Bring heavenly love and rest and light,—
Earth would become an Eden bright.
If we to other's faults could be Full of all tender charity,
Speaking with love, or else be dumb,
Then would, indeed, the "kingdom" come;
And we this side "the gates" might stand,
Singing with joy,—"Our heaven's at hand!"

THE TOLEDO SOCIETY.

DEAR BROTHER ABBOT:—A thrill of delight tingled through my being, as I read in THE INDEX of February 12th the noble procedure of the First Independent Society of Toledo, toward the seceding minority of its members. The Roman Catholic Church formerly imprecated curses upon seceders and their posterity. For aught I know, such is yet their practice. In the Protestant portion of Christendom, some of the evangelical sects continue to feel it to be a christian duty to follow with acts of excommunication and words of opprobrium, men and women who after having lovingly co-operated with their labors and their property in building up a church, yet, from subsequent change of belief, feel it to be their duty to withdraw.

When will Christendom believe the last great voice which, according to its sacred book, issued from heaven—"saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men?" When will Christians become conscious that, when they anathematize or excommunicate men and women for honest differences of opinion on religious matters, they anathematize and excommunicate the dwelling place of God?

The action of the First Independent Society of Toledo in resolving to repay to its withdrawing members whatever money they had contributed to build their church, was honest; and in inviting them to attend their social and religious meetings, and to use their church was courteous. How luminously does it contrast with the action of many Christian churches in like circumstances! If these are the first fruits of free religion in co-operative action, I earnestly desire its further propagation. I would that the Christian churches held and practised a higher code of honesty and courtesy than now governs them.

Free religion needs not cathedrals or domed or steepled edifices. It tends to verify Emerson's Aphorism. "God builds his temples in the heart, on the ruins of churches and religions."

"The glories of our birth and state
Are shadows: not substantial things:
Only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

A. E. GILES.

QUIT YOU LIKE MEN; BE STRONG.

FRIEND ABBOT:—In the Independent of the 10th inst. I notice a criticism upon THE INDEX and its editor by "Penholder," the Independent's Chicago correspondent. I am not volunteering a defence of you, Mr. Editor, for you are abundantly able to take care of yourself; but I beg leave to submit to "Penholder," and the class he represents, whether Paul in the words I quote from his writings at the head of this article, does not justify the exalted opinion of human nature which the Free Religionists entertain, but which the orthodox so flatly deny. He was addressing Christians, urging them to the highest religious attainments; and yet his ideal character was not that of a Christian but a man. "Quit you like men," says he, "created in the image of God; never forget your high origin, and your capabilities of doing and getting good." Did Paul merely flatter these Corinthian Christians? No, he praised them, which is a very different thing, and encouraged them in the battle of life by reminding them of the strength and the dignity of human nature.

"Penholder" thinks that faith in man would be a poor instrumentality in reforming the vicious when compared with faith in God. But he knows that the most complete preventive to falling, and the most powerful agent in reforming the fallen, whether man or woman, is, to cherish the feeling of self-respect. Take the characters he speaks of, the drunkard, the vice-made pauper, or what is more hopeless than either, the trading, scurvy politician, who combines all the attributes of thief, coward, and spaniel. Even upon such wretches you urge the duty of self-respect. But what do you mean by self-respect? Is it the esteem one has for his present attainments in virtue? Why, there is nothing at all in his character which he or others can possibly respect! Do you mock him by asking him to esteem that which is loathsome? Do you tantalize him by urging him to exhibit strength when he is conscious of nothing but weakness? You mean by self-respect a remembrance of the native dignity of human nature; and when the hope of heaven, and the fear of hell, and all other motives fail in the work of reform, if you can blow into a flame the spark of self-respect which still smoulders amidst the rubbish of his character, you are full of encouragement.

Ask the conductors of our Penitentiaries and Houses of Refuge whether they do not succeed best in the work of reforming the convicts, when they adopt the idea of Paul in the words quoted, and appeal to their sense of honor and truthfulness. Ask the managers of the Midnight Missions of New York what is the greatest difficulty in the way of reclaiming the fallen women of that city, and they will tell you that it is the utter distrust they have of themselves, and the distrust that society has in the soundness of their conversion to a moral life. Although statistics prove that the vast majority of them have been driven by poverty to a life of shame, so that they are more unfortunate than criminal, the hopelessness of their condition grows out of the fact that society, thinking its morality a better type than that of Jesus, regards the sin of these women as unpardonable, and cannot say as he did,—"Go and sin no more." The loss of self-respect is the loss of all hope of reform.

When the orthodoxy of this nation had imbruted four millions of men by making them slaves, and by teaching them that slavery was a Bible institution; and when the time came to lift these men into freedom, it was found that the great difficulty in humanizing them was in restoring to them the sentiment of self-respect. It was the enlistment of them as soldiers that first furnished the leverage for this work of elevation. For in the army self-respect is only second (if that) in a soldier, to the duty of obedience. And hence the supreme importance of the amenities and courtesies of military life which give the army the reputation of being a school of honor.

I think it may well be questioned whether the present crowded condition of our State Prisons is not the natural outgrowth of the doctrine of total depravity as against the Free Religious doctrine of the dignity of human nature. When a mother looks upon her new-born babe, the Priest at her elbow tells her it is a child of wrath, and if it dies, must burn forever in hell-fire, unless its original sin is washed away by the water of baptism. But baptism only saves the child from the torments of everlasting fire in case it dies in infancy. As it grows up it is regarded as an incipient, undeveloped devil incarnate, the whole head being sick, and the whole heart faint, covered with wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores. This description of human nature is wafted in the lugubrious prayers of the pulpit, inculcated in every sermon preached, repeated at the weekly prayer meeting, and daily in family worship, morning and evening. Camp meetings and revivals represent the flames of hell as crackling and waiting for the "natural men," the impenitent sinners, as their lawful prey; and that the only way of escaping this eternal burning is to be converted and join the church. Now I ask whether such teaching, from infancy to manhood, saturating the very being of the child with its evil influence, does not necessarily rob men of all self-respect and self-reliance, by appealing constantly to fear, the basest passion of the soul, and making them, what all men, and even all brutes, despise—cowards? Does not such doctrine lead men by a quick step into vice and crime, which they are taught to believe and feel is their natural element?

God knows I am no Unitarian. In breaking away from the bondage of superstition, I was invited to enter into this half-way house, and also the one on the opposite side of the road, Universalism; but they were so poorly furnished, and so cold and cheerless within, that I hastened onward and upward to the glorious temple of Natural Religion where I now worship. But let "Penholder" visit the prison at Joliet, or any other, and learn the history of its inmates, and I venture to say that he will find few or none of the convicts to have had their characters moulded in the school of Channing, who taught that a human being was a child of God, not of the Devil,—that he is capable not only of high intellect, but of moral and religious development, and that he should respect himself too much as a man and an heir of immortality to yield himself up a slave to the mastery of sin.

I would respectfully advise "Penholder" before I close, that the tide in the religious affairs of this country has turned, and that in due time Free Religion will take the helm in reformatory matters, and prove to the world that its divine doctrine of faith in man is the one that will abolish evils by preventing them.

BEZA.

SUPERNALISM.

Fingunt simul creduntque.

It will readily appear, to the candid, I think, that in this investigation we should bear in mind the distinction which should always be made between Mediumism, i. e. the conduct of human beings, and the "Mystic Rap," i. e. the phenomena which cannot be accounted for by any forms of force known to the scientific world. The Rap has occurred; well, so has the earthquake and the meteor. The shattered meteoric stones have impinged upon our planet. How come they to do so?

Suppose, now, we concede, as I am ready to do, that Judaism, Christianity, Mohammedanism, and Modern Mediumism have each been caused by faith in the Mystic Rap? This admitted, then we may inquire as to the nature of the human mind, and those susceptibilities to which all forms of Supernalism makes its appeal.

There are three of the mental functions without which the Mystic Rap is nothing but a rap, and without which Paul said, "preaching is vain, and faith is also vain." Let us name them:—

1. Credulity. We are assured by those who are considered as good authorities in mental science, that this faculty gives the love of the wonderful, the marvelous, and mystical. It is fond of the new, the strange, and miraculous. Indeed, the term miraculous signifies the mystical, something we cannot explain.

Theology has carried the explanation of this term into a signification of supernaturalism, or phenomena produced by supra-mundane forces, which interfere with the laws of this world. And according to this definition, the Mystic Rap of modern times is a miracle,—as really so as anything described in the "sacred writings."

Hence we find that the miracle is always the greatest to him who has the greatest faith. The Mystic Rap is always the loudest to him whose credulity is the most easily excited. He who is the most ignorant magnifies the most. And here we may see the basic foundation of Christianity, in that it is nothing without Credulity or Faith. Modern Mediumism is a human movement based on faith in the Mystic Rap.

2. Fear. How frequently Supernalism appeals to this function of the human mind in the Bible, I need not stop here to show. Fear was appealed to in Judaism as the motive power in all forms of government. The fear of God was the highest element in piety, and so much was said of God's anger, wrath, jealousy and vindictiveness, that he is from first to last, represented more as an object of dread and fear than one of paternal love. And in this respect Judaism was unquestionably the germ of Christianity, which represents God as consigning the larger portion of the human race to the agonies of an endless hell, where "the fire is never quenched, and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever."

And, in one respect, Christianity may be said to have exceeded Judaism in its power of playing upon human fear. For what else do we find so much said of, as that old boss "devil, who goeth about as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour." Indeed, Christianity would be incomplete without the devil; and as to those mental epidemics called "revivals," nothing of the kind could be got up without that invisible personage who is believed to have a cloven foot and a forked tail.

3. Hope. And it has been truly said that "Hope springs eternal in the human breast." It is Humanity's title to the future good. We hope for the future by the same Authority that we find in ourselves—filial, fraternal, parental love. It is an instinctive emotion of humanity.

See, now, by what stories CREDULITY, excited by the Mystic Rap, works upon the organs of Hope. To the Jews it said:—

"You are God's favorites, above all other nations, and to you he will give this land, and you shall be his chosen people forever."

To Jesus it said:—

"You are the Son of God in such a sense that, if you were to ask Him, He would send you more than twelve legions of angels for your defence."

And so Jesus, might have continued to believe, had it not been that he soon after found himself so much distressed in view of death upon the cross, that he imagined this very God, his Heavenly Father, had really forsaken him; and so, overwhelmed with grief, he bowed his head in a swoon, and his disciples believed he was really dead. How real the mistake was in respect to his death, is plain from the fact that a few hours later we find Jesus alive, and eating his dinner precisely like any other hungry man.

So in Modern Mediumism. See here what a promise is held out by Credulity to Hope; for this is precisely what it says to Humanity:—

"Mediumism is a Royal Road to a knowledge of heaven, and the condition of all the dead now in their graves. Approach a medium, and, the conditions (for faith) being favorable, you may hold conversations with any one of your relatives or friends who are dead." This is the promise which mediumism holds out to the credulity and hope of Humanity,—a promise compared with which Christianity cannot be said to be real gospel.

Miscellaneous.

THE TRIUMPH OF MANHOOD SUFFRAGE.

[From the N. Y. Nat'ion.]

The Fifteenth Amendment—which provides that "the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and that "Congress shall have power to enforce the prohibition by appropriate legislation"—has received the ratification of the requisite number of States, and its adoption will, doubtless, shortly be proclaimed. We have given elsewhere some reasons for considering the theory that any State can recall its ratification before the proclamation of adoption to be without foundation. The reconstruction process may now be considered closed for all practical purposes, all excuses for inserting fresh "conditions" in the Constitution of the two States still remaining "out in the cold" being removed. Moreover, the agitation against slavery has reached an appropriate and triumphant conclusion, and the negro, from being the subject of the strangest struggle in the history of civilization, sinks into the rank of an ordinary and somewhat heavily weighted wayfarer on the dusty and rugged highway of competition. We can understand a thoughtful Southerner feeling awe-stricken as he looks at what has come to pass. The very feelings which he most carefully fostered, and made his boast and glory, have been converted into instruments of torture, under which he daily writhes. His pride of race, for instance, makes black equality tenfold the humiliation it would be to any other man. His contempt for the North, which he taught his children in their cradle, has made his subjugation bitter beyond the bitterness of any other recorded conquest. Every reproach he has ever heaped on the Yankee has given the Yankee sword a keener point, and the Yankee order book a deadlier sting. Even his hostility to "isms" has given the people who love "isms," and live by them, an influence and weight in politics and society which, but for his hatred, they would never have had. He has the consolation of knowing that free love, communism, rationalism, woman's rights, "agrarianism," free schools, and everything else of the kind that he most hated, owe a great deal of whatever success they have achieved to his dislike of them. We class them together, simply because this was a way he had himself. Now that it is all over, and he sees the negro on the bench (and the South Carolina bench, too) and in the Senate Chamber, he may sit down with the comfortable reflection that, considered from his own point of view, he has shown himself the greatest blunderer of the modern world. He ought to have the Fifteenth Amendment engraved on his tomb. No other epitaph would do him justice.

[We trust it will not be necessary, for the same reason, to engrave the "Sixteenth Amendment" on the tomb of the New York Nation.—Ed.]

AN OUTRAGE IN THE NAME OF JUSTICE.

[From the Boston Herald.]

That was a hard case described in our Municipal Court record the other day. A poor woman, partly dependent upon the small earnings of her little child, a newsboy, parts from him in the morning, as usual. Some time after noon she receives intelligence, through the assistance of a kind-hearted reporter, that her boy is in trouble in the Municipal Court. She hurries to the Court, and finds that it has finished its morning business and adjourned. She inquires for her boy, and learns that he has been arrested, tried (before Judge Chamberlain) and sentenced to the House of Reformation, and actually sent over, to remain there during his minority,—over nine years. The boy's offence was stealing three newspapers, of the aggregate value of ten cents. The little fellow said it was his first offence, and that he was led into it by an older boy. Does the cause of justice demand such swift proceedings in the case of a petty offence? Does it justify blasting a young life and breaking a mother's heart for a single offence, which the best instructed child might be led into? The boy asked that word might be sent to his mother; but the reasonable request was refused by the officer who had charge of him, and it was only through the kindness of an outside person that the poor woman heard of it at all. When she was informed of what had happened at the court, she was driven almost to despair. How would it have been, Messrs. Judges and Officers, if the boy had belonged to a rich family? How are much greater offences by older persons "hushed up" and privately settled? If it can be shown that this was not an outrage in the name of justice, let it be done. Otherwise, let those who committed the outrage be punished for it.

[This is the way in which Society turns juvenile offenders into hardened criminals. A few kind words would have done more to divert the poor boy from the dangerous path he was entering, than all the nine years of imprisonment for stealing ten cents. It makes one's heart ache to hear of such cruelty and injustice, without the power of righting the wrong. May the "good time coming" swiftly come!—Ed.]

GEORGE PEABODY.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

Charles W. Felt (probably of Salem, Mass.) writes to the Evening Post from Manchester, Eng., Jan. 8th last, saying: "I was in London in October and November, 1861, having a letter of introduction from Edward Everett to Mr. Peabody. I was astonished and mortified to hear Mr. Peabody, in the course of a short conversation, indulge in such expressions as these: 'I do not see how it can be settled, unless Mr. Davis gives up what Mr. Lincoln says he is fighting for—the forts the South has taken—and then separate.' 'You can't carry on the war without coming over here for money, and you won't get a shilling.' 'Harriet Beecher Stowe was over here, but I would not go to see her, though I was invited, and now she writes that this is our war. Such things don't go down over here.' I entered Mr. Peabody's office, feeling that I was bearing a kindly introduction from one of the noblest Americans at home to the noblest American abroad. I took leave of Mr. Peabody pleasantly, and I made one other call upon him, but I could only regard him as recreant to his country in the time of her greatest need." And the Post is moved thereby to say, as well as of the so-called "obsequies" which have crowded the daily papers for a week:—

"In one respect these demonstrations are honorable to the feeling of the people. They are meant to express a cordial approbation of the conduct of a rich man who has given away his money for public objects. So far they are very well, but it should be known that when his country had need of the money of her rich citizens, he buttoned up his pockets and refused it. This should abate somewhat the enthusiasm of the general applause. Besides, it should be remembered that Mr. Peabody was a shrewd money-maker, who held men to hard bargains, and never gave anything in private charity. He gave largely, even in his lifetime, to public uses, and in his lifetime enjoyed the reputation which this munificence gave him. He took his pay on the spot. He was eminently prosperous and successful in the accumulation of money; and he had no children to whom to leave it, and part of his princely fortune he bestowed while alive in such a manner that the whole world should hear of it, and the greater part of the rest, after his death, in benefactions of the like notoriety."

A CELIBATE GOVERNMENT.

[From the Woman's Journal.]

Many often wonder why our national housekeeping is carried on in such a slipshod manner. But people would not be surprised if they only remembered that "Uncle Sam" is an old bachelor. This is the whole secret. He has been trying to keep the political house without a woman to aid him. As a natural consequence, he reaps the usual harvest of old bachelor troubles. Unmended holes in his pockets often occasion the loss of a pocket-book. Buttons gone from his coat put him in a dilapidated condition, and poorly protected from the weather. His rooms are in "promiscuous order." His servants, wasteful. His health suffers for want of proper nursing in times of sickness. But all this is to be changed. His friends, seeing his aversion to the companionship of women, are working to get him into "ladies' society." Parties have been gotten up for that purpose. A large one at Cleveland; others in Washington, Boston, and many other places. Many letters have been written. The result is, he has been gradually getting a better opinion of women. He has been putting them into some of the important posts required for doing his large and varied business, and finds they do well.

And now I learn (though this, dear Journal, is told in strict confidence, and must not be repeated), "Uncle Sam" is engaged to be married! The marriage certificate has actually been applied for. The officer who is to issue it will number it as the sixteenth, and there is no question that when "Uncle Sam" gets this certificate, it will result in a great amendment to his constitution.

"HOW MUCH IS HE WORTH?"—The true tests of man are his moral, his intellectual, and his industrial worth. These are true factors of man's solidarity; they are the corner-stones of democracy, the granite and eternal pillars of republics, and until our characters are transfigured and permeated by these great truths, our republics are but as dreams and our democracies but as words that turn to lies upon the lips.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

We repeat once more our continually reiterated asseveration that the Free Religious Association has no published or cherished creed. We have said this a great many times and we expect to say it a great many times more, for no idea finds its way into the so-called religious mind so slowly as this,—that a religious body can be anything but a sectarian body. The word religion has so long been associated with a form of organization, a form of worship, a form of behavior, or a form of words, that even people otherwise intelligent, refuse to believe it possible that an association should allow its members to think and speak, each for himself, and not feel committed or compromised by their so doing. Line upon line, precept upon precept, therefore, is our motto. We did not, however, suppose that the occasion for this reiteration was to be afforded by those from whom we this time take it.

The Liberal Christian, with the reckless zeal that has characterized its conduct recently, since the summary dismissal of its too liberal editor, Wm. T. Clarke, endeavors to fasten on the Free Religious Association whatever odium it can attach to its own interpretation of Mr. Frothingham's discourse at Horticultural Hall, on the afternoon of Sunday, the 30th of January. The readers of THE INDEX are not interested probably, to know what might have been the precise doctrine of that discourse on "The Revealed and the Hidden God." As reported, evidently with candor and care, in the Boston Daily Advertiser, the New York Tribune and the Christian Register, it seemed to convey no doctrine that was either startling or new. The frank and outright protest against the accredited views of revelation, whether as instituted in a church, formulated in a creed, printed in a volume, or imparted to individual souls, may have struck some as audacious, though there was no very good reason why it should. But the doctrine that God is an object of faith, not of knowledge,—that the Infinite may be surmised, conjectured, sought, believed in, longed for, aspired after, but cannot be known,—is so exceedingly familiar to all thoughtful minds, and so exceedingly precious to all devout hearts, that any misunderstanding of it, or dread of it, or dismay on account of it, causes a feeling of simple amazement. None have affirmed this doctrine more earnestly than Unitarian writers, when opposing the dogmatic familiarities of the orthodox believers. In the two strong chapters of his volume entitled "Reason in Religion,"—the chapters on "The Retreating" and "The Advancing God," —Dr. Hedge states the same idea with an exhaustive power, that Mr. Frothingham's presentation laid no claim to, and with a display of argument that the Horticultural Hall lecturer could not have added to, had he wished. But Dr. Hedge, being inside the denomination and Mr. Frothingham outside, the statement that is simply impressive in the one case becomes dreary, dark and despairing in the other.

This, however, is not to the purpose; let it pass. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Frothingham's doctrine of "The Unknown God," whether it be better or worse, negative or positive, gloomy or cheering, atheistical, pantheistical, tritheistical, bitheistical, or theistical, it must be understood that his position as President of the Free Religious Association, does not in the faintest measure commit the Association to his opinions, or furnish ground for ascribing a particular theory of God to a single individual member of it. So far is it from being true that this Association has any solidarity of belief, that its very existence is a protest against such solidarity. Its purpose is to accustom people to think for themselves, to allow, nay to encourage, their neighbors to think for themselves, and to familiarize their minds with the habit of living in entire respect and sympathy with excellent men and women of every shade of religious and philosophical belief. Its first business is to break up these heavy masses of consolidated opinion, and resolve them into separate men and women, into groups of humanity drawn together by ties of human confidence and affection. The bare fact that no opinions whatever exclude from the Association, that the Calvinist may be a member along with the Universalist, that the Trinitarian may stand there side by side with the Unitarian, that Pantheist and Positivist are alike welcome, that the Hebrew Monotheist, and the Hindu theist may cordially meet there on equal terms, is guarantee enough that no one of these can dictate to the rest. Of course no person will be likely to connect himself with the Association, who does not believe Religion to be something more and something more important and vital than a religion or his religion; he must be prepared to rank his speciality, however dear, below the great comprehensive thing that constitutes the substance of all faiths, and includes them all; he must be open to the perception in his neighbors, whoever they may be, of the same original and underlying verities; in a word, he must be more a man of faith than a man of opinions, more a believer than a dogmatizer, more intellectual than sectarian, more spiritual than sentimental, and more human than anything else; but with this reservation, a pretty large one, it must be confessed, though not an extravagant one to ask, believers of every name may join the Association, and by so doing may assist in promoting a new and richer fellowship of faith.

It was the thing to be expected that those who planned and organized the Association should become its first officers and directors. It was also to be expected that these men and women should belong to the number of those who had broken away from Ecclesiastical organizations, and discarded traditional beliefs. None but mystics or radicals, people who soared above creeds or people who struck down below them, would be likely to hit on such an idea. But the idea, once suggested, is common property. Its originators enjoy no monopoly of it. No class of minds can appropriate it, or can desire to hold an exclusive interest or control in it. The sooner any such danger, or any such appearance of danger is removed, the better. The management of the affairs of the Association, might very properly be placed in conservative hands, in orthodox hands, if such could be found entirely free from the stain of sectarianism. Henry Ward Beecher, judging him by his recent introductory to the Church Union, would make an admirable presiding officer. That men, whose private opinions are unpopular, and whose public position renders them to some degree notorious, represent an Association so wide in its scope, is, no doubt, a misfortune. The proposition should have come from the mystical side, not from the critical; but it is as it is; and it is as it is, because technical religion so far absorbs the public mind that genuine religion is covered over and pushed out of sight. Whichever party assumed the responsibility of projecting the Free Religious Association, would perhaps have to bear the imputation of an irreligious purpose in their endeavor, and submit to be called Nothingarians, or something worse. The abandonment of so much as must be abandoned, namely, the idea that religion is identified with any names, formularies, worships or modes of culture whatever, will cause that they who abandon it will seem to have very little remaining. But patience will undoubtedly have its perfect work; and that perfect work will be religion, in place of several hundreds of religions.

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

THE ELEMENTS OF NATIONALITY.—The elements of Nationality for American Republicanism are—

- (1) Universal Suffrage.
- (2) Uniformity of Naturalization.
- (3) National System of Education.
- (4) Uniform System of Currency.
- (5) Uniform System of Postal-intercourse.
- (6) Unfettered Press and Pulpit.

Other conditions of nationality are merely evolved from these six elements, as water is evolved from a combination of oxygen and hydrogen gases. For instance, Banking forms a part of a system of currency, and national currency really includes Taxation. This will not be admitted by many persons, but close scrutiny will produce the conviction. It is not necessary that we should do much more than enumerate the elements. We do not desire to enter into the merits of rival systems. The unsettled questions among European currency-doctors we do not intend to pronounce upon. The peculiar virtues of paper, and gold, and silver, or any other article, as a medium of Exchange, we are not presumptuous enough to attempt to determine. Our only purpose here is, to insist on the necessity for sound and lasting combinations of the elements of National power, progress, and permanency.—From "Great and Grave Questions for American Politicians."

[From the Woman's Journal.]

One of the most amusing letters ever quoted in any book is that given in Curzon's "Monasteries of the Levant" as the production of a Turkish sultana, who had just learned English. It is as follows:—

Note from Adile Sultana, the betrothed of Abbas Pasha, to her Armenian commissioner.

CONSTANTINOPLE, 1844.

MY NOBLE FRIEND:—Here are the featherses sent my soul, my noble friend, are there no other featherses leaved in the shop besides these featherses? and these featherses remains, and these featherses are ukly. They are very dear, who buyses dheses? And my noble friend, we want a noat from yorself; those you brought last tim, those you sees were very beautiful; we had searched; my soul, I want featherses again, of those featherses. In Kalada there is plenty of feather. Whatever bees, I only want beautiful featherses; I want featherses of every desolation to-morrow. (Signed) "You know who."

The first steps in culture do not, then, it seems, remove from the feminine soul the love of finery. Nor do the later steps wholly extinguish it, for did not Grace Greenwood hear the learned Mary Somerville conferring with the learned Harriet Martineau as to whether a certain dress should be dyed to match a certain shawl? Well! why not? Because women learn the use of the quill, are they to ignore "featherses"? Because they learn science, must they unlearn the arts, and above all the art of being beautiful? If men have lost it, they have reason to regret the loss. Let women hold to it, while yet within their reach.

Mrs. Rachel Howland, of New Bedford, much prized and trusted as a public speaker among Friends, and a model of taste and quiet beauty in costume, delighted the young girls at a Newport Yearly Meeting, a few years since, by boldly declaring that she thought God meant women to make the world beautiful as much as flowers and butterflies, and that there was no sin in tasteful dress, but only in devoting to it too much money or too much time. It is a blessed doctrine. The utmost extremes of dress, the love of colors, of fabrics, of jewels, of "featherses," are after all but an effort after the beautiful. The reason why the beautiful is not always the result is because so many women are ignorant or merely imitative. They have no sense of fitness; the short wear what belongs to the tall, and brunettes sacrifice their natural beauty to look like blondes. Or they have no adaptation; and even an emancipated woman may show a disregard for appropriateness, as where a fine lady sweeps the streets, or a fair orator the platform, with a silken or velvet train which accords only with a carpet as luxurious as itself. What is inappropriate is never beautiful. What is merely in the fashion is never beautiful. But who does not know some woman whose taste and training are so perfect that fashion becomes to her a means of grace instead of a despot, and the worst excrescence that can be proscribed,—a chignon, a hoop, a panier—is softened into something so becoming that even the Parisian bondage seems but a chain of roses?

In such hands, even "featherses" become a fine art, not a matter of vanity. Are women so much more vain than men? No doubt they talk more about their dress, for there is much more to talk about; yet did you never hear the men of fashion discuss boots and hats and the liveries of grooms? A good friend of mine, a shoemaker, who supplies very high heels for a great many pretty feet on Fifth Avenue, declares that women are not so vain of their feet as men. "A man who thinks he has a handsome foot," quoth our fashionable Crispin, "is apt to give us more trouble than any lady among our customers. I have noticed this for twenty years." The testimony is consoling—to women.

And this naturally suggests the question, What is to be the future of masculine costume? Is the present formlessness and gracelessness and monotony of hue to last forever, as suited to the rough needs of a work-a-day world? Yet it is to be remembered that the difference in this respect between the costumes of the sexes is a very recent thing. Till within a century or so, men dressed as picturesquely and gracefully as women. No satin, no velvet was too elegant for those who sat to Copley for their pictures. In Puritan days the laws could hardly be made severe enough to prevent men from wearing silver-lace and "broad bone lace," and shoulder bands of undue width, and double ruffs and "immoderate great breeches." What seemed to the Cavaliers the extreme of stupid sobriety in costume, would pass now for the most fantastic array. Fancy Samuel Pepys going to a wedding of to-day in his "new colored silk suit and coat trimmed with gold buttons, and gold broad lace round his hands, very rich and fine." It would give to the ceremony the aspect of a fancy ball; yet how much prettier a sight is a fancy ball than the ordinary entertainment of the period!

Within the last year or two, the rigor of masculine costume is a little relaxed; velvets are resuming their picturesque sway, and instead of the customary suit of solemn black, gentlemen are appearing in blue and gold editions at evening parties. Let us hope that good sense and taste may yet meet each other, for both sexes; that men may borrow for their dress some womanly taste, women some masculine sense; and society may again witness a graceful and appropriate costume, without being too much absorbed in "featherses."

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.

In 1850—3,829.

In 1860—13,784.

In 1866—24,401.

In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of sidewalks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

GRIEF AND ITS COMPENSATIONS.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Nov. 7, 1869.]

"From seeming evil still educing good."

James Thompson, Hymn, line 114.

In taking as my morning's subject "Grief and its Compensations," it is not my purpose to treat it delicately, nor to deal in any "professional" common-places. The Orthodox pulpit claims the right to announce verbal promises from God, holding out glorious compensations in a future life for all the sorrows of believers here on earth; while the so-called "Liberal Christian" pulpit, distrusting the genuineness of these promises, yet not quite daring to look the grisly facts of life full in the face, dispenses semi-philosophical honey sucked from evangelical clover-tops, which tickles the palate but destroys all appetite for meat and potatoes. Whoever has once thought himself out of the Church-nursery hungers for food more substantial than honey,—thirsts for drink more refreshing than milk-and-water sweetened with a lump of New Testament sugar. The parched throat craves a draught fresh from the ice-cold mountain-springs of Nature. I would deal with human sorrow not as a clergyman or priest, which I am not, but as a man who would tell his fellow-men what he has learned in his own experience of life. The surgeon may be the kindest of benefactors; and the unwholesome diet of the Church sometimes creates tumors for which his knife is the only remedy. False views of life, of the universe we live in, and the laws that govern it, have embittered many a heart, and lent to the natural sting of grief a sharpness and a venom that engender despair. When brought to the test of experience, they give way, and pierce like a broken reed the soul that leans upon them. In the hour of sudden anguish we need more than ever the strength of great ideas to support us. Under the influence of modern thought, the faith of multitudes who fancy they believe the popular theology is secretly undermined; and when the rains descend and the winds blow, they discover with dismay that the fabric they trusted in as a sure refuge from the storm crashes in ruins about their heads. Unprotected and bewildered, they find themselves exposed without warning to the fierceness of the tempest. Having been taught that all doubt of the church doctrine is a veritable sin, they suffer the tortures of an upbraiding, misguided conscience, in addition to the natural agony of bereavement or loss. Our age affords myriads of such cases of artificial, unnecessary misery; we have all, I suppose, witnessed many such,—perhaps experienced the evil in ourselves. I have myself known many instances of persons, reared in the orthodox belief, who were utterly overwhelmed, thrown off their balance, on the occurrence of some great disaster; they had been taught to expect some Divine deliverance as the reward of their faith, and, finding none, suffered excruciating pains through self-accusation of imaginary sins. If affliction is believed to be punishment, as so many are trained to believe, then natural sorrow is sure to be intensified by unnatural remorse; the burden is doubled, and the aching soul is crushed to the ground beneath it. A lady who had been in the habit of attending a Unitarian Church lost her little child, in whom her whole being seemed to be wrapped up. Her mother and friends, who were orthodox, instead of seeking to soothe her misery, poured vinegar into the bleeding wound, by telling her that God sent this great sorrow in penalty for the sin of going to the Unitarian Church,—that, unless she repented, joined the Orthodox Church, and gave her heart to Christ, God might smite her other children also, and leave her in utter desolation. The poor broken-hearted mother, after enduring torments unspeakable, was over-persuaded, and did as she was urged; but she found little relief, after all, and remains to this day ill at ease where she is, yet not quite strong enough to break her bonds. Such cases, I believe, are common, and will be common, until the power of superstition is destroyed throughout the land.

Now in this matter of human sorrow I want to deal sincerely with myself and you. The facts of life are stubborn things; and however we may theorize, they change not for our theories. The simple truth abides, and will not be blinked out of sight, that we are sometimes roughly handled in this world of ours. No feather-beds are spread to catch us when we fall. The pathway before us is never raked and rolled, like the avenue of a gentleman's villa. Providence never steps to our side with an umbrella, in case it rains. No—so far as my observation goes, we must take the weather as it comes, and it never comes arranged with any special reference to our convenience; we must provide against it, or take our wetting. If we stumble headlong over a stone, we are left to lie there until we choose to get up; we must rub our own bruises, or let them ache; we may bump our heads never so hard, but we befool ourselves, if we expect Providence to pick us up or to "kiss the spot to make it well." There is a rigor in universal laws which looks like cruelty, while we are smarting under pain. We are taught in childhood that God is our Heavenly Father, overflowing with tenderness and ever waiting to catch us in his arms, the moment we miss our footing; and when we slip and break an arm or a leg, our first impulse, perhaps, is to accuse him of hard-heartedness. The Heavenly Father seems to be a Heavenly Step-father, at the best. I speak bluntly, it may be; but I think I utter the unspoken feeling of many and many a heart that has been suddenly made to bleed. There is so terrible a discrepancy between our early instruction and our own experience, when we come to the pinch, that faith secretly congeals into despair in many a noble spirit. There is no agony, however sharp or tumultuous, so terrible to bear, as this slow freezing-over of the fountain of faith,—this gradual turning to ice of the life-springs within our own souls. To some, at least,—to many of humanity's noblest children, I believe,—the conviction that man is the sport of wind and tide, born without a destiny and dying without a hope, makes that seem the happiest hour of life in which we leave it forever. If this conviction is the reflex of the truth, it cannot be reached too soon; there is no lasting good in self-delusion, be the delusion never so fair and bright. What I want,—what you want,—what every earnest spirit wants,—is to find the truth at all costs. If the truth is only a skull and bones, after all,—well and good; I will nevertheless embrace it as my dearest friend. There is a pride of veracity in every free soul that scorns a voluntary self-deception, though the bliss of a thousand heavens should be the reward of believing it. "Give me realities,—or go your way!"—that is its language to the church; and because the church responds with a pageant of gaily-colored bubbles that the first pin will prick into eternal nothingness, it turns its back on the church in stern rejection. The fact,—the hard, knotty, implacable fact,—is this, that what men call Providence is fair as a lily to-day, black as a thunder-cloud to-morrow,—gracious to-day as a lady's smile, terrible to-morrow as a tiger's fangs. Stern and rough usage befalls us all alike; sinner and saint, the just and the unjust, receive impartially, not merely the sunshine and the rain, but also the flood, the conflagration, and the earthquake. That is the iron fact; there is no use in trying to dodge it,—we have got to make the best of it as it is.

The case, then, stands thus. The Power that controls our life and shapes our destinies, is no indulgent parent, dispensing bonbons all day long; if it is indeed moved by an infinite tenderness for man, this tenderness must be compatible with inflexibility of law and extreme ruggedness of demeanor. If, as is taught us, "all is for the best,"—that is, if all events and all experiences shall in the end work good to you and to me and to every living soul,—then we must discover, if we can, a possibility of infinite tenderness assuming this seemingly harsh form of manifestation. The optimism of faith in a perfect Goodness demands at least as much as this, as the very condition of its own existence.

Now there are very earnest and sincere minds that refuse to recognize this possibility,—that assert, on the contrary, with emphasis, that the fact of pain in Nature, and especially in the life of man, disproves the possibility of perfect Goodness in the heart of Being. These men are entitled to respect, to a very high respect, for the honesty with which they mean to face the facts. In a powerful chapter of his "Principles of Biology" (vol. 1, pp. 340—344), Herbert Spencer dwells on the universal existence of pain-causing instincts and appliances throughout the animal kingdom, shows that "throughout all past time there has been a perpetual preying of the superior on the inferior, a ceaseless devouring of the weak by the strong," and points out especially the existence of two or three dozen species of parasites that infest the human body, often producing great suffering and death. He concludes with this significant sentence:—"With the conception of two antagonistic powers, which severally work good and evil in the world, the facts are congruous enough. But with the conception of a supreme beneficence, this gratuitous infliction of misery on man, in common with all other terrestrial creatures capable of feeling, is absolutely incompatible."

The moral courage and inflexible love of truth which will make a man accept and proclaim a conclusion such as this, commands my profoundest respect: I sympathize deeply with the character that thus shrinks not from the crucial test. But our question is not one of character, but of fact. Is Spencer's conclusion rightly drawn? Does the fact of pain disprove perfect goodness in the Omnipresent Power? I cannot disguise it to myself, and I will not disguise to you, that this is the ugliest question, the ghastliest doubt, that the soul must meet in its hour of anguish. Let us meet it now, like men,—now, before the storm bursts upon us, that we may be protected beforehand. "In time of peace, prepare for war;" in time of spiritual quiet, prepare for the terrible struggle that shakes sooner or later the soul of every man.

So far as the pain of lower animals is concerned, I frankly confess I see no way of reconciling it with perfect goodness, or assigning for it a sufficient reason. The presumption is so far against perfect goodness in the universal Power. But it is certainly illogical to claim that, because we see no sufficient reason, therefore no sufficient reason can possibly exist. The argument from human ignorance cannot be pushed so far. Spencer assumes that all the misery he describes is "gratuitous," that is, without cause or reason; and it is only because of this assumed "gratuitousness," that he denies the possibility of a supreme beneficence. I admit, gratuitous infliction of pain would be incompatible with supreme beneficence; but how does Spencer know this infliction of pain to be gratuitous? Simply because he can see no reason for it. But there may be a reason for it, notwithstanding. Even human beneficence will sometimes inflict pain for a reason; as when the surgeon amputates a limb. I maintain that Spencer's conclusion logically overshoots his premises; it is assertion, not argument. Beneficence does sometime inflict pain; and it may be beneficence that inflicts all the pain in Nature. We cannot dogmatically assert that it is beneficence,—I admit the doubt. But neither can Spencer assert that it is not beneficence,—I claim the doubt. Leave, then, this question of pain among animals undecided; Spencer has not decided it. Let us turn to the question that concerns us,—is pain among men compatible with supreme beneficence?

Remember that beneficence may inflict pain for a reason; bear this in mind. The question is, then, can any reason be assigned for the infliction of pain on man, sufficiently probable to incline the scale in favor of supreme beneficence? That is all we can expect. I am not trying to dogmatize, but to get at the truth as nearly as I may. Can we, then, discern or conjecture any reason for the infliction of pain on man, as the result of natural laws, which shall prove a sufficient basis for belief in a Perfect Goodness? Is it possible that the stern usage man often receives from Nature may have its ultimate root in Eternal Love? When you and I are wounded in spirit almost unto death, are we really idiots if we cherish a faith that all our pain is, at bottom, a loving gift of God? Or does reason set the seal of her approval on this faith, as, at least, more worthy of us than blank despair? This is a question that surely will come home to every soul sooner or later,—that has come home to some of us in terrible earnest. It will never be answered, if we persist in looking at our individual case; you may seek, and pry, and guess why it is that this particular grief should burst upon your head, but all to no purpose. Quit this mousing in your special case,—look out into the wide world of human life; a special reason you will never find, but a large, universal reason,—and no other will lie at the root of a universal law,—may perhaps be found. When you are tired of seeking to comprehend the reason of your individual affliction, turn to the world about you, and seek to discover if affliction ever brings a benefit. Perhaps thus you are on the highway to the explanation of your own sorrow.

When Spencer declares that there cannot be a supreme beneficence, because he sees no reason why it should inflict pain,—that, because pain is a part of Nature's order, therefore there cannot be a good God,—he is like an ignorant peasant, who, being told that the earth is round, should start off to test it, come to a valley, and declare, forthwith, that the earth cannot be round, because the curve of the valley bulges the wrong way. A larger survey will show the peasant that the earth is round, notwithstanding the contrary curve of the valley; a larger survey will perhaps show Spencer that God is good, notwithstanding the seeming contradiction of pain. How shall we gain this larger survey?

I think the objection that lies against God's goodness on the score of human suffering will disappear, if it can be shown that human suffering brings with itself a more than counter-balancing good. That is, if a law of compensation exists, by which grief becomes, as it were, the cash price of the highest benefit, then I think a reason is found for the infliction of pain which destroys its alleged gratuitousness,—overthrows, therefore, the dogmatic negation of a supreme beneficence. If a great evil is the condition of a greater good, as the cutting of quivering flesh is sometimes the condition of restored health, then, I claim, we have no right to stigmatize Nature as malevolent, or non-benevolent, simply because pain exists. The question assumes this form,—is there a compensation for human grief which reconciles the occurrence of disaster with a constant beneficence or Providence of Law? We need, we sorely need, a clear conviction on this point; for it touches our peace most nearly. If sorrow is aimless and gratuitous,—if our great losses are truly such, and not rather the rough and prickly burr that contains a nut well worth the picking,—then surely we have cause to shake with terror at every step we take. Life will become infected with universal cowardice, which is cousin-german to universal selfishness; and sorrow, when it comes, will be a poisoned arrow, bearing death to character as to joy. But if otherwise, how changed the case! A pain, dealt by a beloved hand from motives of love, can be endured,—not without wincing, perchance, yet without despair. Convince me that suffering is the price of my highest good, and I have, at least, every motive for heroic endurance and profitable use of it. My faith in that which lies behind the manifest ruggedness of my destiny, becomes then a secret and in-born strength that gives me the victory over all.

There is, I deeply believe, a true law of Compensation, a part of the great system of Nature itself, justifying the conviction that, savage and cruel as may be the apparent dealings of Nature with me, she means well by me, and not ill. If I set the highest value on outward possessions,—houses or horses, money or friends,—I should not feel so. From all these I must part. But valuing private character and public usefulness as the single yet double pearl of great price, I recognize in grief a very sincere, though homely, friend. Education in the noblest knowledge and highest excellence,—that is the great compensation that pays a golden guinea for every tear. Development into grander life and wider beneficence,—I count this the one goal of all ambition that may worthily be cherished. In this divine alchemy by which sorrow transmutes itself into spiritual education or development, I find a guarantee of gain that solves all question in my heart concerning its origin. "By their fruits shall ye know them." It is the fruits of grief that prove the seed divine. Take a single instance. The life of Lady Byron, revealed since her death by Mrs. Stowe, seems to have been burdened with a weight of sorrow imposed on few. Domestic happiness wrecked forever, in a manner that was outrage to every finer feeling,—constant contumely and malignant slander from him whose power to wound was greatest,—secret grief that was buried out of hearing of the voice of sympathy,—that is one side of the picture; but, on the other, continual bounty and self-sacrifice and devotion to the cause of the oppressed and the poor,—that is the other side. Here grief, there surpassing spiritual beauty,—root and fruit.

"And now the veil is lifted from the shrine
Whereon thy heart was offered; all is known;
No idle wailing o'er young hopes o'erthrown,
No craving for the world's vain tears was thine.
Thou knewest of a duty more divine,
And therefore, thro' the weary years alone,
Save with thy grief, which others could not own,
Thy life went on. Oh noblest of thy line!—
With titles that the world could never sound,—
While the full blaze of that disastrous star
Which rose upon thy bridal shone around,
Thy one poor lamp of love burned faint and far;
But now his splendor passes into shame,
And thy sweet faith is more than all his fame."

Here, then, shall we find the key to a great compensation in the sufferance of pain. Grief is a divine education of the soul. But with one proviso—that we profit by it, not squandering its high opportunities or perverting its high lessons. The proviso is all-important. For I do not find in grief any arbitrary or capricious thrusting of spiritual blessings into our hands. The compensations of sorrow in the increase of noble character depend absolutely on ourselves. I do not believe that sorrow is any such "blessing in disguise" as to bring a magical prosperity under the roof that harbors it. It is either a blessing or a curse,—which, depends on you. Fight it, and it will fight back, dealing worse blows than it receives. Welcome it, learn of it, profit by it, and no friend that ever sits at your fireside shall leave so grand a benediction. Misfortune ill-borne is doubly distilled disaster. Witness the poor men whom loss of property too often drives into the grave of the sot. We are free to make or mar. As in all else, so also in this. The pulpit prates much sentimental folly about the divine mission of sorrow. It is a diabolic mission, souring the temper, case-hardening the heart, corrupting and weakening the will, unless, by our reception of it, we recognize its natural uses and lessons. A disappointment may be the baffling of a life, unless we conquer it by wise and manly patience. Put your sorrows as compost about the roots of your virtues; cover them well with soil, lest they breed a pestilence in your neighborhood. If I pamper my affliction, pet it, make much of it, grow proud of it as a mark of distinction which ranks me among the aristocracy of poetic miseries,—and this foolishness is a mark of all young Byrons, whose vices soon breed misanthropy,—then I nourish a viper in my bosom, and warm my own ruin into activity. On ourselves alone it depends whether the great blow that stuns us shall paralyze our moral natures, or, after the first sharp agony, shall incite to nobler living. It takes a great blow sometimes to break into the charmed circle of our selfishness, and remind us of the great suffering world outside. There is no compensation for us, but unmitigated injury, in the catastrophes of life, unless we rise above them and put forth the divine energies of the soul. Make grief the provocative of purer aims, and you may yet hail it as your best and truest friend.

I hold it to be a truth of great import that, while grief ill-borne demoralizes and deteriorates, grief well-borne—borne with fortitude and patience and wisdom—yields the soul a bountiful harvest of compensations. Increased moral power is developed by this battle with pain. It is easy to surrender and give way to despair,—easy to complain and mope and forget the wants of the world in our own private misery,—easy to become so absorbed in the indulgence of our own emotions, that by degrees we lose the consciousness of high duty to mankind. But it is very hard to suppress the pain in our hearts, and pluck out of the wound the barb that has pierced us. Yet grief is disintegration of character, unless we subject it to this heroic treatment. Before the first outburst of the tempest we are overborne, and we inflict useless agony on ourselves if we choose to break rather than to bend. In a stern struggle with disaster, nevertheless, lies its only power to bless us in the end. The effort we must make, painful as it is, to get the mastery of our own souls. There is no sadder sight than to see one permanently crushed and broken in spirit under sorrow. And there is no grander spectacle than that of a free soul rising superior to evil, distilling honey, like the bees of Samarcand, out of poison and death. Vigor of will and nobility of character are to be learned nowhere but in the stern school of misfortune. I count it, in the last outcome of life's experience, the chief of all blessings to acquire that toughness of fibre, that rugged force of character, which it is the especial function of a manfully mastered grief to create. The prize, friends, is well worth the war. No man, no woman, who has plucked this moral safety from the nettle danger, will ever accuse Nature, or her universal laws, of malevolence or cruelty; but rather with a full heart will learn to thank the Infinite Power, whose dealings are so rough in semblance, for the profound, unspeakable tenderness that thus confers the sublimest of all spiritual benefits.

Nor is it only the reflex benefit to ourselves that demands acknowledgement of gratitude, when the first fury of the tempest is overpast. There is a freemasonry of sorrow which knits into a solemn fellowship all souls that have quaffed the cup of anguish,—a divine sympathy with kindred pains which soothes the hearts of those who are still in the agonies of conflict, and gives a power, nowise else to be won, of pouring oil and wine into the fresh wounds of our fellow-men. The mere presence of one who has fought and conquered is a mighty reinforcement to the novice in grief,—to the raw recruit hard-pressed in the terrors of his first battle. Is it no compensation for our own past pain, to have acquired the faculty of stilling the pain of others? Surely it is an ignoble soul that is unwilling thus to purchase the capacity of truest benefaction. The characters of men are never ripened into mellowness, until they have been watered with the gall of bitterness. Look at the persons whom you most deeply reverence; is there not a sweet and nameless grace about them, a spiritual beauty of expression, that testifies of secret struggles with sorrow? We are never initiated into the brotherhood of souls until we have been baptized with the baptism of blood,—consecrated by the universal sacrament of tears. The power of rendering the highest moral service to mankind is derived from these inward experiences of pain; that divine "enthusiasm of humanity" which is the key to all magnificent benefaction can be gained in no other school. What noble spirit will not rejoice to have learned the art of benediction, even though he must first pay its price in throes of spiritual distress? It is no wild fancy of mine, but the carefully deduced result of soberest experience, that the wise, victorious endurance of grief is our education into the noblest character,—our development into the capacity of loftiest usefulness to man. To me, this spiritual gain is compensation, yea, more than compensation, for the fiercest and intensest pangs. Grief will be to us precisely what we make it,—our divinest friend or our bitterest foe. But the supreme beneficence is surely vindicated, if, from the apparent harshness and roughness of Providence, we are thus able to extract an overbalancing good. Now, before distress overtakes us, we ought to fortify our souls against the storm; and the conviction that pain is not the infliction of malignity, but rather the opportunity of highest achievement, is surely the best fortification we could desire.

COOL.—A confident Millerite, meeting Parker just as he was leaving Emerson's house, said to him:—"Friend, do you know that the world is coming to an end next week?" Parker replied:—"Oh! that don't concern me; I live in Boston." Passing on, he saw Emerson, and asked the same question. Emerson's answer was:—"Well, let it come to an end; we can get along full as well without it."

PASSING EACH OTHER—TWO TENDENCIES.

[From the Radical.]

It is probable that the Old Unitarians and the Liberal Orthodox will meet and pass each other on the road. It is not likely that they will mingle as one. The fact that they are approaching each other does not imply their union. The one is moving down hill. The other is ascending. That they will encamp together on the hillside, as some predict, we are far from believing. Consider the difference between the two. The Old Unitarian has been, so to speak, through the mill; at least, he is decidedly of that opinion himself. He has had experience and knows whereof he speaks. He has, he thinks, looked over the mountains of Rationalism, and he declares that all beyond is a cold and dreary waste. He was, to be sure, at first, fired with an unpopular idea. It led him out from among his fellow-men; it nerved him up to a degree of heroism. He took up his cross. He became, in a measure, hated and despised. He served his truth. His way was apart and alone. He cared not for popular favor. He was in earnest. And for a brief season he was really and vitally connected with the movement of American emancipation. He was professedly a Rationalist. His views looked at in the present time do not appear at all startling. And perhaps they were never so in themselves considered. It was his position, his attitude towards tradition and authority, rather than "the new doctrine" he offered, that may have created most of the alarm. If you begin with reason, where will you stop? Reason was the arch enemy. It would lead to infidelity. Such was the prophecy. With this conviction in his mind came Lyman Beecher to Boston to annihilate Unitarianism.

Now the old issue has passed away. Apparently nobody cares very much whether there are three Gods or one revealed in Scripture. In fact, God has come to be of little importance in present discussion. Christ is the All in All. It may seem strange, but it is even so. Old Unitarians have somewhat to say of the Father; but the phrase awakens no special interest. You may let your speculations concerning God range to any limit, and you shall not lose caste. But if Christ be not confessed as a being of infinite perfections, your good standing as a Unitarian is not allowed. Yet, for the sake of your purse or of your influence in some direction, you may still be pressed to keep along with the denomination.

Thus time has wrought a change. Fifty years ago the Unitarian was toiling up the mountain, and his banner bore the one word, "God". To day, arrayed in purple and fine linen, he is travelling at his leisure down the road, and his banner displays the one word, "Christ." He is a Unitarian still, but his "Unity" has been transferred to the "Son." The "Father," as we have learned to say since the war, has been "mustered out of service."

The Old Unitarian will not admit this to be true. We do not speak from his confession. We only report the fact of his conduct as we see it. Doubtless he is not aware of the change. But the world looking on is likely to corroborate our testimony.

Now turn to the Liberal Orthodox. You are astonished to find how completely he is reversing the present action of the Old Unitarian. In the first place his face is turned to the summit. He has started on an upward march. He is drinking in the morning dew, and bracing himself with the morning air. He has awakened out of sleep. He has taken his departure from the camp of his fathers in the valley. His eyes and ears are open, his mind is alert. He is an inquirer, a seeker; he is filled with the prophecy of a new hope. He is in earnest. The times have changed, and he will not be persecuted now as he would have been formerly. But undoubtedly he has much to contend with. No matter. There is a might within him to conquer, and he has already lost the sense of fear.

What word is inscribed upon his banner? God? No. Neither God nor Christ. He has written there a new word. He has learned to say the word that is the inspiration of a new era. He does not realize his position; he does not yet see the vast import of the pledge he has given; but he has committed himself to a career as unlike that of his father before him as it well could be. His father wrought for God, for Jesus Christ; he will work for Man.

"Humanity!" This is the word he is inscribing upon his banner.

Undoubtedly he has much to say of Christ, of God. But now, God is for man, Christ is for man, even as the Sabbath is. He will glorify God by honoring man. His Christ is the human Jesus who went about doing good. The more he can make the humility of the Saviour shine, the more he finds his fellows ready to encourage him in his labor. In his mind's eye he no longer sees God as the awful judge seated on his throne; the humility of God is his theme; Deity condescends to dwell in the souls of men; he is the Friend, the Lover, the gentle Helper, who never forsakes nor leaves the sinner, but entrenches himself in every soul forever. God is revealed by Humanity.

We speak of tendencies. We anticipate results by observing the signs, by discovering what ideal impulse is driving men on.

At last it would seem that Orthodoxy itself has begun to learn the lesson it has repeated for hundreds of years from the life of its Lord: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, ye did it unto me." It catches the spirit of these words, and must go on to interpret them into the rational meaning of to-day. Its interest in humanity will be aroused for the sake of humanity. As we have said, the vast import of the change of feeling cannot be easily realized, even by those who share it. It involves a new intellectual process which will reveal an entirely different conception of God, of Man, and of Jesus. Who is God? What is God? Where is God? What is man, and what are his relations to God? How is man to elevate himself in the scale of being? These and similar questions have to be answered anew.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I have received the Prospectus of THE INDEX and also the first copy. We have a society organized here on the same plan as the Free Religious Association, and with views I believe identical with that. We read your discourse, published in THE INDEX, to-day, before our society, and it was pronounced the best thing of the kind we have had. We read the best lectures,—such as yours and other contributors to the Radical, before our society, beside original essays; yet it is the intention to deal principally with scientific subjects, and we believe in religion as a science. Our organization has been in existence nearly a year, and is gradually on the increase. We have read quite a number of Prof. Denton's lectures before the society and they are considered good. You may not want to know so much of us, still we would like to co-operate with you. I would like to see a grand demonstration next Spring, during 'Anniversary Week.' Should any of the 'big guns' East be coming West on lecturing tours, please make an effort to have them give us a call."

"My friend — sent me the first two numbers of your INDEX, and my spirit gladly bathed in a free atmosphere for a little while. Your action in the Syracuse Conference, the causes of your 'excommunication' in Dover, the clear height from which you spoke at the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association and still speak in THE INDEX, seem to me like so many pauses in a flight which is ever upward. May not the ground-robin take delight in the soaring of the eagle, at least as far as she can follow it with her eye? Your free utterances must give wings to many a spirit, and gladden even while they sadden those whose action cannot be so outspoken as yours, because fettered by circumstances. I am convinced that some Free Religionists, perhaps many, may be so situated that it is best for them to be quiet except when compelled to speak. Nevertheless, they may be the very ones who most enjoy your happy freedom. May it never be circumscribed!"

"I received your Prospectus and like its direct, clear-ringing and unequivocal tone. But do not fall into the same mistake that many of our 'liberal' friends seem to be laboring under, for surely if 'Orthodoxy' is not essential to salvation, neither is the denunciation of Orthodoxy or avowal of more or less of Heresy essential to salvation. Some of our liberal friends seem to think the latter the one great essential; and hence they become no more truly liberal than some, the best, of our Orthodox friends. It seems to me time to let all that alone, while we pursue our own independent inquiries conscientiously, earnestly and undisturbed."

"THE INDEX has arrived and it seems to have the right ring to it. Dr. Hedge will find that wherever miracles are disbelieved, Christianity is disbelieved, and always will be. The very idea of Christianity is only conceived in miracle. Miracle is in the Christian confession. Christ taught men to live by miracle (6th chapter Matt.) Almost the last words Christ said to his disciples were, that the believers on him should be known to be so by their professing miraculous powers. How will he come on earth again to judge it, otherwise than by miracle?... Thousands upon thousands would rise to activity, if they thought there was any chance for a rational religion to gain a foot-hold among us."

"Have read your address and enjoyed it much. Find but one thing to question in it. Am I to infer from the unqualified way in which you say in the paragraph headed 'Testimony of Jesus,' 'It is in the first gospel and not in the fourth, that Jesus says,' etc., that you consider that a verbatim report, or make no allowance for probable distortions of his speech by Jewish writers?"

"Having read three numbers of THE INDEX I do not like to miss the fourth, but for some reason it failed to reach me last week. Please send a copy. I take pleasure in adding another subscriber to your list. Enclosed find two dollars and send the paper, beginning with the first number, to —. The boldness and candor of THE INDEX seem to command the respect of all parties."

"I enclose to you four dollars for which please send your paper to —. I like what you propose in your paper and shall be greatly interested in following your thought as you attempt to solve the religious problems which so crowd upon us in this thinking age. With my best wishes for your success."

"I have been anxiously looking for you for some time, and this day saw a notice of you in the Independent, and hope you are the person looked for. Here find a dollar, for which send me THE INDEX; send till it runs out."

"I shall be glad to have your paper, because I wish to know what you are doing and thinking, even if I do not agree very closely with you in the latter. One thing about it I like, the position you have taken, as with your views it seems to me the only honest and consistent one. I don't know what business men have in Christian pulpits who don't believe in Christianity. I don't see how they can honestly call themselves Christians when they reject everything peculiar to Christ's system. Either I am a disciple of Christ or I am not, and I am content to stand on one side of the line or the other. I hope sometime your searching and experience in life will enable you to find more in Christianity than you now find. But you must see what you can see. Whether you see more or less than I do, I am content to wait, and let time and eternity tell the result."

"If I accepted your definition of Christianity, I should accept your conclusion as well. But I hold that definition to be a mistake. What matters it that that definition is the popular one? It is not for that reason correct. If others, in their blindness, have mistaken the letter for the spirit, why should I on that account hesitate to prefer the spirit to the letter? I choose to define Christianity, not by what is local and individual in its history, but by what is spiritual and permanent; and on this ground I hold that we Radicals, of all the people in the world, have the best right to call ourselves Christians. But I respect your judgment and commend you for your independence; and I am quite willing to believe that Providence has called you to a work of which your position is an indispensable condition. I therefore bid you God speed in your labors."

Poetry.

BY THE SEA.

Dark loom the crags that gird the seething bay;
The thievish moon, Prometheus of the sky,
Hoards miserly her ravished gains on high,
And doles reluctant forth a niggard ray.
God! how the mad winds lash the indignant sea!
Like lion chafed, it roars against the stars,
And leaps in fury on the prison bars
That curb the fierceness of its sovereignty.
Hark to the smothered booming of the waves,
Deep in the bowels of yon dripping rocks!
Like jaws of Cerberus, hungry-yawning caves
Stretch wide their armed throats, and wait the shocks
Of surges black, that threatening onward come,
But routed back retreat in floods of froth and foam.

The Index.

MARCH 12, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

In our issue of Feb. 19, we mentioned that "a certain Dr. Barnard" had taken subscriptions for THE INDEX in Michigan, which we had never received; and we warned the public against paying them to "persons not known to be responsible." We regret exceedingly that we innocently did injustice to a very worthy man. Dr. L. E. Barnard, of Battle Creek, Michigan, at the suggestion of a mutual friend, very kindly interested himself, without our knowledge, in obtaining several subscriptions for us very early in January; and one of the subscribers wrote to us on Jan. 24, complaining of not having received the paper. We waited more than three weeks longer, and then published the paragraph referred to. But the cause of the delay was, that Dr. Barnard had meanwhile lost his dwelling-house by fire, and in the confusion and anxiety of such a calamity forgot to forward the money. Before he saw the paragraph, however, he wrote us a very kind letter, enclosing the money and explaining the delay. We wish to make the fullest amends possible for our unfortunate mistake, although we cannot justly be blamed for it under the circumstances; and we state accordingly that Dr. Barnard is henceforth authorized to act as our agent, in collecting subscriptions for THE INDEX. We are not only completely satisfied with his explanation, but feel deeply pained that so annoying a notice on our part should have followed close on the heels of a great domestic disaster. Nothing but a sense of duty to the public induced us to give the warning; and we rejoice to find it utterly needless.

The Fifteenth Amendment is adopted, and needs only to be formally proclaimed to become part of the organic law of the land. Manhood Suffrage has triumphed—the triumph of Humanity Suffrage is so much the nearer. Henceforth Uncle Sam will be unable to tell the difference between white and black,—not because he cannot see it, but because he sees through it. So long, however, as he perceives the duality of male and female rather than the unity of humanity, he sees double, and justifies suspicion of his soberness. It is time for the Sixteenth Amendment.

A brave and generous man has passed away,—another of those heroes of the Great Rebellion whom it is a sacred duty for all who knew him to bear gratefully in mind. Lion-like in courage, yet woman-like in modesty and gentleness, he will not soon be forgotten.

"In Rollinsford [N. H.], Feb. 16, AUGUSTUS W. ROLLINS, aged 38 years, late Colonel of the 7th N. H. Regiment.

"Thus another brave, high-minded man, just in the prime of his manhood, has yielded his life, a victim upon the altar of his country. Possessed of a fine figure with manly beauty, pleasing address, and a most amiable disposition, he was the idol of his friends and universally beloved by his superior officers and companions in arms. The exposures of the battle-field, from his bravery and fidelity to his country, broke down his vigorous constitution, and caused a gradual failing of his health since his return home. This is not the place, neither will we presume, to lift the veil from sorrow so sacred, nor to offer unavailing words of sympathy for such a loss. This only we may say to his beloved kinsmen, and to his generous and kind-hearted friends, that if they mourn over the untimely grave, they have at least the consolation that they could not have made a more precious offering in a purer or holier cause. His dying hours were cheered by the tender solicitude of his relatives and devoted friends. Com."

Various inquiries have been addressed to us concerning the publication of the lectures now being delivered in the Horticultural Hall Course, Boston. None of them, so far as we know, has yet been published in full; but we understand that Field, Osgood & Co. propose to print them all in a volume at an early day.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The promised communication from Mr. Wm. H. Herndon, of Springfield, Illinois, the well-known friend and law-partner of President Lincoln, has been received, and will be published in our issue of April 2. Describing as it does the religious belief of Mr. Lincoln, and giving new and authentic information on this subject, it is a document of great historical value, and can hardly fail to arrest the attention of the whole American people. It shows that, like many of the greatest men of the Revolution, Mr. Lincoln was not, in the proper sense of the word, a "Christian," and that "Christianity" is not essential to goodness, if he is to be accounted a good man.

In view of the great demand which will undoubtedly be made for copies of this issue of THE INDEX, we shall be prepared to furnish them at the following rates:—

For less than fifty copies, the usual rate of five cents per copy will be charged. Orders should be sent in immediately, as the size of the edition will depend on the number ordered, and it may be impossible to fill them if delayed.

THE "ENTHUSIASM OF HUMANITY."

The Unitarian Society of this city, which was organized last autumn by the withdrawing members of the Independent Society, gave an Oyster Supper last week, the net proceeds of which, amounting to $110 16, besides a number of baskets of unused provisions, have been presented to the Orphan's Home in this place. It is with the greatest pleasure that we record this generous donation. If, instead of quarreling with each other, the churches of Christendom should enter with enthusiasm into a rivalry of good works, and cease to labor for merely denominational or "society" interests, they would prove themselves indeed friends of mankind. It was a hope that the National Unitarian Conference would devote itself to such work as this, which drew many earnest radicals to its early sessions; and it was the disappointment of this hope that made them turn away at last in sadness. If the Conference had rejected its dogmatic preamble and devoted itself to humane, not "Christian," work, it would have done more to perpetuate the Christian name itself than it can ever do now. By cleaving to a creed, and refusing to take up the task of turning into practical philanthropic channels the great stream of religious energy and enthusiasm, it threw away the last chance of identifying Christianity with undogmatic religion. Dogmatism is doomed, and it dooms whatever body clings to it. The time will come when the fatal mistake of New York and Syracuse will be deeply rued by the Unitarian leaders. The issue between Christianity and Free Religion might have been for an indefinitely long period postponed; now it is fairly raised, and cannot be evaded. Sacrificing humanity to Christianity, the Conference did but precipitate an issue which it would gladly have escaped.

If the American Unitarian Association desires to serve the cause of Christianity effectually, let it do as the Unitarian Society of Toledo has done, and devote its funds to something better than propagandism,—let it stop building up a sect, and begin to build up the true welfare of mankind.

Unless Christianity shall cease to care first and last for its own interests,—unless it shall speedily redeem the grand opportunity which it flung away at New York and Syracuse,—its hold on the heart of the people will be soon lost forever. Free Religion has no sectarian ambition to serve, no ecclesiastical schemes to carry out, no theological system to propagate; it aims solely at the universal welfare of man, and it has only words of hearty sympathy for ALL who labor to secure it. The petty jealousies and selfish squabbles of the sects it holds in supreme contempt; but it rejoices in every true and noble work they undertake, and stands ready to co-operate with any or all of them in making men better, freer, and happier. It cares for nothing but this—the real good of mankind. O Christian Church! if you would live forever, abandon your mean ambitions, and FORGET YOURSELF IN THE CAUSE OF MAN.

CHURCH AND STATE.

We commend the subjoined to the careful consideration of our readers:—

"The following call has been issued:—

"The Constitution of the United States makes no acknowledgement of Almighty God, the Author of national existence; nor of Jesus Christ, who is the Ruler of nations; nor of the Bible, which is the fountain of law and good morals as well as of religion. This has, from the beginning, been a deep matter of regret. It may have been an oversight; but it was, and is, both an error and evil. It does not reflect the views of the great majority of the people upon these great matters. It dishonors God. It is inconsistent with the character of nearly all our State constitutions, and with all the precedents of our early history. It has introduced, or furthered, views and measures which are now struggling for a baneful ascendancy in State and national politics; such as, that civil government is only a social compact; that it exists only for secular and material, not for moral ends; that Sabbath laws are unconstitutional; and that the Bible must be excluded from our public schools. It is easy to see that laws for the prevention of intemperance, blasphemy, impurity, or cruelty may be objected to on the same grounds. And, indeed, we may expect that law itself will be defined to be the mere advice of the majority, with no proper penalty but the disapprobation of the public. The National Association, which has been formed for the purpose of securing such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will remedy this great defect and indicate that we are a Christian nation, invite all American citizens who favor such an amendment, without distinction of party or creed, to meet in convention in Pittsburg, on Thursday, the third day of March next, at 2 o'clock P. M.

"Among the signers to the call are Governor McClurg, of Missouri; Judge McCandless, of the United States District Court at Pittsburg; Bishop Huntington, of Central New York; Bishop Kerfoot, of Pittsburg; Bishop Eastburn, of Massachusetts; the Rev. C. G. Finney, late President of Oberlin College, O.; the Rev. J. Blanchard, President of Wheaton College, Ill."

This movement, taken in connection with the Sunday question, the Bible-in-schools question, the Sharswood decision in Pennsylvania, &c., shows that the conflict between Christianity and Free Religion bids fair to become an important political issue. It is extremely unlikely that any immediate results will follow this crazy convention; but the question whether we have an established religion or not, will have to be ultimately settled at the polls. The sects are all tending to a union on the basis of simple adhesion to Christianity; the friends of religious liberty will yet be obliged to act together, in defence of their great principle. Is it not plain to all persons of acuteness and insight, that the antagonism between Christianity (notwithstanding the great truths it inculcates, which are in no sense peculiar to it) and civil freedom is becoming more and more imperative in its demands on public attention? The Romish Church, by its foolhardy defiance of the American system of free, unsectarian education, is doing much to bring the great question into politics; and it is high time for the liberals of the country to assert their principles in unmistakable terms. Whoever expects this question to be settled without a bitter contest, gives little proof of foresight or knowledge of human nature. There is a BATTLE to be fought, every whit as fierce and perhaps as prolonged, as that between freedom and slavery; and we give these Christian reactionists fair warning that the first organized political action to introduce Christianity into the Constitution of the United States will be the signal for a struggle of which they little foresee the consequences.

He who makes a friend of life will find no foe in death.

CHRISTIANITY AND REFORM.

[From the Anti-Slavery Standard.]

Addresses upon the "Relation of Christianity to Reform," under the auspices of the Reform League, of this city (New York), will be given by Wendell Phillips, Julia Ward Howe and Rev. William Henry Channing, in Steinway Hall—on the Sunday evening following the Commemorative Meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society. Lucretia Mott will also be in attendance, and, it is hoped, will address the meeting.

A BRAVE DEED.—On New Year's eve in St. Gall (Switzerland) a house suddenly took fire, and commenced burning with great fury. The inmates fled, and forgot in their terror a little girl. But her brother, a schoolboy, came running back, rushed through the flames and returned safe with his little sister on his arm. His comrades of the school of the canton, proud of their schoolmate, collected forthwith a hundred francs and deposited them to the credit of brother and sister in the savings' bank. The name of the brave boy is Bammeli.—Nachricht aus Deutschland und der Schweiz.

A CORRECTION.

LAWRENCE, Kansas, 16th Feb. 1870.

Rev. F. E. Abbot, Editor of The Index:

DEAR SIR:—As one of the members of the small, hastily-called meeting, held in the fall of 1868, in New York, which you dignify with the name of "a caucus of radicals," I feel called on to deny your assertion that the radicals "agreed that they would not attack the Preamble, lest they should lose their positions." No such unworthy motive actuated those present at that "caucus." Messrs. J. May, O. B. Frothingham, and others will, I am sure, bear me out in my assertion. I gave my views of the action of the Conference in The Radical, a month or two afterwards. Those views remain unchanged, by all you so candidly and strongly advanced against them. If I, with others far wiser, have fallen into error, we are only where you were at Syracuse, and you must leave change in us to time and argument, not meanwhile slandering us.

Having said so much by way of protest, let me very heartily thank you for your many good words of positive truth.

Sincerely yours,

WM. SHARMAN.

[The above has been unavoidably delayed by our recent absence. It gives us great pleasure to be corrected in our misapprehension, which rested, however, on the direct testimony of persons who were present. Nothing could be further from our intention than to "slander" any one; and on Mr. Sharman's authority we cheerfully retract the "assertion" complained of, although it was first made in the Radical for February, 1869, and has remained hitherto uncontradicted. We should be glad, as the case now stands, to receive a statement of the true reasons for the position taken by the radicals at that meeting.—ED.]

CONSERVATIVE AND RADICAL POLICY.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The Liberal Christian, in its issue of Feb. 26, contains an article entitled "Harmony in the National Conference," which, as emanating from the highest authority, may be significant of the feeling and indicative of the policy entertained by no small or influential portion of the "Conservative Unitarians." There is a strong difference of opinion in commanding quarters, as is evident from a piece in the same paper, written by Rev. R. L. Collier, who appears to be in favor of stringent definition, and a policy founded thereon. This difference, for the present, we pass by, to comment on the article itself. The writer of it, whom we presume to be Dr. Bellows, being touched and impressed by the peace and pleasantness that prevailed at the recent meeting of the "New York and Hudson River Conference," indulges in the hope that a similar harmony may rule in the "National Conference," making it possible for both sides to meet in friendly council and join in hearty co-operation, remanding discussion on doctrinal differences to other more private occasions, or allowing them to sleep altogether. He recalls the fact of a common speculative lineage, a partnership in famous names and noble principles, a sympathetic cast of mind and character, a mutual respect, appreciation and love, personal attachments and intimacies, an equal interest in great social reforms, and questions of deep practical moment; and in view of them all, foreshadows a policy of reconciliation.

The article, we are persuaded, comes from the heart. We acquit it cordially of all duplicity, dishonesty, disingenuousness, and as heartily credit it with an affectionate and sincere desire that a deeper chord of brotherhood in thought and work may be struck. But while we give our warm testimony to the aim and spirit of the article, we are compelled to dissent from the policy it would inaugurate; to dissent, not in a tone of distrust, or defiance, or captious criticism, but in a temper that would consider candidly the best, because the most efficacious course of action for both parties.

That both Conservatives and Radicals, "Liberal Christians" and "Free Religionists," have in view the same ultimate objects, may be freely admitted. They both desire the elevation of personal character and the moral improvement of society; they both pray that God's Kingdom may come on the earth, in contradistinction from those who desire to save mankind from a future Hell. But the means by which either party hopes to attain this ultimate object are so different, and all organized associations necessarily make so much account of means, that it is hard to see how they can to any advantage confer together. The Unitarians are persuaded that without faith in "historical Christianity," in the church as a divine institution, in Jesus Christ as a specially endowed and sent Redeemer, little or nothing of an effective, positive character can be done to tone up humanity, either in individuals or in society. Something like this, under one or another definition, is their conviction. The conviction is deliberate and honest. They have a perfect right to entertain it, to avow it, to come to an understanding about it, to unite upon it, to declare that they prefer the active professional fellowship of those, and only those, who are in accord with them on this matter. To call them bigots or creedmongers for doing this, is wholly unfair and illegitimate. It is unjust to charge them with exclusiveness, narrowness or uncharitableness. They are simply trying to do their work in their own way, which is the only way of doing it that they can engage in.

The Free Religionists, on the other hand, are persuaded that human nature, whether in individuals or communities, needs emancipation from the stress of these especial beliefs in historical Christianity, the Church, the inspired Word, the exceptional character and rank of Jesus Christ. They feel that these articles are at present not helping, perhaps arresting, personal and social development; and, feeling this, they seek to remove the impression of their particular importance, and to transfer faith from them to the soul's well accredited instincts, to the dictates of Reason, to the ascertained requirements of the moral Law, and to the intelligent convictions of Duty, the mother of all virtues and graces who, by universal consent of thoughtful people, sits throned and crowned in the heavenly places of the human heart. This belief of theirs, too, is deliberate and honest. They have come to it naturally, as they think, inevitably. It is not strange that they should rally round it, and in the spirit of it, do their part of the work of enlightening mankind.

These being the views, and such, consequently, being the attitudes of the two parties, we cannot see the advantage of their remaining together in the Conference, or keeping up any show of professional fellowship. We hold it best that they shake hands and part, in mutual respect and love. There is no reason why either should reflect on the other's honesty or earnestness, why there should be any accusations of improper motive, unfair dealing or disloyal affection. The "Unitarians" certainly are not to be blamed for desiring that the public should understand what they believe, or for wishing to be uncompromised by association with opinions they regard with dread. The Free Religionists do but act as self-respect, honor, and courtesy dictate, when they withdraw from organized connection with men who can get on better without them, and without whom they can better get along.

The question at issue is a plain one. Let the ministers and people decide, if they can, under which flag they can do most whole-souled battle. Then, having chosen the flag and given in the allegiance, let the battle against ignorance, error, superstition, iniquity, go on. Let both sides spend ammunition on the enemy, and cease to waste it on each other. Let each rejoice in what the other is doing, when it honorably can. Let each welcome the other's victory, when it is clearly victory of a larger idea over a smaller, a better principle over a worse, humanity over diabolism and the beast. Let there be two treasuries, two commissariats, two plans of campaign, two staffs of officers; and as there can be but one Supreme Leader, let him be the Spirit of Truth.

FREE RELIGION.

Much has been said and written of late, in reference to the propriety and expediency of liberal thinkers dropping the name Christian. At first sight, one would suppose expediency the only argument that could be raised in opposition; yet there are those who believe, or profess to believe, that all grades of believers, even such as reject revealed religion, can be comprehended under this term with propriety. To us, this appears the height of absurdity. How can one who rejects nearly every theological dogma of Jesus Christ still persist in being called a Christian? Is it not utterly inconsistent? Can another parallel be found? Do such as believe the Prophet of Islam to have been but an average man call themselves Mahometans? Did the disciples of Nicholas Kopernik still retain the Ptolemaic name? Do men call themselves Spencerites who reject the theory of Evolution? Are men called Darwinites who doubt the theory of Development? The answer is plain. Men are rarely found so radically inconsistent. Why, then, make a distinction with the doctrine of Jesus? Why call those Christians, or Jesuites, who disbelieve what Jesus of Nazareth taught? Can we be Platonists, and reject Plato's philosophy? Can we be Calvinists, and deny the doctrinal theories of Calvin? But I hear one say, "I accept Jesus' doctrine of love and mercy, and only reject his claims to divinity." Very well, but then you are not a Christian, or Jesuite. Can one be a Comtist, and reject a portion of Comte's philosophy? Can one be a Darwinite, by accepting all of Darwin's scientific deductions except development? I accept, joyfully, some of the beautiful doctrines of Jesus, but reject all of his superstitious theories, including Supernaturalism; hence I am not a Christian. This does not constitute me a Christian, any more than to accept some of Darwin's views, would make me a Darwinite. It is the adoption of fundamental theories that constitutes discipleship, and no one can deny that the Messiahship of Jesus was his first and last great theory. Then why shrink from the truth? The great secret, after all, of this peculiar sensitiveness, on the part of some of our liberals, is moral cowardice. Unbelievers in Jesus, the Christ, can easily see their inconsistency, but the great bugbear of public prejudice comes up like an apparition before them, and the result is, they deny themselves. Leaving this out of consideration, it is certainly unjust to real, bona fide Christians, to teach the humanity of Jesus Christ under cover of Christianity. Let us be generous to the theologians. We are clearly outside of Christianity, and should be frank enough to admit it. By fair dealing, we shall lose nothing, and gain everything.

Natural Religion is beautiful, and suggests a nobler field of labor than the contracted theology of Christianity, but charity should be a prominent trait with us. There is great truth in the remark of Herbert Spencer, that under every form of religion there lies, at least, one fundamental verity, and each form serves as a sort of protective envelope, without which the truth-germ would perish. We stand, manifestly, at the head of all these; and as we move along, let us beckon kindly to such as tarry conscientiously by the wayside.

"In Faith and Hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is Charity."

PINE PLAINS, Feb. 27, 1870.

MEXICO.

Of all European nations the Spaniards are most devoted to principle. They reject all accommodation and expediency. They are logical and consistent in their actions. Having accepted Christianity, they have not been rationalists, but devout men of faith, persecuting heretics for the glory of God, conforming their lives to their religion, not to their reason. The American Indian has the same character, in even a higher degree. There is no slavishness in him, no calculation of numbers, but war to the knife until he obtains justice. The Mexicans, composed of these two races, are the only people on earth that prefer anarchy to a government that they do not approve of. Having accepted the republicanism of Jefferson and other free thinkers, as the true principle, they will have absolute freedom or anarchy. Divided into the Church party and the party of freedom, there has been no compromise, but battle handed down from generation to generation. The Liberals have made steady progress, and have now nearly accomplished success. Anarchy must eventually give place to liberty. Their country has the best position and the greatest natural advantages in the world; and their greatness as a nation in the coming time, when evil principles shall give way to liberty and justice, is sure. But we Americans, descended from the races of northern Europe, have a limit to our greatness in our character. The expediency-philosophy is too much for us, and will surely check, though but for a time, our moral growth. Now that the old politics are dead, the signs of the times are unmistakable. Our Wendell Phillipses are wishing for a "strong government;" they "would rather be citizens of Paris and have all their actions regulated by a paternal government, than be citizens of Boston." Mill thinks that barbarians have no rights. [?] Tyndall, Carlyle, Tennyson, would like slavery for negroes, cooleyism for Chinamen, despotism for Hindoos, "strong government" for the Irish and Toryism for Englishmen. Only a small minority of Americans would prefer anarchy to a compromise with paternal government. In Mexico only is the real battle between Freedom and Despotism. When we have failed, Liberty will still have a strong fortress left that will never be taken.

TIT FOR TAT.

BY T. J. MOORE.

MR. EDITOR:—The Rev. "Penholder," of Chicago, a correspondent of the N. Y. Independent, in his late letter reviewing your position as laid down in THE INDEX, says (referring to the thieves, robbers, and murderers of Chicago and the Five Points)—"I am afraid your faith in man would fail here." (Query. Sir, has your "faith in Christ," and your preaching and teaching in Sunday Schools, and your Young Men's Christian Association prayer meetings, and tracts, succeeded in saving them?)

Again he says:—"Thirty-six criminals, ironed and chained, are just being stowed into omnibuses to start for Joliet." Well, what has that to do with Mr. Abbot's being an Infidel? He does not preach in Chicago, and you do.

Again he says:—"The noted Handy Andy, only twenty-one years old and of respectable parents (?) was sentenced for ten years." Of course his respectable family must be believers, or Penholder would not have called them respectable.

Lastly he says:—"The whole fraternity of scoundrelism is terrified and enraged." The Rev. "Penholder" evidently intends to make the world believe that the whole "fraternity of scoundrelism" are infidels. Now I will lay a wager of any amount that nine-tenths of all the thieves, robbers, murderers, and prostitutes of Chicago are believers in all your fundamental doctrines of Christianity.

What was the verdict of the Christian examination of the inmates of John Allen's dance house in New York? It was that "all were believers, and most of the females had been instructed in orthodox Sunday Schools."

And in corroboration of this statement is the fact, that, when prayer meetings were held there, all (or nearly all of them) went down on their knees and sought for mercy at your throne of grace. Even old John himself went down, and he and nearly all the inmates were hopefully (?) converted!! Now had he or they been infidels, they would not have got on their knees at an orthodox prayer meeting. This trick of Christians attempting to palm off as infidels all their thieves, liars, robbers, prostitutes, and murderers, won't win. It is "too late in the day." "Penholder" wants Mr. Abbot to try his "faith in man" at the Five Points. I want to have him try his "faith in Christ" on the "fraternity of scoundrelism" in Chicago and Joliet, and to give it (his faith in Christ) a test. I suggest that he shall send his Christian brother, Prof. S. C. Bartlett, down to Joliet and let him preach his sermon on Election as it is contained in the Congregational Review, and let him tell the culprits that "under this broader plan God had eternally purposed, to renew, sanctify and save a part only of mankind," and also let him further state to them that, "as a part of the same broad (!) plan, God has eternally purposed" (be sure that he tells the poor deluded criminals that the decree was eternal), "to leave another portion of mankind freely to reject him and be lost;" and if this "precious and glorious" preaching doesn't reclaim them, it will be a wonder.

Now, Mr. "Penholder," if you will have Bro. Bartlett go down and preach this "glorious and precious" (this is what the Rev. Lyman Beecher called it) doctrine to them, and it should convert, say, half of them, I will engage that Bro. Abbot shall go down and preach his 'faith in man' to them and convert the other half into vastly better men than Prof. B.'s converts. (Come, what say you? Let us be up and doing. Infidelity is spreading.

Mr. Editor, I cannot close this letter without again referring to the "glorious and precious" doctrine of Election, and what adds to its preciousness is the fact that it is the true Bible doctrine.

Yours for truth and a rational religion,

T. J. MOORE.

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?

Were I to ask the Papist this question, his answer would be, the Pope, the Roman Church is Christianity. Or, were the question put to a Methodist, the answer would be, Methodism. The question put to a Unitarian, and the answer is, Unitarianism. And so of all the different sects in Christendom. The answer is, Christianity is what each one makes it by his belief in mediumistic "revelations."

Put this question to the author of Luke's Gospel, and the answer is the same; hence his record of "those things most surely believed." By "those things" he refers to mediumistic revelations.

This question being put to Jesus himself, we find exactly the same answer, when he says, "God hath revealed it unto thee." Peter had avowed his belief, that Jesus was the Messiah; and Jesus says that faith was not human, it was not from "flesh and blood," it was a revelation made in him by miracle, by the special act of God. It is, therefore, a belief in mediumistic revelations that makes Christianity. Jesus was a medium between God and man. So was Moses, who said—"I stand between the Lord and you."

Christianity is the faith which is exercised in mediumistic revelations.

Now I put the question to some of the foremost Liberal Christians of the present day—to Rev. James Freeman Clarke, and he says:—

"Christ accepts the great prophetic idea of a Messiah who brings down God's reign into this life. It is the New Jerusalem coming down from God out of Heaven. It is the earth full of the knowledge of God as the waters cover the sea. It is all mankind laboring together for this general good."

I put this question to Rev. Henry Blanchard, and here is his answer:—

"I accept Jesus as the world's greatest teacher."

Next I ask that good man, whom I heard Theodore Parker call "the silver-tongued orator," a man educated in the New England orthodox faith, and he says:—

"Christianity is the highest form of moral force ever known."

And now comes the main question. Is the highest moral force in human nature, or outside of it? Is it developed by human culture from the Love Relations, or is an exotic, a mediumistic "revelation," something added to man which does not come from the development of his true manhood?

Let me see now, if the following postulates are not correct:

1. All we know of Christianity is what we learn from human life. But human conduct, human hope, love and faith, are not to be accounted for by the difference in human brains. Is it not so? What Christian will attempt to show that the difference in the civilization of Hindus and Americans are not to be satisfactorily accounted for by the cerebral developments of these two nationalities? Compare one nation with another, and you will find that this civilization always corresponds with cerebral developments, without any regard to mediumistic revelations.

2. It cannot be made to appear from historical data, that Christianity has been most successful in uniting the human family in efforts for the greatest good of all. Far from this. As to the number of converts, Buddhism and Confucius have been more successful than Jesus or Christianity. And moreover, there have certainly been far more mediumistic discords in Christendom than have ever been known in India, China or any other form of Religion the world over. The greatest moral force is in the brains of the most enlightened people, and this, too, in despite of the superstition which results from mediumistic revelations.

3. The history of Christendom disproves this assumption in respect to the moral force of mediumistic revelations. Look at Italy, Spain, Mexico, South America, Ireland, and all of those nations where Christianity has been dominant. Look at the country where Christianity had its birth, and where this "highest moral force" ought to have made some demonstrations during the past eighteen hundred years. Were it true, as Mr. Phillips assumes, we should find the "highest types of civilization" in Jerusalem and Rome!

4. Were Christianity such a moral force as is assumed, it would be found working its miracles without human brains, without the "flesh and blood," as was said by Jesus. And so, wherever Christianity has been preached, there, surely, we should find its moral force demonstrated. Christianity assumes that it was "revealed" for this very purpose of working miracles in multiplying its converts. But its success falls below every other form of religion outside of Christianity. In this respect Jesus has failed in his mission.

When speaking of Christianity, therefore, why only call it a "moral force?" Why not call it a "belief," a "faith" merely in mediumistic revelations? This is the idea, the thing meant. The more faith, the more Christian, the more Mormon "revelations." The more faith the more miracles, more witchcraft, more devil, even. Is there, can there be, any "revelations" without faith? And does not Christianity itself inform us, that it was nothing more nor less than faith that gave to Jesus the power to work miracles?

And for the lack of this faith we are doomed to everlasting punishment. Hence Christianity is the subjugation of the human will, it is a condition of servility, you must wear a "yoke," you must not follow your own highest judgment.

Notice, also, what a very potent principle this mediumistic faith evidently is; by it we can "remove mountains," wither "fig trees," and "raise the dead." By faith Mr. Clarke can make a Messiah of Jesus; and by faith he "brings down" (from on high, we suppose) "God's reign upon earth." And so it is evident that without faith in mediumism God could never get "down to earth." And by his faith Mr. Clarke "fills this whole earth" with his own notions of things, "as the waters cover the sea." Nor do I see why a Buddhist might not say the same, and be a Buddhist still.

It is by this potent principle of faith that Mr. Blanchard sees in a medium of former days the "greatest teacher this world ever had," or perhaps ever will have: a medium who was so much deceived by his own faith that he really believed he had seen the devil fall like lightning from the sky, and who, in his teachings, interfered with the relations of life by enjoining hatred of relatives. Out of these relations come all we know of authority for virtue, and it was characteristic, certainly, of mediumism for this authority to be ignored by Jesus, as it has been by numerous other mediumistic teachers in ages past. But as to this "greatest of teachers" seeing the devil fall from the sky, it may be readily admitted that it required very large mediumistic eyes to see a sight like that.

And so it is:—

"Faith lends its realizing light,
The clouds disperse, the shadows fly,
The invisible appears in sight
And God is seen by mortal eye."

Mediumistic eyes see an invisibility, they can see anything within the range of credulity.

Notwithstanding these facts, which it might be supposed all would see, (as they would, perhaps, but for the spell of mediumism), we hear men talk of obligations to Christianity for our civilization! The adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment to our National Constitution is referred to as the greatest triumph ever known of Christian civilization. As if the love of freedom were not an instinctive principle in the "flesh and blood" (referred to by Jesus), which does not recognize mediumism as its authority or the source of its existence. The love of freedom was always opposed by Christianity, while it is an instinctive tendency of humanity, and truly the "highest moral force ever known"—older than Jesus; older than all creeds, or mediumistic revelations from another world.

QUINCY, Mass., Feb. 22, 1870.

MR. PHILLIPS ON MOBS.

[From the Newburyport Herald.]

Mr. Phillips, in his lecture before the Lyceum, in speaking of the failure of republican institutions in great cities, said that he had rather live in Paris and have all his rights and duties prescribed for him by the government, and enjoy the personal safety and social tolerance of that city, than to live in Boston. The danger from mob violence seems to him greater than that from the whole power of the government. In Boston Mr. Garrison was dragged through the streets by a rope, thirty-four years ago; but for many years after he published a paper in Boston, in which he advocated sentiments very offensive to a majority of its citizens at the time. Within three years a subscription has been raised to make Mr. Garrison above the fear of want for the rest of his life. In France men whose opinions are obnoxious to the ruling powers are fined, imprisoned and banished. Victor Hugo would rather live in Paris than in Boston, but he has not been permitted to live there. Rochefort's paper is suppressed, and he is himself fined and imprisoned. Victor Noir is shot for his opposition to the government. This does not look like greater toleration of opinion and greater security than that which is enjoyed in Boston, even by Mr. Garrison. If republicanism is a failure in our large cities, imperialism is a failure both in city and in country.

A noble act is told of Dr. Weiss, the late Bishop of Romish Bavaria. He often lent money to people in straitened circumstances, sometimes as high as a thousand florins. About six weeks before his death he returned to all of his debtors, by mail, their due-bills.—Nachricht aus Deutschland und der Schweiz.

ANOTHER LOOK AT FREE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS IN INDIA.

The Hindu Reformer, published at Bombay, contains in the issue for January 15th, an editorial article, enclosed in lines of mourning, to the memory of a native religious teacher, Anandashram Swami, who for a number of years has been devoting himself, with great zeal and self-sacrifice, to moral and religious reform, and to the general welfare of his fellow-countrymen, and who has recently met his death while still engaged in this benevolent work, in one of the provinces of Northern India. He does not appear to have been a member of the new Theistic sect, the Brahmo Somaj, but found opportunity, as a preacher in one of the holy orders of the Hindu faith, for the beneficent mission he had at heart. And his career is therefore additional testimony to the openness of India to religious reformation, which shall bring with it social and civil improvement, and to the power there is in the old religion to free itself from superstitions and abuses. The truth is, the universal elements of religion, those elements that are found to be the same in all the great faiths of the world, are to-day everywhere asserting themselves, and are casting off into decay and oblivion those specific and local beliefs which have kept the religions distinct. The tendency is now to find the sympathies of the different religions,—the points where they touch, and run into, and mutually support each other; those features which point backward to a common origin and descent, and forward to the consummation of religious unity in the actual recognition of human equality and brotherhood. The primary, moral, and spiritual sentiments are the same the world over, however differently developed and applied; and people are beginning to see that progress lies in finding and cultivating together this common ground, rather than in setting up any one form of faith, as having a specific authority given to it, to overcome and extinguish all the others. And it is this tendency which the Free Religious Association expressly represents. Hence it is, that we hold out the hand of fellowship and brotherhood to these native reformers of one of the most ancient religions on the other side of the globe. And hence the career of such a man as Anandashram Swami becomes of special interest to us. From the Hindu Reformer we extract this sketch of his life:—

"We have to notice with deep regret the premature death, at Mandvi in Kutch, on the 30th ult., of Anandashram Swami, and we do not know that we can go into mourning more appropriately for any other personage. He belonged to that class of characters which we believe to have been the chief agent in developing the thought and civilization of ancient India, and which is peculiarly wanted at this juncture of our revival,—an earnest, intelligent, and cultivated man, not desponding or despairing of the world, but appreciating it; abjuring its pleasures and giving up the cares of self, yet working the harder and more devotedly for it, to advance the cause of knowledge, of peace, of love, of country, and of humanity. * * * * *

To sum up the leading wants of his life so far as they are known (for he was ever watchful and anxious to remain incognito), he was an educated native of Bengal, of solid parts and easy circumstances, who took advantage of one of our holy orders in order to exchange pleasure for toil, and dedicated his life to the public good. Under cover of a rule of the order he had entered, which required him to leave home for twelve years after initiation, he travelled for many years in Northern India and Hindustan proper and Rajpootana, and in the course of his wanderings and beneficent ministry, reached Western India, where he sought with characteristic shrewdness to work upon the minds of Princes, as the best agents for influencing the destinies and welfare of millions of fellow-beings. Although, therefore, he was assiduous in his attention to the spiritual welfare of the flock of men and women, young and old, who ever gathered around him, he specially devoted his energies to influence their condition through their rulers."

In this latter particular he seems to have followed the example of Confucius; and the article proceeds to narrate some of his experience in approaching the rulers of these interior Provinces. Some of them treated him cordially, and listened to his advice. Others treated him ill. Once he was imprisoned for exposing the misgovernment of his royal host. But he persisted in his mission of "truth-telling and good-doing;" and in several of the royal households won respect and his opportunity for benevolence and patriotic service. To the sovereign of Rajpootana, he became a disinterested and greatly valued adviser, through whose influence many measures were introduced for the good of the people. He labored to "reform the government of Jeypore, and his influence was not unfelt in Indore and Dhar." In Jeypore, his success was especially marked by the introduction of a constitutional government, in the place of the Sovereign's arbitrary will. He was noted for high moral courage and faith, and for great persistency in his work. "He fought patiently against moral odds, and in explanation of his conduct used to say, 'Where there is life, there is hope.'" The article recommends that the Provinces where he had labored should "construct some work of public use to mark their sorrow and their respect for their deceased benefactor,"—and proceeds thus:—

"A monument is sure to be erected over his remains at Mandvi; but it ought not to be a simple grave. It should be accompanied by a resting-place for the weary, or a school built and endowed for enlightening the ignorant. Surely this would be a small price for the gratitude and the credit of a State. We feel sure the people will willingly submit to a tax, if they know its proceeds are to be devoted to commemorate the life of him whom they had cherished, and who could with difficulty be made to accept of their proffered charity, beyond the barest needs of life. Certainly in honoring him they would honor themselves."

ANOTHER PICTURE.

It seems that there is a muscular Parseeism as well as a muscular Christianity, and that some of the wise heads of India see that a muscular Hinduism is needed to give vigor and harmony to other reforms that are in progress in that ancient religion. The Hindu Reformer for January 1st, has the following:

"The Parsee community are trying hard to develop the physical capacities of their nation. They have been encouraging every movement that leads to the accomplishment of this object, while the Hindu community are not only barren in organizing new movements that would improve their physique, but cannot even sustain any existing association, the object of which is the development of the body. We have been led into these remarks by a perusal of the report of the proceedings of a meeting for awarding a prize to the best cricketer, in which a large number of ladies and gentlemen of the Parsee community took an active interest. We turn to the Hindus, and—a sad contrast—we find that the only cricket club, organized under the auspices of influential members of the Marathi community, has been closed.

Hence it is that Hindus as a rule are very much inferior to the Parsees in their physique. There are not half a dozen Hindu gentlemen, natives of Bombay, who can boast of any of the active accomplishments of a gentleman, such as riding, shooting, swimming, &c. Our countrymen need scarcely be told that they cannot expect to rise high in the grade of mental and moral improvement, unless they attain to a proportionate height of physical development."

To the above let us add another picture, which mingles the comic with the grave. As one of the facts that show how intemperance, under the influence of British civilization, is invading Indian Society, and working its way even into the sacred upper classes, that have been proverbially temperate, the Hindu Reformer gives this item:—"A Brahmin—ghost of Manu guard us!—was sued the other day in the local small-cause Court by a Christian liquor-seller, for consuming a good quantity of his spirit, but omitting to pay for the same."

What must be the definition of "Christians" in such a community?

THE BIBLE IN SCHOOLS.—The wave-circles of discussion about the Bible in schools are gradually spreading more widely from the centre of that Cincinnati decision. Not a few ministers of unimpeached orthodoxy take the ground of Mr. Beecher, and are willing to let the Bible drop out of the secular schools. It is singular that while some are insisting here that this formal reading should be maintained, we should learn of the Turks that schools can flourish in which the rights of all sects are respected, and there is no attempt to teach any kind of religion. The Ottoman Lyceum in Constantinople, in which Christian, Jewish, and Moslem children are admitted on equal terms, and neither the Koran nor the Bible is taught, is a proved success. The number of pupils in this institution, already considerable, is steadily increasing. From Benares, in India, the sacred city of the Brahmins, we learn also of a project for a theological school like that which James Freeman Clarke proposed for Cambridge, in which all religions shall be taught and criticised; a church and school of "Truism," to be at once Pagan, Moslem and Christian, and give to all a fair hearing. It would be singular if Paganism should prove itself to be more catholic and comprehensive in its scope of religious knowledge, than the most enlightened branch of the Christian church.—Rev. C. H. Brigham, in Christian Register.

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLIER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

SNAPPING-TURTLE.—So Mr. McCook deplores his separation from us! He does—does he? And he desires to be united with us! He does—does he? Well, let's see. On what terms? "On terms consistent with truth and righteousness." That's fair. Certainly it is. Agreed, agreed, Mr. McCook. All, then, that you and your confreres have to do is—1. Accord to us liberty of opinion and speech. 2. Retract the slanders which you and they have spouted, and preached, and printed against us. 3. Repudiate and blot out the brutal record of that demonic gathering known as the Assembly of 1866. 4. Stop robbing us of our church property. 5. Come back to the conservatism and sound doctrine of OLD SCHOOL PRESBYTERIANISM. These terms are "consistent with truth and righteousness." We shall magnanimously let all else be among the by-gones. Of course, the prospect of the union which you say you desire is quite promising—eh?—Missouri Presbyterian.

Miscellaneous.

AFRICAN RELIGIOUSNESS.

[From Putnam's Magazine.]

Is the habitual use of religious expressions a proof of real religion? The colored people constantly use such expressions—and this, I think, more than anything else, has misled those who were unaccustomed to them. But it will be asked, Are not such expressions prompted by religious feeling? Generally, I think not. Why do they use them, then? From habit. A person may not be in the least a hypocrite, and yet use such expressions without thought or meaning. I have heard children on their way to school say, "I ain't late dis mornin', bress de Lord," or boys at play, "I didn't lose dat ar marble, tank de Lord fer dat." What prompts these expressions? They repeat what they have heard their elders say, and these again speak after the fashion of their people.

But it is asked, are there no Christians among them? Undoubtedly. There are many who seem to have been directly taught of God, and who show the fruits of that teaching in their lives, but I have invariably found them among the quieter ones. Said an old woman, one of the "poor of this world, rich in faith":—

"Honey, I don't say dat ar ain't all right, but I can't feel ter do it. I used ter do it, an' I ra'lly b'liebed it war de Holy Spirit. I war in a heap o'trouble, 'peared like nuffin' didn't gib me no comfort, an' I prayed to de Lord to comfort me hisself; an' 'peared like sufin' spoke right in my heart, soft an' quiet like, and I 'membered how de Lord war not in de whirlwind, nor in de storm, but in 'de still, small voice'; an' I knowed dat ef He spoke ter us wid a still voice, He wants us ter speak ter Him de same way. So, honey, since dat ar time I nebber feelled one bit like hollerin' or stampin'."

And so I have almost invariably found it with those who were Christians in heart and life, as well as profession.

One strong argument against the idea of natural religious feeling in the colored people, is the fact, that as they become educated, it generally decreases. The reaction from excitement to indifference is natural and sure, and as the circumstances of their lives change, this feeling is weakened. Those who have been always or for many years free, manifest little of such disposition. It is a fact, painful and undeniable, that among the best educated of the colored people, there is a strong tendency to infidelity, which is in a measure forced on them by their circumstances. A highly educated colored woman said, not long since, in answer to one who remonstrated with her on neglect of religious services:—

"I don't know whether I believe in anything or not. So far as I hear anything about religion, I don't see much to believe in. If I went to church, I might, but I am shut out from that. I won't go to the colored churches, for I'm only disgusted with bad grammar and worse pronunciation, and their horrible absurdities; I can't go to your churches, for if I am admitted at all, I am put away off in a dark corner out of reach of everybody, as if I were some unclean thing, and I will not voluntarily place myself in such a position."

THOSE GIRL.

The appearance in Toledo of the "two-headed girl" makes the following jeu d'esprit, clipped from the Buffalo Express, not wholly inappropriate to our columns:—

Those girl which were exhibited at St. James Hall yesterday is unquestionably the most singular plurality which erratic nature ever perpetrated, and gives rise to many perplexing suppositions and theories. Are they a quadruped, or are they a biped, or may they with propriety be termed a quadrupedal biped, are questions which we will leave for solution to more eminent natural scientists, and we will only discourse of our own ideas upon taking an observation of these what-is-it. First, think of its (their) early childhood. What a chorus of squalling they (it) must have been capable of producing, and what a continual administration of rations it (they) must have required. Passing on to girlhood, imagine the plurality of taffy and skipping ropes, and chastisements for disobedience of maternal injunctions. Next womanhood comes, and we pause with dismay. Suppose we were courting those girl, would we be entitled to their dual affections? Would our devotions be considered as belonging to it both? Or would it be incumbent upon us to pour out loving words into the gentle ear of one of it, while another enamored swain is basking in the loving smile of the other of it? And then matrimony—we can pursue the subject no further—those shoe bills, those milliner's bills. Appalling thought!

THE GUILTY ONES.—In Beregszasz, Hungary, a short time ago, a wagon in which sat the wife of one of the first officers of the district with her child, collided with an ox team and was demolished. The lady and child were dangerously hurt and were left lying in their blood under the broken wagon. All of which is very painful to report, but the joke came in when the Haiducks of the Comitai (police officers) took the "guilty" oxen to the Comitai-house to be punished for their misdeed.—Nachricht aus Deutschland und der Schweiz.

The City of Toledo,

To Capitalists and Manufacturers.

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.

In 1850—3,829.

In 1860—13,784.

In 1866—24,401.

In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of sidewalks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

THE HEBREW PROPHETS.

The words prophet and prophecy have both a wider and a narrower meaning, of which the latter has within a few hundred years tended to crowd the former out of common use. Lord Bacon, who died in 1626, mentions (to quote his own words) "an exercise, commonly called prophesying, which was this; that the ministers within a precinct did meet upon a week day in some principal town, where there was some ancient grave minister that was president, and an auditory admitted of gentlemen or other persons of leisure. Then every minister successively, beginning with the youngest, did handle one and the same part of Scripture, spending severally some quarter of an hour or better, and in the whole some two hours. And so, the exercise being begun and ended with prayer, and the president giving a text for the next meeting, the assembly was dissolved." Jeremy Taylor, an eminent bishop of the English Church who died in 1667, employed the word in a similar sense in the title of his treatise, "On Liberty of Prophesying." As used by Lord Bacon and Jeremy Taylor, the word prophecy means to interpret the Scriptures in the exercise of the Protestant right of private judgment,—in other words, to speak freely concerning religion out of the depths of one's own inmost convictions; and a prophet would be one who thus freely spoke. This, then, is the wider meaning of the terms in question.

In a passage of the great English philosopher, John Locke, who died in 1704, we find a new conception introduced into the word prophecy, although the older conception is still covered by it:—"Prophecy (he says, Paraphrase of 1 Cor. XII, note) comprehends three things,—prediction, singing by the dictate of the Spirit, and understanding and explaining the mysterious, hidden sense of Scripture by an immediate illumination and motion of the Spirit." The new conception I refer to is that of prediction; and, in the common language of to-day, this has become the chief idea suggested by the word prophet. The narrower meaning of the terms prophet and prophecy is thus practically confined to simple prediction,—the foretelling of future events by reason of a special illumination or revelation from God.

Now of these two meanings, the former comes the nearer to the meaning of the Hebrew word for prophet, nabi; and in studying the nature of Hebrew prophecy, it should be taken as the true meaning. "No term," says Dr. Noyes, perhaps the best Hebrew scholar America has yet produced, and translator of a large portion of the Hebrew Scriptures, "no term by which the Hebrew prophet is denoted in the Old Testament means predictor. He is called inspired speaker, seer, watchman, but never predictor or foreteller of future events." The Greek word prophetes, from which our English word prophet is directly taken, bore substantially the same signification, and was applied to any one who was supposed to speak for a god or interpret his will to men. Thus Pindar calls the blind old Theban, Tiresias, the prophet or "interpreter of Jove;" Apollo was also called the "interpreter of Jove" by Æschylus, while the Pythia or priestess at Delphi was called in her turn the "pro- phet" or "interpreter of Apollo." If, therefore, we wish to know what the ancient Hebrews meant when they called a man a prophet, we shall come the closest to their actual thought, if we take the term in the sense of a speaker or interpreter [see Gesenius, sub voce],—one "who is, as it were, the middle person, the speaker and interpreter between God and man" [Bleek, Eint. in d. A. T., p. 413],—one who simply announces or proclaims to his fellowmen whatever God has revealed to him directly.

Now this is not the usual or most widely accepted signification of the word. To nine persons in ten, it suggests the idea of an inspired foreteller of events in the future,—it may be in the remote future. The Hebrew prophets are commonly believed to have been men whom God miraculously enlightened with reference to the future, and sent as special messengers from himself to communicate this miraculous knowledge to men. Prediction is regarded as the chief, if not the only function of the prophet, as such; and, more particularly, prediction of the coming of the Messiah, the Jesus whose story is told in the New Testament, is regarded as the great burden of their message. Neither of these beliefs is correct. Although the prophets did undoubtedly claim to foretell future events on the direct authority of Jehovah, prediction was a wholly subordinate part of their function,—merely incidental to the real work they endeavored to accomplish. Furthermore, the promise of an individual Messiah as Redeemer and Savior is not to be found at all in the prophets Joel, Amos, Zephaniah, Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Haggai, and the later Isaiah [Bleek, p. 439]. It is plain, consequently, that the prophets as a class had some other function than that of simple prediction, and that the predictions they actually but incidentally made were by no means chiefly concerned about the "coming of Christ." The reason why a false impression with regard to their office has arisen, is not at all difficult to discover. The Old Testament has value in the eyes of devout Christians chiefly because it is supposed to have been written with distinct reference to the New Testament,—because the Jewish law, the Jewish history, and the Jewish prophecies, are supposed to have been merely a foreshadowing of the Gospel. Hence all parts of the Old Testament have been, and are, read with a prevailing desire of discovering hidden allusions to Jesus; and any passage that could, by the exercise of ingenuity, be twisted into a prophecy of him, has been construed as a divine intimation of his future advent. The violence thus done to every portion of the Hebrew Scriptures is almost incredible, and is, in many cases, wholly laughable. For proof of my statement, I would simply refer you to the headings placed at the commencement of each chapter by the early English translators. Chapters which no more allude to Jesus than they do to Robinson Crusoe, are gravely headed with titles mentioning the Christ, his kingdom, or his church. When you go home this morning, I recommend you to take down your Bibles, turn to Solomon's Song, and read the inscriptions at the head of each chapter and the running titles at the top of each page. If it were a fit book to read, I would recommend you also to read the chapters themselves for the purpose of comparing them with these headings and titles; but Solomon's Song is simply an amorous poem, with no more reference to the Christ than is contained in Lord Byron's Don Juan. It would be exactly as appropriate and truthful to prefix these headings to the various cantos of Don Juan, as it is to prefix them to the various chapters of Solomon's Song. I think that, by the most casual turning over of the leaves of your Bibles, you will perceive how thoroughly men's interpretation of the Old Testament has been warped and vitiated by the vagaries of orthodox theology. This simple experiment will show you at once why it is that the true function of the Hebrew prophets has been lost out of sight,—why it is that their truly great and grand words have been overshadowed by their hap-hazard guesses at the future. Once get rid of this morbid appetite for Messianic prophecies,—once seek to read the prophetic utterances in the light of the context, the contemporaneous history, and the spirit of the age,—and you will realize for the first time what sublime thoughts burned in the souls of those brave, intense, "God-intoxicated" men. They had something better to do than to read fortunes like so many gypsies,—some end more practical and sternly earnest to gain, than to cast horoscopes like so many astrologers. The best life of the Hebrew nation throbbed in their hearts; and it is in their virile words that we must seek the clew to its history and spirit. One might as well try to read the glowing chapters of Isaiah or Jeremiah through smoked glasses an inch thick with lamp-black, as to read them through the spectacles of orthodoxy. Hence I say that he has no conception whatsoever of the true function of the Hebrew prophets, who sees in them mere predictors or fortune-tellers, or who hears in their predictions merely so many stammering efforts to pronounce the name of Jesus. Protestant theology has as effectually sealed the Bible to common eyes by its interpretations, as the Romish Church has done by keeping it in the Latin of the Vulgate.

If, then, prediction,—or, more particularly, Messianic prediction,—was not the true function of the Hebrew prophets, what was it? If they did not predict, what did they do? Who were they, and what was their business with the people?

Before I undertake to state what their true function was, I must say a little more about their predictions. For I have by no means denied that they did predict, or that they thought their predictions guaranteed or endorsed by Jehovah. What I wish to say is, that their predictions, when made, were incidental or subordinate,—that these very predictions had a purpose,—and that this purpose was higher than that of mere fortune-telling, the glutting of idle curiosity. First of all, let us inquire whether they had any greater power of predicting future events accurately, than other men of equal brain naturally possess. An example or two will be worth a whole ream of abstract arguments.

Several of the prophets, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Amos, and Obadiah, unite in predicting the most complete and terrible destruction against Edom, a country south of Judea. From a careful comparison of these various predictions, nothing could be more certain than that the prophets foretold this total overthrow and annihilation of Edom as about to take place at the time of the return of the Hebrews from the Babylonish Captivity, when they were expected to be in the zenith of their power. Now it is true that the Edomites, as a nation, have been destroyed; and so have the Jews also, as a nation. But several hundred years after the predictions ought to have been fulfilled, the Edomites were still prosperous and flourishing; later still, the Jews and the Edomites were amalgamated into a single nation; and not long before the birth of Jesus, Herod the Great, an Edomite by birth, became King of the Jews as well as of the Edomites. Now if I should predict that the Prince of Wales would die next year, and fifty years hence he should still be alive and well on his mother's throne,—or if I should predict a tremendous snow-storm to-morrow, and three weeks hence there should be a mild rain,—I should hardly venture to claim great credit as a prophet. Yet the prophecies concerning Edom found no better fulfilment. The difficulties in the way of proving their actual fulfilment are so great, that some interpreters, J. D. Michaelis for instance, suppose their fulfilment to be still in the future; while others seek to escape embarrassment in other ways.

So also the prophet Ezekiel, in his twenty-sixth chapter, predicts the destruction of the city of Tyre by a particular king, Nebuchadnezzar. "For thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will bring against Tyre Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, a king of kings from the North, with horses, and with chariots, and with horsemen and a vast multitude of people. . . . And they shall make a spoil of thy riches, and make a prey of thy merchandize; and they shall break down thy walls, and destroy thy beautiful houses; and thy stones and thy timber and thine earth shall they lay in the midst of the waters. And I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease, and the sound of thy harps shall be no more heard. And I will make thee like a naked rock; thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more; for I, Jehovah, have spoken it, saith the Lord Jehovah."—[Noyes' translation.] Now only three chapters later, the same prophet Ezekiel himself announces the non-fulfilment of his own prediction, in the most explicit terms:—"The word of Jehovah came to me, saying: Son of Man, Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon, caused his army to serve a great service against Tyre; every head was made bald and every shoulder was peeled; yet neither he nor his army had wages from Tyre for the service which he served against it. Therefore, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Behold, I will give the land of Egypt to Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, and he shall take her multitude, and take her spoil, and take her plunder; and it shall be wages for his army. For his wages for his service I will give him the land of Egypt; for they wrought for me, said the Lord, Jehovah." When, therefore, we seek the fulfilment of Ezekiel's prophecy of the utter destruction of Tyre, we find none; on the contrary, he himself announces its failure. Tyre has indeed been destroyed,—once by Alexander the Great, though it afterwards revived; and at the present day, only an insignificant village remains to mock its ancient grandeur. But no evidence exists that Nebuchadnezzar ever captured or destroyed it, except a passage in the Commentaries of the so-called St. Jerome, who lived nearly a thousand years later, and who tried to explain away Ezekiel's confession of unfulfilled prophecy, by saying that, although Nebuchadnezzar actually captured Tyre, the Tyrians had previously carried off all their valuables in ships; and that it was in this sense that Ezekiel referred to Nebuchadnezzar's receiving no "wages" for his toil. This is a fine specimen of the quibble theological. Josephus, the Jewish historian, states [Ant. X, 11, § 1] on the authority of Phœnician writers that Nebuchadnezzar did actually besiege Tyre for thirteen years; but he nowhere states that he actually captured it. Furthermore, the capture of Tyre is mentioned by no Greek or Roman historian whose works are now extant; and although Ewald and Hengstenberg contend for its capture, Gesenius, Winer, and Hitzig decide against it. Candid critics admit that an examination of the evidence of Jerome shows it to be worthless; and no solid reason whatever exists for believing that Ezekiel's prediction was ever fulfilled.

It would be easy to multiply instances of unfulfilled predictions of the prophets. The fact is, they predicted precisely as men predict nowadays, on the warrant of their own insight into natural causes; although it should be recognized that the prophets conceived themselves as having the direct sanction of Jehovah for their conjectures concerning the future. In this respect they resemble all other enthusiasts, who are wont to conceive themselves as in special favor with God. Some of the prophetic predictions turned out true, others false; but the same is the case with modern predictions. Theodore Parker prophesied the great war of the Rebellion, as did many others who believed in the "irrepressible conflict;" but such prophecies, like those of the Hebrew seers, were seldom, if ever, fulfilled in detail. Let this, then, be stated as a sure result of critical investigation, that prediction was no essential part of the function of the Hebrew prophets, and that their predictions were precisely analogous to those of other sagacious men, sometimes verified but oftener falsified.

To recur, then, to the main question, what was the function of the prophets? I would explain that their proper and peculiar function was that of reformers. They were "political counsellors, popular orators, and religious teachers" (Noyes). Their great aim was to preserve and establish on a stronger basis the ideas which underlay the national life of the Hebrew people, namely, that there is but one God, Jehovah,—that Jehovah made a solemn compact with Abraham, by which he set apart forever the descendants of Abraham as his own chosen people,—and that he would reward them for obedience to his laws, and punish them for disobedience. These ideas were the root out of which grew the whole national consciousness; and though they seem to us, in part at least, very crude and narrow, we must remember that they were progressive ideas at that time, and have done much to develop a higher life in the human race. The ideas of the One God, of the sacred covenant with Abraham, and of the theocracy or government of the Hebrews by Jehovah as their national King, were as much the basis of Hebrew civilization, as the great ideas of liberty, progress and equal rights are the basis of American civilization; they were the best and highest ideas the Hebrew nation could then embody in institutions, and the prophets were those noble spirits who thrilled most deeply under the inspiration they imparted. Hence they sought to hold the Hebrews to greater fidelity to the radical ideas of the Hebrew State, just as Charles Sumner, William Lloyd Garrison, and Wendell Phillips have sought to hold the Americans to greater fidelity to the radical ideas of our own Declaration of Independence. The idea of Monotheism was to the Hebrews what the idea of Freedom is to the Americans,—the great corner-stone of their national existence. But it could hardly be expected that an ignorant and headstrong Semitic tribe should comprehend fully, and carry out into consistent practice, the principles which gave it all its historic importance, and which marked out for it a magnificent destiny. Retrogression and unfaithfulness to the law of its own being were sure to appear in the history of such a people. While the true Hebrews, therefore, were arrayed against the surrounding paganism, paganism found a party even among the Hebrews which sought to ally itself with the external foe,—a party now in the minority, now in the majority, but at all times a powerful element of discord in the State. This party were the "Democrats" of that day, doing their utmost to sap the national life and betray the national future. Opposed to these traitors to the national idea, was the party of genuine Hebrews, with the prophets at their head,—true exponents of the national life. The wealthy and powerful classes, the kings, nobles and priests, inclined strongly to the disloyal party, and sought alliances with the pagan nations round about; but the prophets denounced all such schemes, so dangerous to a State of which Monotheism was the organic law, and threatened Divine vengeance on all backsliders. Here is the secret of their predictions, which all turn on one great idea,—that God would reward his people, if faithful, with prosperity, and punish them, if unfaithful, with unspeakable woes. The certainly of rewards and retributions,—this is the key to all the prophetic predictions, which were sometimes general, sometimes special, but which always applied to the present and the immediate future, and were always based on surrounding circumstances. The rewards were at hand,—so were the penalties. Examine the alleged references to events far distant in the future, and they all prove to be misconceptions. The horizon of the times bounded the vision of the prophets. What influence upon the people could predictions have had, which would not be fulfilled for centuries? About as much influence as the predictions of scientific men that coal will be exhausted in the British Isles five hundred years hence have on the price of coal and the practical management of the coal trade in England to-day. The price of coal has not risen a farthing in consequence of them. It is simply preposterous to believe that the prophets could have sought to move the people by any predictions but those which appealed directly to their hopes or fears. The use of the prophetic predictions was always as motives to action. They were appeals to the people to forsake idolatry through fear of disaster, and to return to the true worship through hope of Divine favor. Hence I repeat what I have said before, that these predictions were always incidental, being reasons offered and appeals made in the cause of Monotheism; they were always uttered with a purpose to recall the people, if astray, or to confirm them, if wavering; and the predictions themselves were thus only a means to an end. The main function of the prophets was to establish the nation on its own national basis of Monotheism, to avert all entangling foreign alliances, to purify and deepen the moral consciousness of the people, to inculcate practical righteousness and repress all forms of iniquity. They were men saturated with faith in Jehovah,—tingling with electric inspirations and moral enthusiasm,—glowing with zeal for God and love for Israel. They were men often of most enlarged and humane sympathies, embracing the whole world in their yearning for the kingdom of God, and battling with pagan abominations in the cause of the human race. In very truth, the Hebrew prophets were Abolitionists of the olden day, burning to abolish the shame of Israel, and revive faith in the sacred covenant with Abraham, which was their Magna Charta, their Declaration of Independence. Their work was essentially that of intense, enthusiastic reformers, believing themselves in terrible earnest sent by God to purify and spiritualize his chosen but wayward people. This was the real business of the Hebrew prophets; and how they would despise the efforts of Christian theologians to belittle it to that of gypsies! They felt themselves to be agents of God, deputed to administer his earthly kingdom,—not adepts in witchcraft or magic, dabbling in palmistry and telling fortunes to curious boys and girls. If they predicted, it was because they had tremendous faith in the law of righteous retribution,—not because it was their mission to furnish beforehand a few proof-texts to bolster up a system of dogmatic theology. Hand to hand they grappled with the vices and enormities of their age, put their shoulders to the wheels of progress, and dared to beard the royal lion of Judah even in his den. They wasted no hours in peeping through the key-hole of the future, but found their time abundantly occupied in being heroes and martyrs. In short, they were brawny men of Luther's stamp, fighting princes and priesthoods in the name of God, and trampling public iniquities under their heels. They had no taste for propounding conundrums to posterity, and bequeathing the answers to orthodox commentators alone.

The earliest prophets were oral teachers, and left no legacy of weighty words. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, all appear in this character,—still more prominently Moses. During the period of the judges, they doubtless continued their agency as public instructors; but Samuel first appears to have made the prophetic office distinctly recognized as such in the Hebrew State. He founded institutions, called "schools of the prophets," at Ramah, Gilgal, Bethel, Jericho, and elsewhere, in which young men were trained and specially educated for the work, living in communities somewhat after the fashion of modern divinity schools; but although these schools are still mentioned in the times of Elijah and Elisha, they disappear subsequently, and only individual prophets come upon the stage. The latest known prophet was Malachi, about 450 B. C.; while the earliest who reduced their prophecies to writing, Joel, Amos, and Hosea, flourished about 800 B. C. Thus the prophets whose works remain to us come within a period of about 350 years. They taught not merely by word of mouth, and by the pen, but they employed what may be called symbolic actions or acted parables, for the purpose of impressing the imagination more powerfully. For instance, when Abijah wishes to inform Jeroboam that he will become ruler of the kingdom of Israel, and that this kingdom will be sliced off from the kingdom of Judah, he takes his new mantle, tears it into twelve pieces, and gives ten of them to Jeroboam, saying, "Take ten pieces, for thus saith Jehovah, the God of Israel, Behold, I will wrest the kingdom from the hand of Solomon, and give thee ten tribes." This proneness to symbolical acts, which reappears in Christianity under the form of baptism and the Lord's Supper, is indicative of a certain spiritual childishness,—of an incapacity for purely intellectual discernment, and a fondness for pictorial helps to imagination, somewhat analogous to those of the well-known Kindergarten. All such symbolical actions become trivial as we develop our spiritual nature; but they seem more worthy of the rude age of the prophets than of our own.

The prophets, unlike the priests, were not a distinct order in the State, transmitting the office from father to son; nor was there any prerequisite but the inward call of Jehovah. "Then answered Amos, and said to Amaziah, I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son, but I was a herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit. And the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said to me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel." It is this inward call, however interpreted, whether as the supernatural voice of Jehovah or as the natural voice of God in the soul of man, which makes the only true credentials of the prophet in any age. For every age has its prophets,—souls that discern the infinite value of righteousness above all meaner goods, that dare proclaim their message at all costs, that seek first of all the purification of society from low aims and false ideals, that would crown each soul with the diadem of great principles, that would abolish all abuses by the free suffrage of repentant mankind, that would sow in each and every heart the divine seed of love to God and love to man. Alas, for every true prophet you will find a thousand priests. Yet unless we hear the summons to do the prophet's work, and spring with alacrity to our task, we are but rotten timber, cumbering the ground. Show me one in whom the moral element dominates all the rest, and I will reverence a prophet anointed by God. Such a soul is a clarion call to quit our meanness, in which we daily grovel, and to stand erect, eager for noble service. Of all our needs, friends, we need most the prophetic unction.

FREE EVENING SCHOOL.

A Work of Charity--The Children of the Poor Drinking at the Fountain of Knowledge.

[From the Toledo Blade of March 2.]

Of the charitable institutions in Toledo, none are more deserving of public sympathy and support than the "Free Evening School," which is now in successful operation. The first proposition to establish this school originated some two months since, among active members of the "Radical Club," an organization connected with the "First Independent Society," over which Mr. Abbot presides. The plan for opening the school was finally perfected, and the first session was held about six weeks ago in the church of the Society named on Superior street.

A managing committee or directors of the school consist of Messrs. Guido Marx, Howe & Barker. This committee secured the assistance of several energetic and benevolent ladies, and with them commenced, with resolute hearts, the work of making their educational project successful. Circulars were issued stating the objects of the school, asking aid from the public and inviting children whose parents compel them to work during the day for their living, to come to the free school and spend their evenings in improving their minds. Each request of the circular met with a hearty response. The poor boys who work at the several manufactories in the city during the day flocked to the school, and sympathizing ladies and gentlemen volunteered their services as teachers or proffered their money to defray the expenses of light, fuel, books, slates, etc.

It finally became necessary to change the holding of the school from the church to other quarters. At this juncture Peter Lenk, Esq., offered the free use of a room in his block, corner Monroe and Summit Sts., to the committee. The offer was accepted and the committee set about to find seats and desks, when this want was supplied by the City Board of Education.

The school holds two sessions each week; from seven o'clock till nine, Tuesday and Friday evenings.

The average attendance each session is between 75 and 80, all males. The ages of the scholars average between 14 and 30 years. Of course all who attend this school come neither from curiosity nor compulsion, but solely from a desire to acquire knowledge, and this is a gratifying characteristic not found in private or public schools. The pupils are regular and prompt in their attendance. In this particular the pupils of the city schools could find a worthy standard from these unfortunates by which to govern their punctuality and regularity.

From the natural results of the indigence which surrounds these pupils, the condition of their faces, hands and clothes, on their first appearance, was anything but slightly and agreeable to their teachers. Hence the latter found it necessary to give each new comer a first lesson in neatness of person and dress. Their hygienic and aesthetic suggestions were readily heeded, and the new comers appeared thereafter with clean faces and hands, combed heads, and the ragged, threadbare clothes as well arranged as possible.

As regards natural intelligence there is no class of scholars in the city who are superior to these dependents. They are quick in perception, tractable in discipline and orderly and courteous in their deportment towards their teachers. Though ignorant, they are not dunces. Each scholar is provided with a slate and pencil and with an arithmetic and reader of a grade suitable to their respective advancement. Some of the number are scarcely beyond their A B C's in reading, while others can read quite well. In arithmetic a few have advanced into the intricacies of fractions, but the majority are in the first principles of addition, subtraction, etc. Those who are taught penmanship receive their copies upon their slates.

In consequence of the limited size of the school-room the exercise of reciting in classes is dispensed with, and each teacher hears the lesson of his or her pupils in the same seats in which they study. This is one of the great inconveniences which the school now suffers. The constant and confused noise resulting from this method generally interrupts the concentration of the student's mind upon his study.

Though there is quite a good number of teachers laboring in this school, still there is need and room for more. School books are also in demand and will be appreciated as donations from any one.

A sewing school for poor girls is also being conducted by the same good men and women who have charge of the literary school. This school has but one session a week, and that is on Saturday afternoons. At the last session 110 girls were present. They practise on cloth cut into garments for themselves by their instructors, and whatever they complete they carry to their homes.

Donations of cloths for these children to make into garments for themselves are much needed, and will be most thankfully received by the managing committee. In behalf of the two schools mentioned above we bespeak the deep interest and cheerful liberality of all our citizens for their support.

[We leave a few errors of detail uncorrected in the above account, which is in the main correct.—Ed.]

A GREATER THAN LUTHER IS HERE.

[From the Christian Register of March 5.]

MY DEAR JAMES:—I am afraid you will not live to see the "culmination" of the revolution that out-Luthers Luther. I agree with you that you have seen its beginning "announced in a newspaper." But I have always cautioned you that the prophecies in these modern sources of wisdom must not be considered precisely infallible. True, as you say, who can know so well as the editor of the Index what his lively little sheet may be able to accomplish?

But you must remember that printing is no new art. It is not quite as if this Index were the only paper in the world, or the first journal to fly from house to house among the people. A few candidates for the public favor still remain. Then, too, it's mere newness doth not commend it to everybody. The "well of English undefiled" in the Old Bible hath yet some charm for certain minds.

You bid me note that the separation of a Toledo parish from that vast body known as the "A. U. A.," inaugurates, according to the Index, "a popular revolution compared with which the Protestant Reformation was the merest child's play."

Luther's work I do not remember to have seen thus characterized before. He doth not appear to me to have been playing with dolls or ninepins. Nay, I have thought that in his physique, if his portraits do not belie him, there was a touch more, perhaps, of the sledge-hammer aspect than in the prophet of Toledo. But I know we sometimes push the matter of "muscular" faith too far. So let this pass. What makes me a doubter, James, as to the magnitude and overwhelming torrent of this new revolution, is, that I sometimes think that the French of the last century had possibly flattered their minds with equal expectations.

When the motto was—"There is no God, and death is an eternal sleep," may there not have been a sensation excited in the public mind of that day, in some degree approaching that which the secession of these warm spirits of Toledo from the American Unitarian Association hath begun to cause? I hear choice things said regarding the sweetness and courage of the editor of the Index. But unless all people are fashioned like him, may there not be a protestancy of the heart against his chilling creed, an attachment to the biographies of those men and women who triumphed sub Christo Duce, which may countervail his appeals to them to cut off the limb of the tree against which their ladder is standing? Then, too, inasmuch as we have shaken off our faith in the monasteries and Abbots of the past, why bow the knee to any Protestant Abbot, however oracular his utterance?

I will say no more now, James, but will only caution you to "look before you leap," and to be sure, since you "have no time" to examine the old "Evidences," that "the new revolution" will covenant to give you all the love, patience, sacrifice and joy of those "of whom the world was not worthy," before you find yourself spinning round in its vortex.

And I remain, in hope and trust, your ancient

UNCLE EPHRAIM.

"[The Luthers are an extinct race," says The Radical. THE INDEX says Amen. In an editorial of Jan. 22, we wrote,—"Henceforth radicalism is the message of no INDIVIDUAL PROPHET, but the dignified self-assertion of universal man,"—with more to the same effect, dissuading from all idolatry of persons. But we will scrupulously obey the Scripture injunction, Hos. iv, 17:—" [Uncle] Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone."—Ed.]

UNITARIAN THEOLOGY.

[From the Morning Star, F. W. Baptist.]

The steady drift of much of the speculative thought of the Unitarian clergy toward the absolute rationalism of Germany and the simple theism of science, has exhibited the necessity of having a formal statement of the main points of their theology brought out and published. In other words, there is a demand for a creed,—the very thing which Unitarians have often protested against and tried to ridicule. And not only have they been driven to the formation of a creed, but have felt compelled to make the acceptance of it a test to determine who may and who may not properly belong to their National Conference.

Besides this, the editorial management of the Liberal Christian has been changed in the interest of a definite theology, and to save it from aiding in the rationalizing movement. And Dr. Bellows has drawn up, in a series of nine not very brief articles, a statement of what he calls the theological views of the Unitarians. Though falling a long way short of expressing what we hold as significant and vital in the Christian system, yet we rejoice in this interest to escape the encroachments of an unbelieving audacity, and to hold fast to some elements of biblical truth. Dr. B.'s exhibit of the Unitarian faith is by no means acceptable to all his brethren. There is quite too much faith to satisfy one portion, and perhaps too little to content another portion. Others still will be puzzled by its "glittering generalities." But it has awakened not a little interest; it has been widely circulated and variously criticised, and it may herald the period when the two extreme wings of that body will be effectually separated by the creed line.

No man is a disbeliever who believes in virtue.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Your Prospectus has the genuine ring. Send me one copy during 1870. Enclosed find two dollars."

"I like your first number much, but hereafter shan't we have too much 'Affirmations' and too little 'Index'?"

"I think you are engaged in a grand work, and wish there were more free, outspoken men and women in the world. Tilton is a grand one, if he could afford to break his chains; but the world moves."

"Will you send me some specimen copies of THE INDEX? I want to try and get some subscribers for it. I feel so much more hopeful, so much richer and stronger, since you've commenced your glorious work, that I want to help a little."

"Having read, with great interest, the first number of THE INDEX, I am induced to subscribe for it, both from a desire to aid you in so good a work and from my interest in the cause. Therefore please find enclosed two dollars for one copy."

"I have carefully read the first six numbers of THE INDEX. I find nothing to which I object. I am so heartily pleased with these discourses, and the whole tone of the paper generally, that I will try every way I can to introduce it to others."

"I see by the papers that there is to be fought in Boston, this winter, a battle between 'Michael and the Dragon' (of orthodoxy), and that you are one of the captains on Michael's side. I hope you will publish the address in THE INDEX. I see that Wendell Phillips is not infidel enough to hurt orthodoxy."

"I am much pleased with its contents and read it with great interest. I have one regret, however, and that is, that the name of the Deity and the homage due to Him, is not made more prominent. To me the question of Immortality is not the vital one in the Religion of the Future; a man may be strictly religious without this hope, but he cannot be a religious being without a faith in, and a conscious recognition of, a Supreme Being."

THE BANDUSIAN FOUNTAIN.

[A paraphrase from Horace, Carm. lli, xlii.]

Bandusia's glory, fount serene!—
 Than crystal far more clear, I ween,—
 For thee the ruby wine shall flow,
 For thee the blushing roses blow,
 And, ere to-morrow's sun decline,
 The offspring of the flock be thine,
 Whose swelling brow and threatening front
 Foretell both love and battle's brunt—
 In vain; ere long his gushing blood
 Shall stain with red thy limpid flood.
 The fiery Dog-Star's scorching ray
 Through thy thick covert cannot stray;
 From sweat and toil and summer's heat
 Thou offerest aye a cool retreat,
 And on these shady banks of thine
 The wearied ox may safe recline.
 While thus I sing the rocky cave
 Whence gushes forth thy prattling wave,
 And the green holm-oak, growing near,
 Reflected in thy waters clear,
 Lo! other eyes shall soon admire,
 And thou shalt other lays inspire,—
 Till, grown at last of classic story,
 Far distant lands shall know thy glory.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

The amateur entertainment in the church of the Independent Society, on Thursday evening last, given in behalf of the Industrial School for girls, was eminently successful, and cleared about $113. The audience filled the building; and all were surprised by the vocal and elocutionary talent developed on the occasion. The managers of the entertainment are entitled to great credit for the completeness of their arrangements, and the energy with which they overcame all obstacles. The programme was as follows:—

Piano Duet Overture—Don Pasquale—Misses Haskell.

Chorus—Was brauset gleich—Abt—Toledo Sængerbund.

Trio—Attila—Verdi—Miss J. Haskell, Messrs. Gleason and Brown.

Reading—A. W. Gleason, Esq.

Solo and Chorus—Crowned with the Tempest—Misses Peck, Burton and Haskell, Messrs. Brown, Gleason and Butler.

Romanza—Robert—Meyerbeer—Miss J. Haskell.

Chorus—Serenade—Toledo Sængerbund.

Chorus—Miserere—Il Trovatore—Misses Peck, Burton and Haskell, Messrs. Brown, Gleason and Butler.

"COMPARISONS"

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, writing editorially in the Woman's Journal under the above caption, comments as follows on our recent lecture on Jesus and Socrates:—"The lesson we derived from Mr. Abbot's negations was this: 'Let us now go out and bring some true Christianity in the world. Let us dare to believe as Christ believed, to love as he loved, to work as he worked; and let us not dare to do otherwise, since the ease and remissness of our lives causes our divine Master to be slandered and misunderstood.'"

Does Mrs. Howe really suppose that her own life, or the life of her fellow-Christians, had anything to do with the estimate we formed of the life of Jesus? Is it incomprehensible that (waiving for the time all historic doubts) we should judge the gospel-character of Jesus by itself alone? Mrs. Howe's own words, however, more than justify our judgment of it; for she confesses that she will not "dare to believe otherwise than Christ believed." This is that very enslavement of the soul from which Free Religion seeks to emancipate mankind. Yet Mrs. Howe is wholly unconscious of it. She perceives that the Romanist is in bondage who dares not believe otherwise than the Church believes; but she fancies herself free, not daring to believe otherwise than Christ believed. What despotism could be more absolute than that which thus disguises itself as freedom, and puts fetters on the mind? This is the "kingship" which Mrs. Howe thinks we take in the "poorest and most superficial sense that can be given to it,"—which, however, we take in the sense she herself here gives to it. Such a kingship we hold to be incompatible with spiritual freedom; and all will see it to be so who "dare to believe otherwise than Christ believed."

When, after virtually asserting that we have "slandered" Jesus, Mrs. Howe immediately adds,—"We have dealt with the spirit, not with the details, of Mr. Abbot's discourse,"—we have nothing to say in reply to such criticism, except that Mrs. Howe does not understand the spirit of our discourse, and cannot, therefore, "deal with" it. Sincerely respecting her intentions, even in her severe strictures,—sincerely respecting her religious faith, and acquitting her of all blame for the unintentional injustice into which it has led her,—we are simply sorry that she finds the spirit of slander in the utterance of convictions not her own. Meanwhile we hope to co-operate with her in the just reform of Woman Suffrage; and we wish all possible success to the journal which she so ably helps to edit.

THE CINCINNATI DECISION.

We are indebted to Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., 65 West Fourth St., Cincinnati, for their very timely and convenient volume, just issued under the title of "The Bible in the Public Schools," which gives in full the proceedings in the case of "John D. Miner et al. versus The Board of Education of the City of Cincinnati et al." It is a handsome volume, worthy of the careful study of every American citizen. Never was it more evident that "votes should be weighed, not counted." If the opinions of the Judges had been weighed, the decision of the Court would have been reversed. The case, it is said, is to be carried up to the Supreme Court on a writ of error; but long before the Supreme Court can act on the appeal, this valuable book will enable every independent mind to decide the case for itself. For it is a case which does not turn on technicalities or nice points of law, but rather on the broad principles which lie at the basis of American civilization. Whoever knows the meaning of the words liberty and justice and equal rights, will discern the truth in this controversy, notwithstanding the muddy sophistries with which Judges Hagans and Storer have plastered it over. It requires, in fact, only an elementary knowledge of the Golden Rule, to reach a just conclusion in the premises. Turn the tables,—put the Catholics in power,—let the Catholic instructor read the Catholic Bible in his own way, i. e. with comments, as the Protestant instructor now reads the Protestant Bible in his own way, i. e. without comments,—and the dense fog would be wonderfully dispersed that now broods over the chaos of the judicial intellect. There would then be no need of any appeal to the Supreme Court,—the Superior Court would then be found adequate to the ends of justice. Were it not for the principle involved, we would cheerfully consent to the retention of the Bible in the common schools, provided the volume of Messrs. Clarke & Co. should be used as a reading-book at the same time. There is many a bright lad of twelve who would get more out of the latter than out of the former.

We congratulate the Ohio Woman Suffrage Association, however, on the Cincinnati decision as it is. Woman's sphere is manifestly enlarging. Mrs. Partington once attempted to sweep back the Atlantic Ocean with her broom. The cause of woman's rights certainly looks hopeful, when, holding the in-flowing tide of human freedom in check with the broom of an injunction, Mrs. Partington sits serenely on the bench of the Superior Court of Cincinnati.

THE JEWISH TIMES.

We are requested to notice the first number of the second volume of The Jewish Times, published in behalf of Reformed Judaism. It is ably edited by M. Ellinger, 7 Murray St., Room 5, New York City. Price, $5.00 per annum. Not only to Israelites, but to all who take an interest in the progress of liberal religious sentiments, it is a paper of much value. Mr. Ellinger will be remembered by many of our readers as one of the speakers at the last meeting of the Free Religious Association in Boston. The manuscript of his excellent address was afterwards unfortunately lost through the carelessness of a reporter, and consequently was not printed in the published report of the meeting; but it was exceedingly broad and catholic in its tone, and was highly appreciated by the audience. The Jewish Times is one of the most interesting of our exchanges. It aims to develop the ancient religion of Judaea, emphasizing the universal truths it contains, and neglecting its limitations. In fact, it identifies Judaism with the universal religion of humanity, and is full of sympathy with modern progress and modern ideas. We have but one criticism to make upon its general position,—the same which we have made upon so-called "Liberal Christianity,"—namely, that the universal religion of humanity requires the abolition of all those distinctive features which separate historical religions from each other. We respect that veneration for the name and traditions of Judaism which appears in the Jewish Times, because it is intimately associated with the noblest sentiments of the human heart; but nevertheless it is our conviction that the name and traditions of Judaism, as well as those of Christianity, will fail to perpetuate themselves as part of the universal, free religion which is destined at last to absorb all the religions of the globe. The "call" of Abraham and his "covenant" with Jehovah, the "divine authority" of Moses, and other peculiar claims of the "chosen people," have no more value to mankind in general than the similar claims of Christianity. Will our Jewish brothers learn to forget their nationality in the consciousness of our common humanity, and abandon the myths of their historical religion? The religion of the future will not be historical, but spiritual; and the sacrifice is necessary. Reformed Judaism, like Liberal Christianity, is only a stepping-stone to a larger and higher faith.

"Exile," says Cicero, "is where there is no place for virtue."

THE HINDU LEGEND OF KRISHNA.

In the "Asiatic Researches," by Sir Wm. Jones, I find the history of Krishna given thus. His father was a carpenter. His mother was a virgin of the royal line of Devali, and was miraculously obumbrated by a Dove. Miracles took place at his birth, such as stars clustering together over the place of his birth, angel-voices singing in the heavens, &c.

The reigning tyrant of the country, warned by dreams that one born at that time would overthrow him, sought to destroy the child, and directed the magi or wise men to seek him out and bring him back word, &c., &c. The parents, miraculously warned by a dream of the danger, fled to a foreign country and secreted the child among the shepherds.

Krishna performed many miracles, even in his youth. He held up a mountain on the tip of his little finger. He bruised the head of a terrible serpent, saved multitudes from starvation by his miraculous power in feeding them, raised the dead, descended into Hades and brought forth those long dead. He was pure, chaste, and benevolent,—washed the feet of his disciples, and preached very nobly and sublimely. He was at last seized by the Rulers, tried, condemned without cause, and put to death between two thieves: after which he rose from the dead, gave instructions to his disciples to preach his gospel to all the world, and in the sight of many went up bodily into the heavens.

On reading this account from so high an authority as Sir Wm. Jones, I am struck with the parallelism between it and that of the Jewish Messiah. I am aware that the Indian mythology, with its notions of a Trinity, was in vogue in India long ages before the time of Abraham; but what am I to conclude concerning these histories?

Have two personages teaching the same doctrine of a resurrection and future life, and preaching the same good morality, been miraculously sent upon the earth in times past? If so, the coincidence is most wonderful. If not, which is the original, and which the counterfeit? Will some one learned in these matters please explain? INQUIRER.

[The story of Krishna, as above given, is only one of many versions, which vary widely in their details. The resemblances to the gospel-story are less minute, though still striking, in the others. We have met with no satisfactory theory of the causes of the parallelism. There are but few positive data to go upon.—Ed.]

THOUGHTS FROM MY NOTE-BOOK.

It is frequently asserted by believers in the divine authority of the Bible, that if we abandon our faith in this "revealed will of God," we are afloat upon the great ocean of life, without rudder, chart, or compass—travelling in a wilderness, beset with difficulty and danger on every side, without light for our pathway or a star in the firmament of heaven by which to direct our course.

It cannot be questioned, that an understanding of God's will concerning man is the one great necessity of his being—that, without this knowledge, life would be a miserable failure, and it were better had man never been born. It is not conceivable, therefore, that the Creator would leave him without a guidance so indispensable to the safe conduct of life, and wanting which, he were but the unhappy plaything of a malignant power.

As we cannot accept the authority of a book, claiming to be the infallible word of God, yet utterly incapable of maintaining this assumption in the court of reason and justice, on what shall we rely for safety? Where shall we find the law of God—the law of our life?

A calm consideration of the question furnishes abundant evidence, that we are not the victims of ignorance, or the sport of chance, but have a "sure word of testimony"—"a light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

We arrive at the knowledge of one God, by discerning the unity of design manifested throughout his works,—the same thought, wrought into endless variety, from simple to complex, ever elaborating itself into higher forms of power and beauty—here, there, everywhere, yet always the same. The men of ancient time did not discover this—they saw conflict where we perceive oneness, and therefore they had many Gods.

The earth performs its annual journey around the sun, moves on its axis, and is changed from a condition of chaos to one of order and beauty, by the action of force within itself—the law of God—permeating every atom and carrying out its own decree.

The vegetable life existing on its surface is developed and sustained—blossoms, bears fruit and dies—by virtue of law written within its own nature. If we would discover it, we go to the plant itself, examine its every part, observe what climate, what soil, how much sunshine, how much moisture, it requires to produce its perfect condition. In no other way can we obtain this knowledge.

Just so in regard to the animal. We can discover the law of its life only by careful study of the animal itself.

The thought of God in regard to humanity harmonizes with that manifested everywhere else. He has not "revealed" to man (in the sense intended by Christians) how to feed and clothe himself, how to build habitations, how to supply himself with any of the necessities, conveniences or affluences of life. He has not revealed the principles of trade and commerce, has not taught him ship-building, the steam engine, the railroad, the printing-press, the telegraph, or any of the steps by which he climbs from the savage to the civilized man. He has created him with naked body and hungry soul. He has written within him the law of growth—endowed him with reason, understanding, imagination, invention and mechanical faculty. His necessities and aspirations drive and stimulate him to discovery. With these he works out the problems of civilization—and how much more nobly, than he could ever do by aid of revelation! Man would be, and always remain, an infant only, were these problems solved for him by a power outside of himself.

God has revealed no social law to man. The experience of social needs teaches him, first, the ten commandments—"Thou shalt not!"—afterwards the more benignant, positive one. Slowly ("noble growths are always slow") he discovers how to bring order out of confusion, and beauty out of deformity. The laws of social life are written in that life.

God has revealed no physical law to man. He discerns it by pleasure and pain—by enjoying the consequence of obedience and suffering the penalty of infringement. The child does not avoid the fire by command of his mother—he thrusts his finger into the flame, and experiences that the law he has broken, is his own law. The laws of physical life are written within that life.

As God is ONE, his thought in regard to man's spirit and nature must have a like manifestation. He creates him with reason, understanding, love and justice—with an ideal of excellence forever unfolding into higher beauty—with "hunger and thirst after righteousness" and truth, and the universe within and without from which to gather this high nutriment. How much more lofty and symmetrical will be his stature having these elements of aspiration and growth, than it could ever become were he guided and guarded by specific "revealed" law, and confined to measured diet! The law of man's moral and spiritual nature is written in man's soul by God's own finger. This Scripture is nowhere else. Here we must go to read it. Whatever excellence we have yet attained has been acquired by discernment of this writing. The grand old things of ancient days—the heroic prophets and apostles of Bible history, have given us their best reading of this record. All due honor to them! In so far as they have discerned truly, these noble human brothers have ministered to our highest needs. The rest is hindrance, fetter, prison-house. The "fulness of time" has come for us to emancipate ourselves from this slavery to the dead past—to go out into the open universe of Truth and breathe freely. Truth can never harm us. It is the word of God, wherever written. It is the Tree of Life, whose fruit is for food—"its leaves for the healing of the nations." Let us put forth our hand and "take thereof and eat and live forever!"

"New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth;
He must upward still and onward
Who would keep abreast of truth.
Lo! before us gleam her camp-fires,
We ourselves must pilgrims be,
Launch our May Flower and steer boldly
Through the desperate wintry sea,
Nor attempt the future's portal
With the past's blood-rusted key."

BREVITY.

A DEFENCE OF HOMŒOPATHY.

MT. PLEASANT, IOWA, March, 1870.

F. E. Albot, Esq., Editor of The Index:

DEAR SIR:—In looking over your paper of Feb. 26, I notice an article on "Sects in Medicine" by H. B. Baker, M. D., in which the premises, and hence the conclusions of the writer, in reference to Homœopathy as a system, are so manifestly mis'cten that, as a friend to truth, I cannot consent that the readers of THE INDEX should be led astray on the subject of medicine, any more than on that of Theology.

To the declaration that "without doubt the various schools of medical practice are comparable to sects in religion," we beg leave to take exceptions. There is just the difference between the two that exists between knowledge and belief. All systems of Theology are founded on tradition, or on the supposed teaching of so-called sacred books, the believer attaching himself to the one or the other according to his peculiar organization, capacity to comprehend, or degree of enlightenment; but a science or natural law is an entirely different thing. Belief or disbelief in the existence of such a principle has nothing whatever to do with it as a truth.

The savage who thrust his hand in the boiling pot to catch the living animal that disturbed the water, was as certainly scalded, as though he had been acquainted with the effect of fluids at that temperature on living tissues. He first had belief; his experiment gave him knowledge. Any one, therefore, who relies on belief alone in medicine, stands very much in the same position, and would run a similar risk of being burned, as Doctor Baker has run by putting his hand (or his foot) in the Homœopathic cauldron.

He says, interpreting the law—"Similia similibus curantur"—(one of the cardinal principles of Homœopathy), that its advocates suppose "all diseases to be caused by a specific agent or substance, and that each disease has its specific remedy or antidote, which in every case is the same substance which produces the disease;" and adds—"This I think is a fair rendering of the supposed law upon which Homœopathy is founded." He seems not to comprehend the difference between similarity and identity. Homœopaths do not now, and never did believe, that diseases were curable by the "same thing that produced them;" neither is it necessary, as the Doctor would have us believe, that any similarity should exist between the agent or cause of disease and the remedy for its cure; but only that there should be a similarity in the symptoms or manifestations they are known to be capable of producing on the healthy organism.

The word Homœopathy comes from the two Greek words which signify like and affection, or disease, and not by any means the same thing or cause. In the first place, all our experiments with medicinal agents are made, not on the sick, but on the healthy, since in this way only can their specific or pathogenetic action be determined. Thus we learn, for example, that Opium produces stupor, slow full pulse, constipation, and a long train of symptoms peculiarly its own, and differing in many respects from those of any other drug. In practice, when we see all these indications presenting themselves in a patient, and we know they are not the result of Opium, we reason that the morbid agent (whatever it may be) has the peculiarity of acting on the same organs or tissues, otherwise the symptoms could not be similar. Knowing also that two positives repel each other, and that two similar substances cannot occupy the same space at the same time, we prescribe Opium in such small quantities as to preclude the possibility of its producing an aggravation; and this is the system according to which Homœopaths prescribe all their remedies for all diseases. As examples of the practical workings of this law, we may refer to vaccination as a prophylactic of small pox, the application of cold for frozen limbs, &c., and as we have no hesitation in proclaiming this to be the only correct theory for the treatment of diseases with internal remedies.

"—the universal Cause Acts not by partial but by general laws."

The allusion to mechanical injuries, cutting instruments, &c., as an argument, requires no notice; but the following remark does require it. It is this:—"In fact we never hear of Homœopathic surgery." If the Doctor hears nothing of "Homœopathic surgery," it is his fault, not ours. Did he not hear of the circumstance that occurred on the 10th day of last July, in the city of Chicago, where in umbilical hernia four feet ten inches of diseased intestine were cut away, the ends carefully adjusted, and the life of the patient saved? If he did not, he must have been a careless reader, as the case was reported at the time in the papers; but his not having heard of it may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that the operation was performed by Dr. G. D. Bebee, a Homœopathic physician. Had he been an Allopath, the daring feat (for daring it was, and the only instance of the kind on record) would have been heralded all over two continents, as one of the wonders and triumphs of modern surgery.

But the most amusing part of the whole article is that in which the writer labors to make it appear that the members of his school are so exceedingly reformatory, as to be eagerly watching and waiting to embrace every new truth in science or religion whenever it may present itself. The facts show the contrary; for no orthodox sect in religion was ever more intolerant, conservative or prejudiced against new truths in theology, than the old school of medicine has always been towards all those who differed from it in reference to therapeutics.

We can scarcely remember one new or important truth in medicine having been advanced or proposed that was not immediately and unmercifully attacked by almost the entire profession.

When Jenner discovered and advanced his theory of vaccination, he was denounced as a charlatan, a pretender and quack; every misrepresentation was resorted to for the purpose of exciting the popular prejudice against him. It was currently reported that vaccination would convert a child into a calf, and instances were cited where horns, tail, and hoofs had actually sprouted out of those who had resorted to the operation.

In the case of Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood, the persecution was similar; and it is a well-known fact that no physician who at that time was over thirty years of age ever embraced the doctrine as long as he lived. We would therefore say to Dr. Baker, if he is disposed to accept newly discovered truths either in medicine or theology, and to keep step to the music of reform, he occupies a bad position for making accurate observations.

Respectfully,
C. FEARSON, M. D.

VOLUTION.

BY J. T. C.

The real concrete things are:—1. Space; 2. Time; 3. Substance, and perhaps, 4. Nothing or 0 may be added. But it is a necessity of language to treat abstractions as if they were things by themselves; so that, taking the ultimate abstractions of substance, we have 1. Space, 2. Time, 3. Consciousness or Sensation, 4. Extension, 5. Position, 6. Duration, 7. Date or Time when, 8. Number, 9. Motion, 10. Quantity, 11. 0 as ultimate terms in which all phenomena are to be expressed. Substance is commonly regarded as made up of qualities (Extension, Position, Duration, Date, Number, Motion, Quantity) plus a substratum. In ourselves we know the substratum as Consciousness (Sensation.) As far as we can compare our substance with other substance, we find them to be the same, hence it is very probable that the substratum of all substances is consciousness, as is assumed in the above list.

These categories, Space, Time, Substance, Nothing, remain constant. They cannot change into each

PROPOSED DOGMAS OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

[From the Jewish Times for March 4, 1870.]

The Augsburg Gazette publishes that portion of the Papal Syllabus known as Canones de Ecclesia, proposed to the Council at Rome as the new dogmatic scheme. The following is a translation:—

OF THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

CANON 1. If any man say that the religion of Christ does not exist, and is not expressed in any particular association instituted by Christ himself, but that it may be properly observed and exercised by individuals separately, without relation to any society which may be the true Church of Christ, let him be anathema.

2. If any man say that the Church has not received from the Lord Jesus Christ any certain and immutable form of constitution, but that, like other human associations, it has been subject, or may be subject, according to the changes of times, to vicissitudes and variations, let him be anathema.

3. If any man say that the Church of the Divine promises is not an external and visible society, but is entirely internal and invisible, let him be anathema.

4. If any man say that the true Church is not a body one in itself, but that it is composed of various and dispersed societies bearing the Christian title, and that it is common to them all, or that various societies differing from each other in profession of faith and holding separate communion, constitute, as members and portions, a Church of Christ, one and universal, let him be anathema.

5. If any man say that the Church of Christ is not a society absolutely necessary for eternal salvation, or that men may be saved by the adoption of any other religion whatsoever, let him be anathema.

6. If any man say that this intolerance, whereby the Catholic Church proscribes and condemns all religious sects which are separate from her communion, is not prescribed by the Divine law, or that with respect to the truth of religion it is possible to have opinions only, not certainties, and that, consequently, all religious sects should be tolerated by the Church, let him be anathema.

7. If any man say that the same Church of Christ may be obscured by darkness or infected with evil, in consequence of which it may depart from the wholesome truth of the faith and morals, deviate from its original institution or terminate only in becoming corrupt and depraved, let him be anathema.

8. If any man say that the present Church of Christ is not the last and supreme institution for obtaining salvation, but that another is to be looked for from a new and fuller outpouring of the Holy Spirit, let him be anathema.

9. If any man say that the infallibility of the Church is restricted solely to things which are contained in Divine revelation, and that it does not also extend to other truths which are necessarily in order, that the great gift of revelation may be preserved in its integrity, let him be anathema.

10. If any man say that the Church is not a perfect society, but a corporation (collegium), or that as such in respect of civil society or the State it is subject to secular domination, let him be anathema.

11. If any man say that the Church, divinely instituted, is like to a society of equals; that the bishops have indeed an office and a ministry, but not a power of governing proper to themselves, which is bestowed upon them by divine ordination, and which they ought to exercise freely, let him be anathema.

12. If any hold that Christ, our Lord and Sovereign, has only conferred upon His Church a directing power by means of its counsels and persuasions, but not of ordering by its laws, or of constraining and compelling by external judgments and statutory penalties those who wander and those who are contumacious, let him be anathema.

13. If any man say that the true Church of Christ, out of which no one can be saved, is any other than the Holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church, let him be anathema.

14. If any say that the Apostle St. Peter has not been instituted by our Lord Christ as Prince of all the Apostles and visible head of the Church Militant, or that he received only the pre-eminence of honor, but not the primacy of true and sole jurisdiction, let him be anathema.

15. If any man say that it does not follow from the institution of our Lord Christ himself that St. Peter has perpetual succession in his primacy over the Universal Church, or that the Roman Pontiff is not by Divine right the successor of Peter in that same primacy, let him be anathema.

16. If any man say that the Roman Pontiff has only a function of inspection and of direction, but not a full and supreme power of jurisdiction over the Universal Church, or that this power is not ordinary and immediate over the whole Church, taken as a whole or separately, let him be anathema.

17. If any man say that the independent ecclesiastical power respecting which the Church teaches that it has been conferred upon it by Christ, and the supreme civil power cannot co-exist so that the rights of each may be observed, let him be anathema.

18. If any man say that the power which is necessary for the government of civil society does not emanate from God, or that no obedience is due to it by virtue even of the law of God or that such power is repugnant to the natural liberty of man, let him be anathema.

19. If any man say that all rights existing among other. Space cannot become Substance. Time can not become Substance. Substance cannot begin in 0 or end in 0. Each category is eternal and always remains itself. This is also true of the ultimate abstractions. Thus, Motion can never become Sensation, or Sensation Motion. Yet Motion seems to originate Sensation; but this admits of an explanation. In order for the sensation in one substance to unite with the sensation in another substance, the two substances must come into contact.

The Number of Substance (in the sense used here) is a question of Integers. In common language we call things integers that may not be really individuals, but aggregates or parts of individuals. But a real concrete integer is an integer of consciousness, an individual. But as the word Individual implies the erroneous belief that an individual cannot be divided into several individuals, the word Integer will be here used in its place.

The law of integers is that substances in contact form one substance, one Integer, one unit. Integrity, or unity, is perfect in proportion to the perfection of contact. When the connection is slight, sensations are separated and there are different imperfect subordinate integers. If it were possible to bring two men into perfect contact, part to part, they would form one man instead of two. As Substance is divided into atoms, contact is not perfect and continuous in time, and therefore there are no perfect integers. Our surroundings are parts of our being in so far as we are in contact with them—the ego and the non-ego are not perfectly distinct. Moreover the ego is not perfectly connected in its parts. We are made up of subordinate integers. The atom is the lowest integer, and the sum of all atoms, the universe, is the highest integer. We are subordinate integers to the universe, just as our atoms, cells and nervous centres are subordinate integers to us.

One kind of motion may change into another kind of motion, and one kind of sensation may change into another kind of sensation. Phenomena are fully explained when stated in terms of the ultimate categories, of which Motion and Sensation are the most prominent. Consciousness (in its special meaning) is the sensation (consciousness) of an integer, and varies in perfection with the perfection of the integer. Volition is the motion of an integer. It is motion in accordance with sensations, the avoiding of painful contacts and the seeking of pleasant contacts. It is a change in the direction of motion, not in its quantity, for motion cannot originate or end in anything except motion. But, when a contact is sought or avoided, there must have been a prior contact either pleasant or unpleasant, in order for the integers concerned to know whether the contact would be pleasant or not. Hence Volition is designed motion.

The first contact could not have resulted from a prior contact (been designed,) because there was no contact before the first contact. This first contact, being undesigned, is fortuitous. Chance is undesigned contact. From this we get the universal law,— Originally undesigned motion becomes designed by means of chance contacts.

The lower integers gradually form themselves, by coalescence, into higher integers, getting a greater mass of sensation; and these higher integers gradually become more secure from painful contacts. Imperfect volition becomes more perfect as design becomes more definite; and consciousness becomes more perfect as contact becomes more perfect and the mass in contact larger.

The motion is in accordance with the sensations because, so to speak, the sensations themselves are things that move. In language we separate the noun from the verb, but in the concrete reality there is no such separation. We are dealing with abstractions. Substance is the true thing by itself. It may be said that determination implies necessity, and that chance is also a form of necessity. But the personal determination of volition is very different from the impersonal determination of chance, and should not be confounded with it. The direction of a volitional motion is not the resultant of the direction of the motions preceding it; but the direction of an aggregate of integers will coincide with this resultant nearer and nearer in proportion to the number of integers.

SARCASTIC.—“Well, Judge,” said our reporter, “you seem to have recovered your composure since yesterday.”

Judge Stallo—I was not aware that I had lost it.

Reporter—Judge Storer threw some hard bricks at you, though. How did you feel?

Judge Stallo—Well, about as Professor James D. Dana is said to have felt on one occasion when a piece of brick came unexpectedly in his way. You know the story?

Reporter—No, what is it?

Judge Stallo—Dana, the mineralogist, was to lecture on granite, and had sent to his desk specimen pieces of its three constituents—quartz, mica and feldspar. The boys, for fun, abstracted the feldspar, and substituted an old piece of brick. Dana came in and lectured, illustrating by the exhibition of his specimens as he went along. ‘This, gentlemen,’ he said, ‘is a piece of quartz; this is a piece of mica; and this, (taking up the brick and looking at it with astonishment), is a piece of impudence.’ So I thought Judge Storer’s opinion, looking at it beside the hard quartz of Judge Taft, and the glittering mica of Judge Hagans, was a piece of—brick.—Cincinnati Commercial.

men are derived from the political State, or that there is no authority besides that which is communicated by such State, let him be anathema.

20. If any say that in the law of the political State or in the public opinion of men has been deposited the supreme rule of conscience for public and social actions, or that the judgments by which the Church pronounces upon what is lawful and what is unlawful do not extend to such actions, or that by the force of civil law an act which by virtue of Divine or ecclesiastical law is unlawful can become lawful, let him be anathema.

21. If any man say that the laws of the Church have no binding force until they have been confirmed by the sanction of the civil power, or that it belongs to the said civil power to judge and to decree in matters of religion, by virtue of its supreme authority, let him be anathema.

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS IN CHINA.

[From “China and the Chinese, by Rev. J. L. Nevins, Ten Years a Missionary in China.”]

That benevolent societies are found in a heathen land, may appear strange to Western readers; but it is a fact that they exist in China in numbers and variety hardly exceeded in Christian lands. In comparing these institutions with those of the West, one is also struck with the similarity which exists in their nature and objects. We have here Orphan Asylums, Institutions for the Relief of Widows, as well as for the Aged and Infirm, Public Hospitals, and Free Schools, together with other kindred institutions more peculiarly Chinese in their character. Moral tracts are also distributed to a great extent.

Roman Catholics have claimed the honor of introducing these societies into China, but there is evidence that they existed anterior to the introduction of Christianity; and there is no necessity for seeking for them a foreign origin, as they grow naturally out of the customs and institutions of the people. These associations, whether in China or in Christian lands, have their common origin in the instinctive sentiment of pity which mankind everywhere feel for the unfortunate and distressed, and the natural promptings of the heart to afford the necessary relief.

Orphan Asylums are found in almost every city, and frequently in country villages. They are established by a wealthy individual, or several individuals associated together, and are sometimes supported by a permanent fund, or the proceeds of lands given for that purpose. Most children brought to these establishments are infants whose parents are too poor to support them.

In Hang-Chow, the provincial capital of Che-Kiang, I found, in connection with a variety of benevolent institutions, an Asylum for Old Men, in which I became particularly interested, and which I frequently visited. It contained, in 1859, about five hundred inmates. The building was large, the beneficiaries were made very comfortable, and everything connected with the establishment was carried on with as much order and system as in a similar institution in our country. In addition to an immense dining-room, kitchen, and sleeping apartments, conveniences were afforded in separate buildings for making different articles of handicraft, and the inmates were at liberty to spend as much time as they chose working at some trade, and to make such use as they pleased of whatever they might earn in this way.

Societies for affording pecuniary aid to widows are very common, and exist either independently or in connection with societies embracing several distinct objects conjointly. Immediately after the death of her husband, a widow receives a larger stipend than at any subsequent time, in order to assist her in providing for her young children. This allowance is gradually diminished; and as old age approaches, women of this class, if they have no children able to support them, are sometimes transferred to another establishment, which provides for the wants of the aged and infirm.

The most popular of the benevolent institutions in Ning-po, and the one having by far the largest income, includes a variety of objects. It has a fund for providing coffins for the poor, a fund for carrying coffins which have been thrown carelessly aside to some suitable place for interment, and one for collecting and burying again human bones which are found exposed to view; also a fund for providing medicine in summer, and warm clothes in winter; a fund for the relief of widows; one for gathering old printed paper, and, the only one in Ning-po, for suppressing immoral books. This society has a large building, with as many secretaries and superintendents as are necessary for the orderly and efficient carrying on of its extensive operations.

Tea is in many places provided for travellers, and offered gratuitously in resting-houses by the roadside. Poor scholars are furnished with money for travelling expenses in attending the literary examinations.

Free Day Schools are everywhere to be met with, and some of the larger cities contain several of them. Each one is usually instituted and supported by the benefactions of a rich individual or family. It is not considered very respectable to attend these charity schools, and the pupils in them are, for the most part, the children of the poor. As a general thing, they are also not so well taught as other schools. While it is not considered very respectable to attend a native free school, it is still less so to attend a foreign one. An effort to start a Christian day school some years since in the city of Chin-hai induced the natives to add to the number of their own schools, so that another pupil could not be obtained in the city.

A CRITICISM FROM HOLLAND.

The following letter, remarkable as being written by a man nearly seventy-nine years old, and as being written in English by a Hollander, is particularly interesting for the thoughts it suggests. We print it, therefore, adding a few words of comment which may be useful as throwing light on the general positions of the Free Religious Association. We submit the letter in full, omitting only a few lines of import purely personal which can have no interest for our readers:—

Mr. Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City:—

AMSTERDAM, 17th Feb., 1870.

DEAR SIR:—I have not only had the proceedings of the Free Religious Association held in Boston in May, 1869, but I have even studied them. I had once a like society, about fifteen years ago, but I abandoned it and preside now over a more positive i. e. a more materialistic society, whose members know what they want.

Your members may call themselves free thinkers, but truth does not allow us to remain free; surely by assisting a meeting, where the most liberal ideas are propounded, others, who are still walking in clouds, may become awake and gradually change colors, but there can be no cohesion with you without a positive guard and a positive aim. It is very well to say:—we only wish to agree in pure virtue, good morals, and common truths, but that is easier said than done. And the first great question should be, Is there a God,—a being, separate from the universe, who created, who judges mankind, nations or individuals, who can be made meek by prayer, &c., or not? The second question should be:—Is there human life of individuals after their demise and burial, and have they then to be judged or not? The third question should be:—Is society, as formed in our days, the end of human destination, or do we live under blunders and mistakes? Is competition or unison our earthly destination? Is free trade, combined with the double competition with our compatriots and with foreign nations at the same time, the requirement of our nature, or are we to live under a national brotherhood, that weightily deliberates and concludes to act for the nation as a single company or firm?

Truth and not circumstances must lead our ideas. Now there is one particular circumstance in which you differ vastly from Europe.

You have plenty of excellent soil, that waits for arms, hands, and souls of many millions of men, which we have not. You have ground for $2 to $12 an acre, whilst we (e. g. in the Netherlands) pay 12,000 for 2½ acres (what we call a hunder) of meadow or tillage ground. Differences and consequences, out of such different circumstances, grow forth like plants; and to that I ascribe the lack of socialistic speeches in your meeting,—a want that struck no one of you, but believe me the time will come, I cannot say after how many generations, that your population and its increase will bring your ideas round to ours in our new society.

Excuse this very short argument.

I remain, Dear Sir, yours very truly,

H. I. BERLIN.

The three points our friend makes show how far in his case circumstances have affected the bent and shaped the character of his own thought. He calls himself a Materialist, not, it would appear, in the philosophical sense, but as an anti-supra-naturalist, who considers man sufficient to himself; as a Secularist, whose interest is wholly in the affairs of this world; as a Socialist, whose conception of heaven is satisfied by the contemplation of a purely human state of society on this side of the grave. Yet we may sympathize with him in all these beliefs without being technically Materialists. In fact, his letter, which we may remark, gives voice to a common feeling among ourselves, has not ruffled a hair of our heads. The God Mr. Berlin discards is generally discarded by Theists, and even by spiritually minded Christians. Would he quarrel with a belief in a Deity who is not separated from the universe, but who is the law and life of it; whose creation was not mechanical, but is perpetual; who has no judgment day for nations or individuals, but who writes his decrees in the constitution of Nature; who, so far from changing or softening under the influence of prayer, is forever immutable?

He will have no God who interferes with the world, exacts tributes of money, time, or thought, demands service on penalty of punishment if refused, draws people away from their work in order to please him, and sets up a special tribunal of sins against his name. But where is the Theist, nay, where is the Mystic Spiritualist, who will have such a God as that?

Mr. Berlin's objection to the belief in a personal immortality may be, probably is, that this belief is distracting to mind and feeling. The future life absorbs the attention that this claims. Especially when regarded as the scene of retribution, it embarrasses thought, excites disabling fears and hopes, dislocates moral purpose, to a degree that throws ordinary life into confusion. But a belief in immortality that brings with it none of these results, that leaves men wholly free to fulfil their social destiny, gladdening them as they do so, and aiding them to do so by the sense of larger being that it imparts, can hardly be prejudicial to the practical conduct of existence.

The condition of European, as indeed of English society, is such that earnest men are more concerned to know the conditions of just and kindly living, than to discover the mystery of the God-head; the next life for them is the nearest life; salvation is well-being; religion is the bond that unites men in human brotherhood; hell means poverty, ignorance, squalor, disease, vice, untimely death, over-work, under-pay, competition, conflict of interests, disfranchisement, the changing of men and women into beasts; and heaven means escape from all this wretchedness through the re-organization of industrial, social, and political life. They are Socialists under some form, more or less scientific and elaborate. They incline to Positivism because it puts divine things into actual relations, identifies God with humanity, immortalizes the individual in the race, and so concentrates every working faculty on the task of reconstructing the actual order of things. In America this necessity is not apparent yet, except in large cities; and there it is mitigated by the incessant ebb and flow of population, carrying the helpless life into the immeasurable country, and bringing fresh supplies of new life in. But the social problem begins to press over here. It is either pushing speculative problems to the wall, or it is absorbing them. Positivism is gaining a hearing from the working classes; Reform is taking the place of religion; Social organizations are supplanting ecclesiastical; co-operative enterprises are withdrawing interest from churches; and "Socialism" is eating away the dogmatic heart of Christianity. The religion of humanity bids fair to become the religion of the future.

It is unquestionably true that force in organization is proportioned to narrowness. Condensation and immediate efficiency go together, as nothing proves more demonstrably than the history of sects. Close organization demands a dogma,—working organizations need sharp tools. Positivism therefore has a creed. And Free Religion, whenever it comes to its practical application and work, will most surely have a definite basis and aim. No battle can be done with abstractions for weapons; that is understood. But ideas are not mere abstractions. And the present main work of the Free Religious Association is with ideas. It is open to all the light that Positivism or Materialism has to give. It would discuss and discover the principles of human society. But it is no local organization, and institutes no machinery for the application of these principles. All that it leaves to the people who shall be persuaded of their value. It would hold the elements of thought in solution till the process of crystallization shall take place according to natural laws. Its first duty is to emancipate. Most certainly it has in view ulterior purposes, which are the moral development of the individual and the renovation of society. But preliminary to the attainment of these, brotherhood must be effected, if possible, in spiritual relations; the tyranny of sectarianism must be thrown off; the spell of mechanical inspiration must be broken; the charm of traditions must be dissolved; the superstitions that cling to names, books, forms, persons must be displaced; and the reason be enabled to work with perfect freedom on all problems of life and experience. This result effected, and in time it will be effected, an immense quantity of intellectual and moral power at present squandered on vain, unprofitable issues, will be liberated and placed at the disposal of vital principles.

What Mr. Berlin intimates is undoubtedly true,—thought cannot forever remain in a state of solution. Freedom is only a condition; and when the condition is fulfilled, the ends it was designed to serve must claim the undivided and unswerving allegiance of their friends. The Free Religious Association is not a motley assemblage of people of every variety of mental disagreement, occupying a platform to which it invites all the discordant elements of opinion; it is rather a free organization in the service of truth. It means not freedom of expression merely, but loyalty to reason and its results. It means justice, brotherhood, the harmony of religions, mutual confidence and happiness in society, allegiance to the known laws of matter and of mind as giving revelation of human destiny. The fixed condition of society in Europe may drive reformers beyond the outmost lines of religious thought into avowed materialism or socialism, as professed by French and German theorists. But in America the case stands otherwise. Sectarianism is strong here, but mind is active, untrammelled, versatile, flexible, transferable, and we need not despair of carrying it over long reaches of intellectual territory, even across mountain ranges, without once forcing it into subterranean channels. At all events this is the faith of the men who instituted the Free Religious Association, and in this faith they labor.

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY," Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAYER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

A man in Erlau, Hungary, recently took his child to church for baptism. The priest, on learning that the godmother was a Jewess, refused to proceed; when the man took his child to the holy basin, and with great solemnity and in a loud voice baptized it himself and gave it into the godmother's arms, asking her blessing, which she gave. The burgomaster registered the baptism as legal, and the people are anxiously awaiting the decision of the archbishop.

"Mother, what did father pray to General Grant so much in church for yesterday?" asked the bright little daughter of a ministerial friend lately. "I don't know that he did, sis." "Why, yes; don't you know? He was always saying, 'Grant, we beseech thee.'"

THE BIBLE AND PROTECTION.

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

"The tariff sentiment, being selfish and local, has degraded the public manhood of Pennsylvania, until it may be said, that that State, the second in the Union in population, has less influence in Congress than Indiana or Iowa. The Pennsylvania delegation behaves like a set of old girls in a boarding-house, of no separate force, but powerful to 'pout,' and make faces, and carry scandals. The Pennsylvania people know nothing of what is passing in the exterior world, because all their newspapers are kept silent. They have routed Wayland's Political Economy from their schools. They have entered into a conspiracy to keep still within their boundaries, hopeful that the agitation upon the tariff will also cease without. This is like children lying abed very breathless, to stop the wind blowing round the house.

"The next thing they must stop in Pennsylvania is the circulation of the Bible, a dangerous free-trade book. Look at the story of Joseph and his brothers, which is a free-trade episode from beginning to end. Joseph heaps up corn against a famine, supplies the people of Canaan, and charges no export duty. 'Now it came to pass, as they emptied their sacks, that, behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack.'

"If Mr. Morrill had lived in the year 1, A. D., he would have met the Wise Men on the frontier of Judea, and observing their gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh, he would have run out his spectacles and taken counsel of the tariff list:—

"Frankincense, six hundred per cent. duty. Foreign myrrh, eighty-five cents an ounce, payable in gold."

"Again, the story of the Queen of Sheba is a perfect idyl of free-trade. She passed and repassed freely, notwithstanding her 'camels that bare spices and gold in abundance, and precious stones.'

"The only high tariff stories in the entire Scriptures that I can recall, refer to the miserable conduct of Laban, who moved the tariff up seven years on Jacob, and the reprehensible meanness of Pharaoh in the matter of the straw, bricks and deferred passports to the Israelites. The New Testament is a more dangerous free-trade document than Mr. Well's reports, and all such texts as the following must be expurgated from Pennsylvania editions:—

"Woe unto you, hypocrites! For ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within are full of extortion and excess."

"Note, also, that when the devils were cast out of the man possessed, they were transferred to swine, and the Pennsylvania pig comes of this identical breed."

FAITH IN AMERICAN IDEAS.—The most touching story ever told of Abraham Lincoln relates how a few months after his death negroes in Cuba recently kidnapped from Africa, and unable to speak either English or Spanish, were found wearing photographs of the dead President upon their bosoms. They worshipped his memory; they held the confident belief that he would, ere long, rise from the dead and enfranchise them. In some sense the weary and the troubled of every European nation cherish the same ideal of the United States. Shall we not extend it to the swarming Orient? Let us teach the poorest and humblest man in that cradle and beehive of the race likewise to regard our soil as a waiting refuge, our flag as a talisman, which, the moment his feet are planted under it, will send all his burdens of slavery and caste and want crumbling to the ground as rolled the load of sin from the shoulders of Christian when first he stood before the cross. If the sharp experiences of the war have taught us anything, it is that democratic institutions, based upon free suffrage, can stand any strain. Edmund Quincy, after hinting at the high ability, character and culture of the old Federalists, adds, in a remark of profound truth and significance:—"It was their little faith in ideas that caused their disappearance from the world of politics; and it was his unbounded faith in ideas that gave to Thomas Jefferson, in spite of all his faults of character and his inconsistencies and errors of public conduct, that controlling power over the minds of men which has not died with him, but is giving direction and shape to the history, not only of his own country, but of all Christendom." Let us have faith in ideas, in human nature, and in the American system.—A. D. Richardson.

"UNDISPRIVACED."—"Undisprived!"—What a word! It's the newest thing out, in Boston. Mr. Lowell has, with great labor and sweat, with the Atlantic Monthly for a fulcrum, and a very long poem entitled "The Cathedral"—bucis a non—for a lever, pried it off from the banks of the Charles river and dropped it with a polysyllabic crash into the tide of the language. "Undisprived!" It means—easy enough—the opposite of undisprived, and it is made by a process of accretion, simple as congelation. The foundation of the word—the basis of this four-story polysyllable with a French roof—is "privacy." You take that word to start with—go at it with a club and knock off the end of it—punch it into the shape of an active verb—freeze on the primitive prefix dis, and upon that tack the negative un—see?—just as easy as rolling off a log. After all, what's the use of having all these component, constituent and simple words, unless once in a while you can put them together—Boston-fashion—and make a regular old paralleliped of a word, that you can't take to pieces without nitro-glycerine. Here's this "undisprived," for instance. What a triumph of verbal architecture that is! The only objection to it is that if it should happen to drop down into the tropics, it's liable to thaw and drop all to pieces.—Hartford Post.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

The City of Toledo.

To Capitalists and Manufacturers.

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.

In 1850—3,829.

In 1860—13,784.

In 1866—24,401.

In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of sidewalks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Nov. 28, 1869.]

"It (the necessity of taking life) exists between nations during war,—or a nation and one of its component parts in a rebellion or insurrection,—or between individuals during the moment of an attempt against life which cannot otherwise be repelled; but between society and individuals, organized as the former now is, with all the means of repression and self-defence at its command, never. I come, then, to the conclusion in which I desire most explicitly to be understood, that, although the right to punish with death might be abstractedly conceded to exist in certain societies and under certain circumstances which might make it necessary, yet, composed as society now is, these circumstances cannot reasonably be even supposed to occur; that, therefore, no necessity, and of course no right, to inflict death as a punishment, exists."

EDWARD LIVINGSTON, Argument against Capital Punishment, published in the Introduction to the Criminal Code of Louisiana (1820-1824).

"Whatever be the hand that commits it, homicide is never moral teaching. However honest and conscientious may be your tribunals and your judges, it will never be by killing that you will prove 'thou must not kill.'"

CHARLES HUGO, The Execution of Montcharnont (for publishing which in his paper, L'Evenement, Hugo was fined $100 and imprisoned six months, although defended most eloquently by his father, Victor Hugo).

Rochdale, January 5, 1868.

H. M. BOVER, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I do not think the punishment of death is necessary to the security and well-being of society; and I believe its total abolition would not tend to increase those crimes which it is now supposed by many to prevent. The security and well-being of society do not depend on the severity of punishments. Barbarism in the law promotes barbarism among those subject to the law; and acts of cruelty under the law become examples of similar acts contrary to the law. The real security for human life is to be found in a reverence for it. If the law regarded it as inviolable, then the people would begin also so to regard it. A deep reverence for human life is worth more than a thousand executions in the prevention of murder, and is, in fact, the great security for human life. The law of capital punishment, whilst pretending to support this reverence, does, in fact, tend to destroy it. If the death penalty is of any force in any case to deter from crime, it is of much more force in lessening our cliff security against it, for it proclaims the fact that kings, parliaments, judges, and juries may determine when and how men may be put to death by violence, and familiarity with this idea cannot strengthen the reverence for human life. To put men to death for crimes, civil or political, is to give proof of weakness rather than strength, and of barbarism rather than Christian civilization. If the United States could get rid of the gallows, it would not stand long here. One by one, two "Americanized" our institutions; and, I hope, in all that is good, we may not be unwilling to follow you. I am very truly yours,

JOHN BRIGHT.

[From the Detroit Post, Oct. 21, 1869.]

Conrad Meier, the convicted and condemned murderer whose execution was appointed to take place in this city on Dec. 8, has just "broke jail," and fled for his life to parts unknown. I am glad of it. With the utmost deliberation and full knowledge of what the words imply, I repeat, I am glad of it. His escape, I admit, is a dangerous defeat of the ends of justice, at least in the common opinion of the community; but none the less do I experience a sense of relief that this poor wretch, guilty as I suppose he is, will not be legally strangled to death a week from next Wednesday by the State of Ohio,—that the atmosphere will not be made thick and stifling on that day, while a defenceless man is murdered, in cold blood and with malice aforethought, by this great and prosperous commonwealth. You may call the act an execution, if you please,—it is none the less a murder; and I rejoice that this horrible tragedy is indefinitely postponed. I am glad that Meier is gone; I hope he will never be re-captured; and what is more, I believe that you are secretly as glad as I am,—that your hope is secretly as strong as mine.

Now, friends, there is something wrong in all this,—I frankly admit it. There is something most decidedly wrong, when men who wish well to the State, —who desire to see its laws respected, obeyed and sustained,—are obliged to take pleasure in a public defeat of those laws. It is extremely disastrous when the law of Nature and the law of Man are thus brought into open conflict. But yet I see no help for it, so long as Man's law remains unadjusted to Nature's law. "The laws of any community," President Walker, of Harvard University, used to say, "are simply the expression of its average conscience." This is true, though it would be more exact to say that the laws of any community are the expression of the average conscience as it was several generations back; for changes in the laws by no means keep pace with changes in public sentiment and conviction. Our statute-books are full of laws which are practically a dead-letter. On the whole, however, it is true that the average conscience is pretty fairly expressed in the laws which are, at any particular period, actively and habitually enforced. But for this very reason the finer and more highly cultured conscience of the period,—the conscience of those men and women who see the inadequacy or positive injustice of the laws, and labor for their reform,—is often forced into open antagonism with them. This is the origin of every battle between the law of the land and what is well called the "higher law,"—that is, between the average conscience of the community and the conscience of the more enlightened portion of it. The bulk of the people are contented with things as they are; the more thoughtful and conscientious portion of the people will not be contented except with things as they ought to be. Thus a constant warfare of conservative and radical, of stationary and progressive, exists, without which society would stagnate and decay. The growing uneasiness with which civilized communities regard the death penalty, is clearly, in my opinion, occasioned by the expanding conscience of the race, which begins to realize the truth that no man is wholly a brute, that criminals are men, and that something better can be done with them than to stamp their life out under the heels of the multitude. The great faith in man which lies at the root of American civilization and is the grand inspiration of Free Religion, begins already to teach the inviolability of human life, and to throw a sacred protection even over those who have themselves dared to violate it. Yes, society is slowly learning that hardest of lessons, how to overcome evil with good,—how to take the desperate outcast out of his desperation, and, while restraining him from further evil, to melt his hardened heart with kindness and love.

Society has no right to forget that criminals become such, nine cases in ten, because of its own criminal neglect; and remembering this, it will treat them less as criminals than as unfortunates. What are you and I doing to rescue the children of vice and poverty from their surroundings? What are we doing to educate them into habits of self-respect, to place them in situations where virtue shall be possible, to give them a fair chance in the great struggle of life? What right have you and I to hang a man for being what you and I, by our neglect, have made him? We shall have no right to hang anybody, until we have given everybody at least a chance to be honest and upright; and then we shall not want to hang at all. Society approaches this whole question from the wrong side, when it considers first of all the injury the criminal has done to itself. First of all it ought to consider, what good have I ever done to the criminal? The frank and earnest investigation of this problem would work a vast reform in our penal legislation, and we should discover that the prevention of crime must be sought, not in the erection of jail and gallows, but in the erection of reform-schools and agricultural colleges and every species of educational institution by which the young vagabond of our streets shall be trained to useful industry. It makes my heart sick to think of the great mass of humanity predestined to crime in all our cities by the moral poison they inhale at every breath; and it gives me no comfort to remember that we can hang them all, the moment they yield to temptation. Society makes its own criminals, friends; shall it dare defend its right to hang them when made? I carry the war into Africa. Let society do its duty by the child, and it never need strangle the adult. A century ago, the Marquis Beccaria uttered this memorable prediction:—"The punishment of death must disappear from the earth, when knowledge and not ignorance shall be the portion of the greater number." In universal education, opening an honorable career for every child, will yet be found the surest remedy for pauperism and crime: but until the means of entering upon this honorable career shall be within the reach of all, I deny point-blank the right of society to murder its unfortunates.

The evil, however, of which I complain,—that condition of the modern world which makes the birth of thousands of children tantamount to their direct compulsion to a career of crime,—is very ancient, and hard to cure. What must be done meanwhile, before means are devised to right this wrong? Crime must be repressed in the most efficient way, or society will dissolve into anarchy. Law and order are such priceless benefits, that they must be preserved at every cost. Capital Punishment, it is urged, is indispensable, in the actual state of things, in order to secure the prevention of crime; and this is its sufficient justification.

Now while this defence of Capital Punishment is almost the only one put forward deliberately at the present day, I think its force is often secretly enhanced in the minds of many by a feeling that the worst criminals deserve death,—that their loss of life is a righteous retribution for the evil they have done. But this feeling I conceive to be utterly wrong, if made a reason for continuing the death penalty. It is neither more nor less than the sentiment of gratified vengeance; it is a vindictive emotion, unworthy of an enlightened soul. It is no part of our province to deal out the deserts of iniquity, as such; the rights of society do not include this power of rewarding or punishing the individual on purely moral grounds. With the abstract right or wrong of human actions, society has nothing to do; it must regard them solely as beneficial or injurious to social order, and scrupulously forbear from assigning to them either rewards or punishments on the score of their moral character. The murderer may or may not deserve to be hung; but in any case that is no reason for hanging him. The only justifiable reasons for the infliction of penalties are three,—reformation of the criminal, reparation to the injured party, prevention of future crime. Now the death penalty can neither reform the criminal nor make any reparation to the murdered man; its only possible justification must, therefore, be the prevention of future crime. The defence of Capital Punishment turns wholly on this one point, regardless of the moral fitness or unfitness of the penalty; and it should be carefully observed, that to advocate the infliction of death as a punishment on the score of its moral appropriateness or desert, is to make the State usurp the functions of the private conscience, and meddle with matters which ought to be sacred from all public interference. The sole question is,—is Capital Punishment necessary to prevent crime? As long ago as the time of Nero, it was perceived by the philosopher Seneca, that retribution is no part of a just punishment:—"No wise man," he says, "punishes because crime has been committed, but only in order that crime may not be committed [Nemo prudens punit quia peccatum est, sed ne peccetur]." Unless essential to the prevention of crime, Capital Punishment cannot be for a moment justified to an enlightened conscience on the plea that the criminal deserves death, as the reward of his crime. It is no business of the State what he deserves, unless the State is authorized to sit as moral umpire and judge in cases of conscience, to weigh motives, and execute vengeance for sins as such,—than which nothing could be more tyrannical or absurd. Keep out of the problem, therefore, all questions of moral desert, and confine it strictly to the one inquiry into social consequences.

The general question, however, whether the State has any right to inflict the death penalty even to secure the prevention of crime, must be first settled. The right to punish capital depends on the ABSOLUTE NECESSITY of capital punishment. On this point, the great and good Edward Livingston, in his Introduction to the Criminal Code of Louisiana, has, I believe, laid down the right principles:—"The right to inflict death exists, but it must be in defence either of individual or social existence; and it is limited to the case where no other alternative remains to prevent the threatened destruction." In the application of these principles, Mr. Livingston holds that a nation may wage a defensive war against another nation, or may suppress by arms a rebellion or insurrection, since in these cases no alternative remains; but that society never need take the life of an individual, since the alternative of imprisonment always remains, and since an individual can never threaten its actual existence. This, however, seems to be an inference not correctly drawn. What is social existence? Not the existence of the individuals who compose society, as Mr. Livingston apparently assumes; all of these, of course, no one criminal could seriously threaten. But social existence is the existence of that social order, that established organic law, which secures life and property to all the members of society; and a case may be conceived in which single individuals might so endanger this aggregate stability and peace as to justify the taking of their lives in simple self-defence. I am inclined to justify the action of "Vigilance Committees" in certain cases. At any rate, the question whether capital punishment is essential to social existence cannot be settled a priori for all communities; the only principle that will hold is this, that wherever it has become possible to maintain a reasonable degree of public security to life and property by other penalties, the right to inflict the death penalty straightway ceases, inasmuch as self-defence no longer absolutely requires it. That this is the case in all our settled States, certainly in the State of Ohio, I have not the shadow of a doubt.

Highly as I value human life, it is not, in my estimation, above all price; freedom is worth more, honor is worth more, virtue is worth more, country is worth more, the welfare of the race is worth more, great ideas are worth more. For such as these, a man will cheerfully sacrifice his life; and to preserve them, nations and communities are summoned to sacrifice the lives of their children. But nevertheless, life is worth more in proportion as the race becomes civilized; and, in fact, the value set on human life is one of the chief criteria of the elevation attained by any people in the scale of civilization. Savages fling it away in mere pastime; but the wise man would not die as the fool dies. A high reverence for human life is so priceless in its influence on social well-being, that every means may well be taken to enhance it in the community. It is precisely because the death penalty cheapens human life, breaks down the guards of its sanctity in popular estimation, that capital punishment, the moment it ceases to be absolutely necessary, immediately becomes an enormous outrage. At the very best, it is a necessary evil in certain disorganized states of society; but in every organized community, it is a demoralizing agency of fearful power. The people that permits legalized murder when other penalties would better accomplish the same end, educates its children to bloodshed and wilfully fosters crime in its own borders.

For proof of this statement, one need but consider the effect of public executions. The sight of bloodshedding exercises a terrible influence on the imagination. I saw a year or two ago in the daily papers an account of a little boy of nine years who, having seen his father kill and dress several hogs, afterwards induced his younger brother to play at killing hogs, and murdered him in the horrid sport. The schoolmaster at Newgate, England, says that 'he has seen his pupils, before the bodies of criminals were taken down from the scaffold, play the scene over again, one acting the convict and the other the hangman.' The famous Volney, just after the French Revolution, relates that he was deeply affected at seeing crowds of children amuse themselves with chopping off the heads of cats and chickens, in imitation of the dreadful scenes of the guillotine which had then grown infrequent:—"Even childhood had become inured to scenes of blood, and imitated the most frightful tragedies for sport." The Rev. I. Roberts ascertained that, out of 167 condemned criminals, all but 3 had witnessed executions,—a fact which shows how little power there is in these sickening spectacles to deter from crime. According to Mr. Buxton,—“It is notorious that executions very rarely take place without being the occasion on which new crimes are committed.” The testimony of Dr. Ford, who was largely acquainted with criminals, is the same:—"An execution," he says, "makes no more impression than the death of a fly.... Executions are of no use, either for punishing criminals or deterring others." "Every execution," said Dr. Lushington in the House of Lords, "brings an additional candidate for the hangman." In 1822, John Lechler was hung at Lancaster, Pa., for murder. The very same evening one Wilson, who had been present, met a weaver named Burns, with whom he had had some misunderstanding, and murdered him,—was seized by the officers of justice, are handcuffed with the irons hardly yet cold from the wrists of Lechler. An Irishman, executed for forgery, was given back to his family; and while his wife was lamenting over him, a young man came to her to purchase some forged notes. Forgetting her grief, she was selling him some, when, being surprised by the officers, she thrust the notes in her alarm into the mouth of the corpse, where the officers found them. So much for the example of her husband's fate. Contempt of death, quite as much as the hope of escaping the uncertain penalty, takes away not infrequently the force of the penalty. A pirate said to his comrade, while they were undergoing the torture of the wheel,—"Why do you make all this noise? Did you not know that in our profession we were subject to one more malady than the rest of the world?" The influence of the last dying speeches of notorious criminals goes directly to foster a morbid appetite which leads to crime. An English paper says that from 1½ to 2½ millions of copies were sold of each of the penny narratives of the executions of Rush, the Mannings, Courvoisier, Good, Conder and Greenacre. Can it be doubted that the tendency to crime is stimulated by such a flood of vile, exciting appeals to the imagination? The evils of public executions are so great, and their effects so pernicious, that private executions have now almost everywhere taken their place. Yet this change does away with that very publicity and impressiveness of the spectacle as a moral lesson, which was supposed to be the great result achieved by Capital Punishment. In fact, it is a change which proves that society is secretly ashamed of its own proceedings, and it merely marks a gradual approach to the complete abolition of the death penalty.

But the brutalizing influence of this barbarous mode of punishment is not the sole reason for abolishing it. It is a punishment which, if inflicted upon the innocent through mistake or perjury, admits of no redress; and there are overwhelming proofs that it has often been inflicted on the innocent. Victor de Tracy said in the French Chambers of Deputies, in 1828, that within six months, eleven sentences of death were reversed by the higher Courts of France for errors of fact. Fitzroy Kelley said in the British Parliament that fourteen innocent persons were hanged in England during the first half of the present century. Daniel O'Connell makes the following statement:—"I myself defended three brothers who were accused of murder. I saw the mother clasp her eldest son, who was but twenty-two years of age. I saw her hang on her second, who was not twenty. I saw her faint when she clung to the neck of her youngest boy, who was but eighteen. They were executed, and they were innocent." No wonder, when such awful mistakes continually occur, that the immortal Lafayette exclaimed in 1830 in the French Chamber of Deputies,—“I shall demand the abolition of the Death Penalty, until I have the infallibility of human judgment proved to me!” Or that king Louis Philippe exclaimed,—“I have detested it all my life long!”

Not only is Capital Punishment demoralizing to the public mind,—not only are there frequent and fatal mistakes in putting the innocent to death,—but also it is as useless as it is barbarous and unjust. The experiment has been tried of dispensing with it, and with eminent success. The Empress Elizabeth abolished it in Russia, declaring—"Experience demonstrates that Capital Punishment never yet made men better." Her successor, the great Catherine, adopted this reform in her code of laws, and remarked to Count de Segur,—“We must punish crime without imitating it; the punishment of death is rarely anything but a useless barbarity.” In Tuscany, where the death penalty was abolished for twenty years, the Grand Duke officially announced that "all crimes had diminished;" and Franklin stated that in Tuscany only five murders occurred in twenty years, while in Rome and vicinity, where the death penalty was inflicted, sixty murders occurred within three months. Capital Punishment was abolished also in Bombay; and Sir James Mackintosh, in his farewell address to the grand jury, spoke as follows of the result:—"The murders in the former period, in which Capital Punishment was inflicted, were as three to one to those in the latter [period], in which the law was abolished." In the reign of Henry the Eighth, 72,000 criminals were executed, that is, 2,000 a year; yet crime continually increased. It is not the severity, but the certainty of punishment which deters. Make the punishment too severe, and it will not be inflicted. When a theft of 40 shillings brought death in England, within a space of two years 553 perjured verdicts were rendered for thefts of 39 shillings and 11 pence. Juries will not convict honestly, if the penalty is excessive. In the State of Michigan, in which the death penalty has been abolished since 1846, a recent discussion has taken place concerning the wisdom of the present law, in which Chief Justice Cooley, Judge Graves, and Ex-Gov. Austin Blair, are in favor of the abolition of Capital Punishment, while Judge Christiancy, Judge Sutherland, and Judge Johnson, are opposed to it. Statistics, carefully drawn, are required in this case to render an opinion safe. But sure I am that, in proportion as men become truly civilized, they will feel more and more sympathy with the great Roman orator, when he exclaims:—"Away with this cruelty from the State! Allow it not, O judges, to prevail any longer in the commonwealth! It has not only the fatal effect of cutting off so many of your fellow-men in so cruel a manner, but it has even banished from men of the mildest temper, by the familiar practice of slaughter, the sentiment of mercy."

THE EFFECT OF PUBLIC EXECUTIONS.

The following paragraph, clipped from a recent number of the Toledo Blade, is a striking comment on the lecture we print this morning:—

"The last Parisian journal shows that the notoriety achieved by Traupmann has produced an epidemic of crime in France.

"Following the execution of the Pantin hero, a terrible tragedy in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honore took place. Francois, a footman residing with M. Lombard, formerly French Consul General in India, quarreled with his mistress. He flew at her with a knife, and almost severed her head from her body. The deed was committed in the presence of her husband, who is a paralytic, and unable to rise from his seat. Francois gave as a motive for the crime that his mistress had charged him with stealing a bottle of wine and getting drunk. After his arrest he took the affair quite coolly, and asked for water to wash the blood from his hands. Three other murders are reported."

CRIME AND CREED.

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

A more than usually interesting theological wrangle has for some months been in progress between the Catholic World and the New Englander, upon the relative moral results of Romanism and Protestantism. Both the Presbyterian and the Catholic monthly commit the non sequitur of assuming that whatever is coincident with Romanism and Protestantism is caused by it. Neither of them take into consideration causes of crime far more important than any religious creeds, which, in fact, have much to do with governing, not only the ratio of crime itself, but the degree of progress which races will make in advancing from the purely sensuous, superstitious, and despotic creeds, to the most intellectual and independent. These fundamental causes of crime are ignorance, intemperance, depraved physical and mental organisms, and last and chief, poverty, which is the source and mother of all others. To prove that there was more crime in Catholic countries than in Protestant, or the reverse, might no more establish an evil influence in either faith than to prove that there was less crime in countries whose people have fair hair and blue eyes than in those having tawny skins and black eyes would prove that crime was a consequence of the color of the hair and eyes.

We were recently accused by some of our Protestant brethren of catering to the tastes of our Catholic readers, by giving the very flattering statistics of Irish morality compared with Scotch and English, as vouched for by the Catholic World. These showed that, while the illegitimate births in England were 6.4 per cent. of the whole number, and those of Scotland were 9.9 per cent., those of Catholic Ireland were only 3.8 per cent., and the greater part even of these were in Protestant counties. These statistics certainly increased our respect for Bridget, for whom we have always entertained the highest regard. We never believed that she would do anything wrong, and we were naturally gratified to see it proved extensively. The New Englander replies to the charge, from the last report of the Registrar General of Ireland, that many births, deaths, and marriages in that country are not reported or recorded; that all his efforts to secure a perfect enforcement of the Registry laws have failed, and consequently that the returns for large portions of Ireland are utterly deficient and untrustworthy.

There are other difficulties in dealing with statistics of crime. The statistics really measure, not the extent of crime committed, but only the extent to which arrests and punishments are made. Years ago a Georgia statesman confronted Mr. Webster with the proof that Georgia had no paupers, while Massachusetts had more than any other State in the Union in proportion to population. His proof arose out of the fact that Georgia, holding most of her paupers in slavery, and caring nothing for the rest, made no provision for their support, while Massachusetts made the most ample provision. The statistics measured, not pauperism, but only the number of paupers provided for by the State. Keeping all these deductions in mind, there is still much food for thought in the contrasts in the degree of crime presented by the New Englander between Protestant and Catholic countries. For instance, on the point of criminal homicides, the census for 1865-6 shows the following comparison between Protestant England and Catholic France:—

To the million of population.	England.	France.
Convictions of murder and attempts.....	1½	12
Convictions of infanticide.....	5	10
Suicides (yearly average of 1862-5).....	64	127

The administration of justice is slightly more thorough in France than in England; both countries hang for murder in the first degree and banish for the less premeditated homicides. The degree of average poverty is greater in France among the working classes as measured by rates of wages for labor, which are but half as high, and by style of living, which is inferior in France to that in England. The fact that the French drink the light sour wines, while the English drink strong drink, would lead us to expect more murders from intemperance among the English. But if we were going to assign reasons why the French commit eight times as many murders, relatively to population, as the English, we should ascribe it chiefly to the impulsiveness of the Frenchman, who consults his sentiments, and the phlegmatic nature of the Englishman, who consults his interests. This trait is well illustrated by the answer of Prince Pierre Bonaparte, to the question why he fired at Victor Noir, who had insulted him, but was unarmed, before he did at De Fouvillie, who had drawn his pistol and was aiming at the Prince. "Because," said the Frenchman, "I felt the outrage before I observed the danger."

It may be argued that the more impulsive and sentimental races are, the more Catholic they will be, while the more cool and reasonable they are, the more Protestant will be their creed. England and Scotland, on the one hand, and Ireland, France, and Spain, on the other, might be deemed illustrations of this rule. But the fact that Catholics are impetuous, while Protestants are philosophical, does not show that Catholicism is responsible for the impetuosity, or that Protestantism causes cool-headedness, but that both are consequences of these differences of national temperament. But even these differences fail to account for the returns presented by the census returns of 1854, viz.:—

To the Million of Population.	Homicides.
Protestant England.....	4
Catholic Sicily.....	90
Catholic Papal States.....	113
Catholic Naples.....	174

Here is evidently not only Protestantism, but general education, cool temperament, good government, civil freedom, a reliance on courts of justice and an enlightened public opinion for redress of grievances, on the one hand, and, on the other, anarchy, a hated government, a muzzled people, a priesthood who are drones and despots, general ignorance, and a fiery readiness to assassinate. In the main, however, it is cultivated intelligence against ignorant impulse.

THE VIA MEDIA, OR HALF-WAY HOUSE.

[From the Living Church.]

In the heat of the earlier Oxford movement, its great theological leader Newman, a genius whose mental madness we deplore, but whose honesty we love, sketched this keen portrait of the reigning school:—"Mistiness in the present day is the mother of wisdom. A man, who can set down half a dozen general propositions, which escape from destroying one another only by being diluted into truisms; who can hold the balance between opposites so skilfully as to do without fulcrum or beam; who holds that Scripture is the only authority, yet that the Church is to be deferred to; that only faith justifies, yet it does not justify without works; that grace does not depend on sacraments, yet is not given without them; that bishops are a divine ordinance, yet they who have them are in the same religious condition as those who have; this is your safe man, and the hope of the Church; this is what the Church is said to want, not party men, but sensible, temperate, sober persons, to guide it through the channel of no-meaning, between the Scylla and Charybdis of aye and no."

LOYALTY.—The Rostocker Zeitung, referring to a visit which the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin paid to the Institute for the Blind at Neukloster, said:—"It will be a great pleasure to the Institution for the Blind that his Royal Highness promised it his bust."

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I am indebted to one Theodore Tilton for the knowledge that such a man as Francis Ellingwood Abbot lives, and I can say to him like one of old, 'I thank thee, Jew, for THAT word.' I am 64 years old and know all the 'ups and downs' of Christianity since Moses to the present day. I was 'born again' fifty years ago in the Orthodox fashion, and still yet 'born again' into the 'glorious light and liberty' of the kingdom of infidelity fifteen years ago. And I have viewed, reviewed, and interviewed all the ground over which it commonly falls to the lot of man to travel, and I can truly say that the 'Christian religion' as taught by the Church for the last 1500 years is the most inconsistent and unreasonable. I have been where the Independent says you are, for the last twelve years—'outside of Christianity' as taught by the past and present Catholic and Protestant Churches. I have been looking for several years (longer than Noah's dove) for a place to rest, and now I think I have found it. I wish that you would send me a copy or two of THE INDEX, that I may see whether it has 'whereon to stand' (that is peculiarly), and you can count me as a 'life member' of your enterprise. Tilton says that you wrote an article on 'Space and Time' (that is a subject so vast that I presume you did not exhaust it). I have devoted some study to that and to the suns and systems of suns that move in space, and still I find ever increasing wonders. Don't see any 'angry or jealous God' up there. We are full of infidelity here in Ill., and if I had some of your Indices to distribute among our friends, I think I could increase your list of subscribers. I am more and more disgusted with the lame attempts to bolster up the 'Christian religion' which in Boston whipped Quaker girls at the cart's tail for attending Quaker meetings, and hanged persons charged with being witches, because the Bible said—'thou shalt not suffer a witch to live.'"

—"I enclose one dollar, for which please send THE INDEX for six months to ———. This subscription is owing to your glowing description of Free Religion in No. 3. If you would always write like that, your paper would do unspeakable good. When you speak of Christianity and the New Testament, you write on a lower plane and appeal to coarser tastes. You fall into the same error as the Orthodox and conservative Unitarians in the extravagant importance you attach to mere doctrinal belief in Christianity. If a man is really religious, as I know you are, it makes no difference to men what he calls himself. I don't care whether he calls himself Christian, Unitarian, Liberal, Freethinker, Theist or Infidel, only I don't want him to keep talking about his individual little beliefs and disbeliefs all the time and blowing those who hold different ones. Forgive my speaking so plainly, but I enjoy your religious truth and light so much that I hate to have you waste time and strength on petty little theological puzzles. If you can only make your readers religious and spiritual, you can safely let their theology take care of itself. What is the chaff to the wheat? And I do think those Fifty Affirmations rather chaffy. For myself I care so little about names, that I am willing to hold by the ones I was brought up in. I had much rather have my society prosper under the Unitarian name, than fail under any other. No really Liberal Society can succeed in a place of this size without Unitarian money, and I cannot take the help, and disown all obligation and fellowship, as some of my neighbors have done. Of course when I don't find full liberty in Unitarianism and Christianity I shall leave them, but the time for that has not come."

—"You can send me a copy of THE INDEX, I like it. I will try to get you some subscribers. I have already secured one—a brilliant lady—a friend. I may get more, if not, will send you shortly the two dollars for her copy. Should like THE INDEX myself, but largely diminished resources compel me to be very mean. But let me say I value your forthputting as a good movement and out-blossoming of the times. I might not agree with you, indeed I do not agree with myself one half the time. But every genuine utterance at once reverential to real truth, and sincere, and in no way scoffing, but rather pitiful to the beliefs of the poor world as it wags along,—every such genuine word is a contribution that humanity stands sadly in need of. I must hope for better days for the world than it has yet realized. Yet I will confess to you that personally I have lost much of my hope and inspiration, and rather think that prophets are not of much account in an 'evil and McFarland generation.' I close the last sentence with an original emendation of the original text or translation."

—"A Congregational minister in charge of a church of the 'orthodox' order, writes me, 'I have received and read THE INDEX and have given away two or three numbers to readers and thinkers here. It is a bold strike indeed, and I hardly know how Mr. Abbot can sustain himself. It is a magnificent conception, though, to get at the root of religions and try to unite all beings under its banner. Paul has said God will reconcile and gather all beings and things under Christ as Head. I can easily see how the spirit of these words would allow the name and person of Christ to be put aside, but,' etc."

—"Dear Sir: I have received and read the first number of first vol. of your INDEX. I send my word of cheer, with less zeal but equal faith sent to Leggett of the Plain Dealer, when I received the first number of that; to N. P. Rogers when he issued the first number of the Herald of Freedom, and to Elizur Wright for the first number of the Chronotype. I had all the numbers of all those papers—of which the world not being worthy you know their end. But their influence for good, only the eye of the All-seeing can discern."

In 1833 I was a volunteer to organize Anti-Slavery societies over the Western Reserve; went into every county and organized in every county numerous societies, and to the extent of my ability disseminated gratuitously and by subscription anti-slavery publications.

Not to be weary in well-doing is good scripture. But the intervening years since then, and worldly cares and worldly men—'Non sum qualis eram.' And your subject is not such as that which led me in 1833 and '34 to go on a warfare at my own charge for more than a year, only to encounter an obloquy more general, persistent and virulent than you are now about to encounter. But Truth is mighty and has prevailed over prejudice, pride and superstition. You may not live to see the fruit, but all truth planted in the field you are entering will bear fruit."

—"I will endeavor to procure you some new subscribers, but I hardly dare think I shall be successful, my intimates being Swedenborgians and the people around me Episcopalians, and it really takes considerable moral courage for a woman to even acknowledge that she reads such extremely liberal writings. However, I may be fortunate enough to catch some stray people who are not willing to have their thinking done for them, and will do my best for THE INDEX. Meantime I send you my cordial wishes for your success."

—"From the reading of your paper I find we agree well enough in the principle involved in the question of the day. I have, however, been brought to these conclusions by hard study of Nature, without the advantages of education; during a period of fifteen years, and that, too, against opposition in many ways, I had fixed, however, on a different name for my Religion. I had concluded to call it Enlightened Natural Religion. Enlightened by a knowledge of Natural Laws, Natural because constitutional and universal with the race."

—"While hoping that greater opportunities for the utterance of unpalatable doctrines may offer at the West, I would not lose sight of the fact that it is not desirable on your part, I trust, to provoke no opposition, or fail to tempt the Goliaths of the popular religion to meet you on the battle field."

—"I think there ought to be a good many subscribers to your excellent paper in this place, and for aught I know there may be, but I send you the names of a few who, I think, might look with favor upon as radical a paper as THE INDEX."

—"I rejoice exceedingly at the tidings you announce in yesterday's paper, that your subscription list has doubled. I have read your lectures with deep interest and satisfaction, and suspect that you are right and I am wrong in regard to the term Christianity."

THE BETTER LIFE.

O Thou whose smile is life and peace,
Whose love folds all, from flower to star!
Bid Thou these inward tumults cease—
Give victory o'er the outward war.

O for a more harmonious life,
Whose thoughts and acts, from discord free,
Out from the heart of alien strife
Shall rise an anthem unto Thee!

O for a wiser, deeper faith,
Whose fragrance to the skies shall roll,—
Whose roots, secure from drought and death,
Sink to the centre of the soul!

Each selfish purpose bring to nought,
Each budding sin in mercy blight,
And cleanse the buried springs of thought,
That crystal streams may gush to light.

The Index.

MARCH 26, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

We believe that THE INDEX is accomplishing the work at which it aims. It is opening a great question in the public mind,—whether Christianity is the best religion of which man is capable, or whether a better is not already dawning on the world. Setting up no new “authority,”—publishing, no new Bible, and proclaiming no new Christ,—it summons the human soul to trust itself, to assert its own freedom, and to use this freedom in the purification of character and the elevation of society. We believe THE INDEX ought to be sustained. We believe it can be and will be sustained. All that is requisite is, that every man and every woman who longs to see freedom prevail over despotism in the spiritual life of the race should lend active assistance. Friends, will you lend it?

THE INDEX ought to be enlarged, by the addition of four or eight pages. This will be done as soon as its receipts warrant the enlargement. With sufficient editorial assistance, it may be made a great power in the moulding of public opinion in the direction of larger liberty of thought and life. That this is needed, no one can doubt who observes the timidity which characterizes the majority of men in the expression of their honest convictions. Will not each of our readers send us the name of a new subscriber, or start a club in his own neighborhood? The next best course is to send us names of liberal people everywhere.

We must again call attention to the fact that the first few numbers of THE INDEX are all gone; and that we cannot, therefore, furnish them. We continually receive applications for these numbers, and hope by and by to reprint them. Whether we can do this or not, depends on the earnestness of our friends in obtaining new subscribers.

Friends of THE INDEX will greatly help it by canvassing their own immediate neighborhood, getting new subscribers, and sending in new names of liberals everywhere.

If the shedding of selfish tears were a fatal disease, what a mortality there would be among mourners!

“GOD” OR “A GOD.”

A few weeks ago we made the following statement:—“Whether recognized or not, human thought is the real authority for every proposition that can be put into words; and when thought affirms—‘God is,’—it can claim no more infallibility than when it affirms—‘God is not.’ Now we find the Theist making the one, and the Atheist making the other, of these affirmations.”

Referring to this statement, the Chicago Liberal makes the following criticism:—

“Does this correctly represent the Atheist? We think not. Unless the Theist presents a conception, there can be no denial; but a conception of ‘God’ is of ‘a god.’ While ‘god’=x, there can be no sensible denial; yet there is Atheism,—a (privative), without, and theos.”

We find the Liberal a very able paper, and cordially reciprocate its kind words and good wishes. But we think it fails to understand Theism as held by philosophical thinkers. The Atheist, we believe, denies, and can deny, only the false ideas of God which the enlightened Theist denies with equal energy. The Liberal illustrates this very clearly. “A conception of ‘God,’” it says, “is of ‘a god.’” That is to say, the idea of God is the idea of a god,—one of a class, to all the individuals of which the term god is equally applicable. It is the function of the indefinite article a to designate in general an individual object, not as an individual, but as simply a member of a class, possessing all the common characteristics of that class. Hence, if the Liberal is correct, every Theist, or believer in God, is necessarily a Polytheist, or believer in many gods.

Now we assure the Liberal that no educated or thinking man is a Theist in any such sense as this. An illustration will show that the difference between God and a god is enormous. Space is infinite; there can be, therefore, only one Space, and it would be absurdity to speak of it as a Space, which would imply that there is more than one space. So Time is one, and it would be absurd to speak of it as a Time. So also Force is one, and the grandest achievement of modern science is the discovery of the truth that all so-called forces are simply diverse manifestations of the one, universal and indestructible Force. Space, Time, and Force, each being infinite, are each sole of its kind, and cannot belong to a class or genus comprising many members. The basis of the idea of God, as held by enlightened Theism, is that of one, omnipresent, eternal, infinite Power or Force,—the Force of the entire universe, not a force which is simply one of a multitude of equal forces. What other predications can be made of this Sole Power, may indeed be a matter of doubt and discussion; but no philosophical thinker will either deny this Sole Power, or acknowledge the logic of the Liberal’s argument, that he cannot believe in God without believing in a host of gods—that he cannot be a Theist without being a Polytheist.

A physician has just written to us as follows from Georgia:—

“If you would adopt the method of ‘Pomeroy,’ and send out specimen numbers of your paper, many would subscribe that otherwise will not. Few (comparatively) know your paper is published. If all your subscribers would send you a list of names, and the money to pay for sending extra numbers to individuals, your paper would greatly increase in its usefulness.”

We thank our friend (personally unknown) for doing himself what he recommends to others, sending as he did a dollar for the mailing of extra copies of THE INDEX, No. 10, to certain names.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

In addition to the article on “Abraham Lincoln’s Religion,” Mr. Herndon has just promised a second article on “Abraham Lincoln’s Philosophy,” as connected with his religion. The former article will appear in our issue of April 2, and the latter as soon as possible after it is received. These two articles should be read by every American who desires to understand the private character of the martyred President. The truth concerning his religious convictions has been quite long enough suppressed; and Mr. Herndon (we think we betray no confidence in quoting from one of his letters a passage which does him so much honor) writes in the following manly strain:—

“You say I shall be abused for the article. This I expect, but I am determined that the great reading world shall know all that I do of Mr. Lincoln; his character is so good—his integrity so grand—his fame so well established—his honor so unimpeached—and his human struggle in life so sublime,—that his fame can stand the whole truth. I will sacrifice all but honor that the world may have one true human biography to read and to stand by. The more the world knows of Mr. Lincoln, the better he will be loved and admired; and, if you please, worshipped. To me his life was a grand epic. Every kind of seduction has been held out to me to modify,—but I have listened to nothing except my own conscience. . . . I wish the world knew all I do; it would then cease its snarls. . . . Mr. Lincoln’s life to me was a grand life; and I feel his touch on me daily.”

A FRANK ADMISSION.

The last number of the Liberal Christian has the following in its leading editorial:—

“Liberal Christians, of late years, have allowed the issue to be shifted from its old foundations—‘the law and the testimony’—to the ground of general reasoning, philosophy and science. However strong we may be there, our strength is not so certain and so available in these more general departments, as in the careful testimony of the Scriptures themselves.”

It is very certain that “Liberal Christianity” has no basis at all in “general reasoning, philosophy, or science.” Its only strength lies in the Scriptures as a final and absolute authority; and it cannot make good the validity of this authority without gagging Science and cutting the jugular vein of Philosophy. As to poor Reason, she is left by her professed Unitarian friends “out in the cold” altogether. Fortunate for her that Spring is coming and the weather moderating!

A despatch to the Cincinnati Chronicle of March 14, referring to the action of the Legislature at Columbus, says:—

“The cause of female suffrage received a setback this morning, by the presentation of a petition, signed by Mrs. M. P. Dascomb and one hundred and forty other ladies of Lorraine county, against female suffrage. The petition states that the legitimate duties of woman, if properly attended to, are sufficient to occupy their whole time, and that they are content to leave the affairs of State in the hands of the males. The reading of the petition created some little sensation.”

When women come forward to hinder the enfranchisement of their own sex, it should be remembered that no one proposes to compel women to vote who do not wish to do so; but these ladies propose to prevent women from voting who do wish to do so. Because “they have all the rights they want”, they desire to keep their sisters in the same subjection in which they themselves rejoice. Such a spirit is as unlovely as it is unjust. The day may come when these ladies will blush at their own willingness to act the part of Æsop’s dog in the manger.

In Potsdam (Prussia), not long ago, Rev. Mr. Schaefer, of Berlin, delivered his second religious discourse. His proposition that the people ought to take earnestly and directly hold of the reform movement in church and school, met with such a ready response, that forthwith fifty two men of various positions in life united themselves into a free religious society. The German paper reporting this, adds:—“If this happens in Potsdam, it may surely be considered a sign of the times.”

PANTHEISM.

SYRACUSE, March 12, 1870.

MR. ABBOT: DEAR SIR,—I often meet good rationalistic thinkers who claim to hold the opinion that man and his Maker are homogeneous in their being, or that man literally lives, moves and has his being in that of Deity. Will you please allow me to ask all such, where they find room for any relationship between God and man on such a theory? Can there be any relation except between distinct, separate, differentiated and heterogeneous entities? To my mind it is evident that the very moment any one thing absorbs, or becomes identically one with any other thing, so that all heterogeneity is destroyed, all relation between such two beings or objects must cease. And when all relation is destroyed, identity of being must be lost. If I reason right, what becomes of pantheism, which merges all mind, will and purpose in one? Respectfully yours,

WILLARD TWITCHELL.

[The great problem of philosophy, from the earliest times, has been to define the relation existing between the One and the Many. The universe is both at the same time; yet who is wise enough to explain how? Whether, with atheism, we sacrifice the One to the Many, or, with pantheism, sacrifice the Many to the One, we do but shut our eyes to the problem, instead of solving it. In our opinion, neither homogeneity nor heterogeneity can be the relation sought; for these are respectively likeness or unlikeness of genus or kind, and the One, in this problem, cannot be a unit of a class or kind at all. The problem is to find the One in the Many and the Many in the One,—not to set the One at the right and the Many at the left, in order to determine whether they belong to the same genus or not. In order to get rid of this supposed separateness of the One and the Many, atheism denies one term of the relation, and pantheism the other; but philosophy must affirm both as actual facts, recognizing Being as one, in essence and manifold in manifestation. A further reply would require more space than we judge it appropriate to devote to abstract metaphysical discussions.—Ed.]

CONSCIOUS IMMORTALITY.

OSWEGO, N. Y., March 12, 1870.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR:—A friend of mine has handed me No. 7 of THE INDEX, under date of Feb. 12th. I admire the frankness, independence and apparent candor that characterizes the leading article, and also many others. I understand there are a number of subscribers resident in this city already. Probably there will be more soon.

Will you please answer the following question through the columns of THE INDEX?

Do you believe that mankind, one and all, do or will have a conscious individual existence after what is called death; and that each individual will be in full possession of all the faculties with which he was endowed while in this life, having full knowledge of his surroundings and condition? If so, please state the ground of, or reason for, such belief.

Very respectfully,
J. R. PIERCE.

[To those who see no reason to believe in a supernatural revelation, there can be no complete proof or absolute assurance of immortality, unless it be proved by science or experience. We hope the human soul is immortal, but do not feel justified in saying that we know it to be so. There are strong moral and philosophical grounds for this hope, which we cannot here enumerate; but whether our hope is well-grounded or not, we have no quarrel with the changeless order of the universe, which we believe to be as truly rooted in Love as in Intelligence. We are content to live for the duties of to-day, leaving tomorrow to care for the things of itself. This seems to us the most truly religious spirit. At some future time we shall give our views on this subject in full; but we are unwilling to evade giving a plain answer to a plain question. We do not know, and no man believes without thinking that he knows; but we hope—and calmly wait.—Ed.]

EXPERIENCE OF AN OCTOGENARIAN.

I was born in Vermont, of respectable Christian parentage, my father being a Baptist and my mother a Quakeress. When young, my father took me to the Baptist meeting. I heard Elder Caleb Blood preach awful denunciations against the wicked. Through fear, I was restrained from doing what I was taught was wicked. I feared God's vengeance would fall upon me, because I was told that Adam had been a very wicked man and broken God's law; that he and all his progeny had become very sinful, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot,— totally depraved; and that God, to avenge himself, had made a terrible hell, a lake of fire and brimstone, in which to burn forever all the enemies whom he had not chosen to save. I worried my poor soul under this terrible belief,—would wake in terror from awful dreams of this lake of fire. My mother would take me with her sometimes to the Quakers' or Friends' meeting. Here I always experienced a very different sensation. Here all seemed to be quietness, peace, love and goodness to each other. In their very looks it seemed as if I could read a spiritual development of something good. Frequently not one word would be said, but the friendly grasp of hands at the close would seem to renew the bond of affection. I loved my Quaker friends. I respected even their plain habits of dress, their unostentatious manners, &c. When I was about ten years of age, a Quaker lady preacher was at our Friends' meeting. I heard her sermon, was convinced, and believed she spoke the truth. Ever since I have thought there was more truth among the Friends than among other professing Christians. I grew up, believing (not without some doubts, however,) that Christianity, properly developed, was the true religion. The unadulterated precepts of Jesus are true and pure. I have had more or less experience among all the sects. I have always been annoyed by a spirit of persecution among them all, except the Friends. I had made up my mind long, long ago that true religion must be one; and that that one must be the standard. I have ever watched the dissensions among them, and have stood aloof from all the sects; hoping yet to see all Christians come to the one standard. I always made it a principle to attend any Christian meeting whenever and wherever it was convenient, with the idea that in a true Christian Church there was, or at least should be, perfect liberty. And when opportunity offered I always used my liberty to speak, but I always felt under some restraint from the fear of offending. My sentiments were not what is called orthodox. I was a Quaker in sentiment, or a Unitarian. After I came to Toledo—near twenty years since—I encouraged reform under any denomination, Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist, or even Roman Catholic, there being no Friends' society here; and endeavored to show the necessity of true moral principles for the general good. When our little Unitarian Society started in Toledo, I believe I was among the first, and the oldest member in it. I considered Unitarians the most liberal sect among Christians. If pure Free Religion, with all its excellencies, beauty, love and power, can be established here, let us have it! The platform includes all religions. Let us unite in the good and reject the bad. Show to the inquiring millions how good it is for brethren to dwell together in love and unity. More may and will be expected from those who take this broad ground than from others inclosed in creeds. It seems to me, progression must be the motto in the religious world. Religion is absolutely far behind all other subjects in advancement. Improvements or innovations of any kind have to contend with the priests and kings of the world, and all the adherents of tyrannical institutions. But as intelligence is developed,—as the mists of ignorance are blown away by the blasts of truth,—as the clouds of superstition vanish, so that the True Light may shine and illuminate the darkness that pervades the mental atmosphere,—then will man stand forth in his true dignity and character, prepared to exhibit to the world the Religion that will make him FREE. DR. DIX ON THE SIX COUNCILS.

ED. INDEX:—In the New York Evening Post, of March 7th, 1870, appears the following:—

"On Friday evening, at St. Paul's Chapel, the Rev. Dr. Morgan L. Dix, the Rector of Trinity Parish, delivered, after the evening service, the first of a series of lectures on the 'Six Great Councils of the Church.' The other lectures of the course will be delivered on the remaining Friday evenings in Lent."

Then follows what purports to be a short report of the lecture.

It is in a measure unfair to hold any one responsible, not for what he says, but for what a newspaper reports him to say. It is also, in a measure, unfair to hold a church responsible, not for what it believes, but for what a disciple says it believes. And neither of these things will be done in the present paper. Dr. Dix shall not be held responsible for the Evening Post's report of his lecture, nor the Episcopal Church for Dr. Dix's statement of its doctrines. But Dr. Dix is surely one of the prominent representative men of the Episcopal Church: and the Evening Post's report of his lecture surely does not conflict with the commonly professed beliefs of Dr. Dix and his fellow churchmen. I do not intend to blame or criticize any one for the points set forth in that report. But in reading it, whenever I attempt to agree with its statements, I become involved in many difficulties—some of them I wish to state. By doing this much only, surely no one will be injured, even if the report be not utterly correct.

And at the outset, let me offer a word of explanation. I know nothing of theology. I know nothing of church history. I am a mere layman. My studies, such as they are, have been given to other matters. I know too, very thoroughly, the dangers there are to any one, who tries to discuss matters of any kind that he has not thoroughly studied. His reasoning may be very good, but it probably is valueless. His theories may be very logical, but they are probably inapplicable to existing facts. So I disclaim in the beginning any right to speak with any authority, even the slightest. And I shall very probably make grave mistakes, through ignorance. However, I shall merely make an attempt to state some of my own logical difficulties.

Part of the report is as follows:—

"The reverend lecturer stated that there were six councils of the Church held, which were throughout the whole Church recognized as Ecumenical, i. e. universal, synods of the Christian Church. The council now in session at Rome, for which the present century will be always famous, and which styles itself Ecumenical, suggested the propriety of explaining the purposes and recalling the acts of those truly Ecumenical Councils which, though held in ages so long past, made decisions which are still and have always been considered binding, whether by the Anglican, the Oriental or Latin Churches. He went on to say that those six councils gave a permanent mould and outline to the dogmatic principles of the Christian Church, and of them it can be affirmed that they undoubtedly declared the truth on the points submitted to them for decision. They are a living power to-day, and gently but inevitably assert their influence over the consciences of men."

"Of them," Dr. Dix says, "it can be affirmed, that they undoubtedly declared the truth on the points submitted to them for decision."

Now how has Dr. Dix reached this conclusion? Am I bound to take this conclusion from him, or am I at liberty to reach it in the same way that he did? Even Dr. Dix would hardly refuse me this privilege. As far as I understand him, he makes no claim of infallibility for himself. He has used his own judgment. He will surely allow me to use mine. Even if we both agreed in the conclusion that "these councils did undoubtedly declare the truth," even then we should again have to use our reason to find out what these councils really declared, or else remain in ignorance. Surely we have both of us the right—and the equal right—to use our judgment in the earlier stage, as well in the later stage, of the investigation, to decide whether the councils declared the truth, as well as to decide what the truth was that they declared.

If I am allowed this privilege, then, of using my judgment to decide for myself, whether or not, in my opinion, these councils did declare the truth, I begin, and at the outset I plunge into a sea of troubles. I immediately find that there have been more than six councils of the Church. How am I to determine that these six "declared the truth," and that no others did? Surely Dr. Dix must hold that some councils have declared what is not the truth, else he will land in Romanism at once. Why am I to make an invidious discrimination, and give my confidence to these particular six councils alone? There must be some reason for the selection. To all appearance, later councils are constituted in the same manner as the earlier ones. These earlier councils were composed of the representatives of all, or nearly all, the then Christian Churches. These later councils are composed in the same way, except that they represent a much larger number of Christian Churches, or, at least, a much larger body of Christian churchmen. It cannot be that the earlier councils were nearer the truth, simply because they were earlier, else we shall be driven to the conclusion that the councils of the Romish Church, before the Reformation, were nearer the truth than the councils of the Episcopal Church after the Reformation. Nor can it be that the councils which represented the largest body of churchmen, were nearest the truth, else we shall be driven to the conclusion, that the later councils of the Romish Church were nearer the truth than either the later councils of the Episcopal Church, or than the earlier councils of either, or both.

But there must be some reason for holding that these six councils, and these only, declare the truth. And what is it? How does Dr. Dix decide in favor of these, and against all others? And how am I to decide in favor of these, and against all others? The date of the councils cannot be the test. Neither can it be the size or number of their constitutions. There can be no test, that I can imagine, except the character of their declarations. Any other test that I can think of will compel us to admit the authority of councils that Dr. Dix will not recognize. And if this be so, I am to believe that these six councils declared the truth—not because they were these particular six councils, but because what they declared was true. They had then, in themselves, no authority.

I do not claim that this reasoning is absolutely conclusive. I only say it is the best I can make. Dr. Dix's statements are a puzzle: and this is the best solution I can give of it. I have been in a measure exercising my mind on it, and this is the result. But at the same time I admit that I may be in error.

From the character, then, of their declarations, I am to believe that these six councils "undoubtedly declared the truth." But what character are these declarations to have in order to compel me to believe them to be true? Are they merely to conform to Dr. Dix's ideas of what is true? He surely will not set his own opinion on this point against the opinion of all other men, or even, perhaps, against my own. Dr. Dix must, in consistency, say, that the declarations of these councils, in order to be true, must conform to the doctrines of the Episcopal Church. But to the doctrines of which portion of the Episcopal Church? High or Low Church? To the doctrines of the Episcopal Church in the nineteenth century, or the doctrines of the Episcopal Church just before the time of Martin Luther and King Henry VIII? And if he choose one of these periods or parties in preference to another, on what ground does he make the choice? Not for the reason that one set of doctrines was held by a greater or less number of churchmen, or was held at an earlier or later period; for either of those grounds would compel us, as before, to go outside of the Episcopal Church altogether into Romanism, nay, into Paganism. But he must make choice, as before, from the character of those doctrines.

No matter how many removes (as it seems to me) Dr. Dix chooses to make, he must inevitably come back again to the same point. He and I must alike believe in the declarations of these six councils, because they are true, and for no other reason. But following the matter up to what Dr. Dix undoubtedly claims to be the final resting place, we are to believe in the truth of any of these matters, whether declarations of a council, or doctrines of a church, for the reason that they conform with the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, which Dr. Dix and his fellow churchmen call the "inspired word of God."

And here I come afresh on the same point again. Why am I to believe this? Dr. Dix, I fear, will think this question so sacrilegious that he will give me no answer. But I remember that his sect believes in proselytizing. He may, therefore, give me information in a missionary spirit. He will not here, any more than in our former points, claim that I shall follow his opinion blindly. Neither will he venture to tell me, that I must believe the Scriptures to be true, because the Church believes them to be true. Else I must ask him, what Church? He cannot tell me to believe them because a majority of men believe them; for the believers in the inspiration of what he calls the Scriptures, form a very small minority of those who have inhabited the earth, and a decreasing minority. If we are to be guided by numbers, I must fly to Paganism at once, not even tarrying in Rome. He can only give me one answer at last, which is that the Scriptures prove themselves by their own evidences, internal and external, to be true.

By all this I simply mean that I cannot see any other line of argument that is possibly open to Dr. Dix or his co-believers.

And then comes the question, how am I to know that the Scriptures prove themselves to be true?

When Dr. Dix tells me that the declarations of the six councils are true, because they conform to the doctrines of the Church, or that the doctrines of the Church are true, because they conform to the declarations of the six councils, or that either are true, because they conform to the Holy Scriptures, how am I to compare them with each other? By using my reason. I can imagine or conceive no other way, either for him, or for me, or for any man. How am I to know whether the Scriptures declare the truth? By my reason? I can imagine or conceive no other way. But if Dr. Dix says no, I must ask, how am I to know even what the doctrines of the Church are, or what the councils declared, or what the Scriptures teach but by my reason? Even he will allow me to use it here. How far will he allow me to use it? When will he not allow me to use it? Where will he put the dividing line? Why will he put it anywhere? By what means will he put it anywhere, but by using his reason? And what shall I or he use instead?

These are some of the difficulties I meet, in trying to agree with this one reported statement of Dr. Dix, that certain six councils of the "Church" (he does not say what Church), "undoubtedly did declare the truth." There are in the same report certain other statements, which also cause me trouble. Some of them I may possibly notice at some future day.

SECULAR SCHOOLS.—It is very gratifying to us to observe that leading men in the church, in every part of the country, are casting off old prejudices; and, in order to save our common schools, taking ground in favor of excluding from them every form of religious instruction. Dr. Heacock, of Buffalo, for instance, in a recent discourse, gave the church and the state each a distinct realm, and made the following points:

- (1.) The State does not recognize God.
- (2.) The Bible and prayer should at once be removed from all our schools.
- (3.) The Bible is regarded as a sectarian book.
- (4.) Morality should be taught in the schools.
- (5.) No endowments by the State to any sectarian or denominational schools, and no division of the public money among the churches.

Dr. Thompson, pastor of the Tabernacle church in this city, if we rightly understand the Tribune's report of his last Sunday-evening discourse, took substantially the same ground:

"The State may provide for all alike a common school education; and in so doing it will fulfil its whole duty. It has been objected to this method that it trespasses on the rights of conscience. But, if no religion or book of religion is taught, how can this be? Will it trouble the conscience of the Roman Catholic to have his children taught the last six of the ten commandments? It is objected that under this system children will grow up without religion or morality. I contend as strongly as any man for teaching religion and morality; but it is not necessary that arithmetic and the catechism should be taught in the same school and by the same teacher. Religion and morality are taught in the family, in the church, in the Sunday school; and the common school is no more irreligious because it does not teach religion than is a factory, or any other arrangement of a secular kind. The two things do not necessarily belong together."—N. Y. Independent.

Yang-Chin, celebrated in one of the Chinese odes on virtue, had a friend who brought him a bribe, saying, "It is now evening. Take it, and no one will know it." Yang-Chin replied, "Heaven and earth know, and you and I know it; how can you say no one will know it?" And with this he refused the offer.

Miscellaneous.

THE INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY ON MODERN CIVILIZATION.

[From Lecky's History of European Morals.]

Few men who are not either priests or monks would not have preferred to live in the best days of the Athenian or of the Roman republics, in the age of Augustus or in the age of the Antonines, rather than in any period that elapsed between the triumph of Christianity and the fourteenth century. . . . In the first two centuries of the Christian Church the moral elevation was extremely high, and was continually appealed to as a proof of the divinity of the creed. In the century before the conversion of Constantine, a marked depression was already manifest. The two centuries after Constantine are uniformly represented by the Fathers as a period of general and scandalous vice. The ecclesiastical civilization that followed, though not without its distinctive merits, assuredly supplies no justification of the common boast about the regeneration of society by the Church. That the civilization of the last three centuries has risen in most respects to a higher level than any that had preceded it, I at least firmly believe; but theological ethics, though very important, form but one of the many and complex elements of its excellence. Mechanical inventions, the habits of industrialism, the discoveries of physical science, the improvements of government, the expansion of literature, the traditions of Pagan antiquity, have all a distinguished place, while, the more fully its history is investigated, the more clearly two capital truths are disclosed. The first is that the influence of theology having for centuries numbed and paralyzed the whole intellect of Christian Europe, the revival, which forms the starting-point of our modern civilization, was mainly due to the fact that two spheres of intellect still remained uncontrolled by the sceptre of Catholicism. The Pagan literature of antiquity, and the Mohammedan schools of science, were the chief agencies unresuscitating the dormant energies of Christendom. The second fact, which I have elsewhere endeavored to establish in detail, is that during more than three centuries the decadence of theological influence has been one of the most invariable signs and measures of our progress. In medicine, physical science, commercial interests, politics, and even ethics, the reformer has been confronted with theological affirmations which barred his way, which were all defended as of vital importance, and were all in turn compelled to yield before the secularizing influence of civilization.

THE SCHOOL BOARD AND THE BIBLE DECISION.

[By Dr. Lilienthal, in Jewish Times.]

That the Superior Court of Cincinnati decided by two against one in favor of the retention of the Bible in our common school, has created a bitter feeling in the enlightened portions of the community. The Methodists and Orthodox wing of the Americans, of course, rejoice over this decision; but the bar and liberal minded in general are unanimously of the opinion, that the court had no right to meddle with the question at all; and hence it is confidently hoped, that the Supreme Court of Ohio, to whom an appeal was taken, will overrule the decision given by Judges Storer and Hagans against Judge Taft.

In the meantime we witnessed last evening in the school-board one of the most interesting scenes. Mr. E. M. Johnson brought in the following resolution:—

"WHEREAS, The Superior Court of Cincinnati has, by injunction, forbidden this Board from enforcing its rule, adopted November 1st, 1869, prohibiting religious instruction and the reading of religious books in the public schools of the city of Cincinnati, on the ground and for the reason that the Constitution of Ohio requires religious instruction and the reading of religious books in said schools; and,

"WHEREAS, Said Court, in its decree in the premises, has failed to direct what religious books, and what manner of religious instruction, are required to be furnished in said schools, and neither the Constitution of Ohio nor the laws passed by the General Assembly have specified the same, and the whole subject is thus left to the judgment of this Board, whose duty it is made, without delay, to act in the premises, inasmuch as the failure of this Board to act may result in the total omission of such instruction in some of said schools, a result which the Board, anxious to avoid even the appearance of contempt or disregard of said injunction earnestly deprecates. Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That A. D. Mayo, Thomas Vickers' Abner L. Frazier, Henry Mack, J. P. Carbery and Herman Eckel be appointed a committee on religious books and religious instruction, and that said committee be required to agree, and report at the next meeting of this Board what religious books, and what kind of religious instruction shall be so furnished; and that, in the meantime, until such report of said committee, and the action of this Board thereon, each Principal, according to his own religious belief (if he have any), shall cause religion (as he understands the same) to be taught to all the pupils in the schools in his charge; and in case any such Principal has no such belief, the duty hereby imposed shall be discharged by his Assistant; and in case said Assistant Principal has no such belief, then by the teacher senior in age in said schools who shall be found to be possessed of such belief."

The ridicule and sneer at the Superior Court are obvious. Mayo is a Christian Unitarian; Vickers the most radical of all radical Unitarians; Frazier a hyper-orthodox Protestant; H. Mack, an Israelite; Carbery, a Catholic and prominent member of the Jesuit's Sodality Society; and H. Eckel an outspoken Atheist. That these men should or could agree upon a plan of religious instruction, is evidently out of the reach of all possibility. The Board wanted only to display the impracticability of the court's decision; and after having indulged in some lively and funny skirmishing, the motion was voted down by 16 against 14.

ECCLESIASTICAL EXCITEMENT IN LOWELL.—We learn that there is an intense excitement existing in Lowell, Mass., among the Evangelical Churches, on account of a fresh innovation upon their assumed right to do the religious thinking for the people. Heretofore the Spiritualists have borne the brunt of their denunciation and abuse, yet Spiritualism continues to be sought after, and the believers in its truths are steadily increasing in numbers—many of whom are still in the churches. But the heaven is working and agitating the whole body of creed-bound souls, and many are beginning to think for themselves and claim the right to listen to the freely expressed thoughts of others; hence the anxiety of the church leaders to crush out every phase of free thoughts.

One who has been cramping his soul for a long time by creed-shackles, recently struck out boldly for "more light." We allude to Mr. Samuel V. Spaulding, a highly respected influential business man of Lowell. Desiring with many others to hear the sentiments of such free thinkers as Francis E. Abbot, T. W. Higginson, O. B. Frothingham, John Weiss, and Julia Ward Howe, he invited them to give a course of lectures in that city. The call was accepted, and Mr. S. made arrangements for the same to take place on Wednesday evenings in Huntington Hall. Mr. Abbot gave the first on the 2d inst. The others are to follow on the 9th, 23d, 30th, and April 6th.

This was more than the Evangelicals could submit to quietly, notwithstanding they profess to be true disciples of the meek and lowly Nazarene. Consequently Mr. Spaulding has been ostracised and denounced in the severest manner by his Christian brethren, with whom he had fellowshiped and been esteemed for years, and they concertedly began praying the Almighty to interfere and make the course of lectures a financial failure. One would hardly believe that this is a country where religious freedom is tolerated at the present day, or that there was any further need of crushing it out altogether by inserting a clause in the Constitution which would enable religious bigotry to do the infamous deed "legally." In the meantime we bid brother Spaulding God-speed in his search for true spiritual knowledge, and hope thousands will follow his noble example.—Banner of Light.

LECTURES IN BOSTON AND LOWELL.—By the desire of many who were not wholly satisfied either with Mr. Abbot's or Mr. Wendell Phillips' position, in the Horticultural Hall lectures, last season, Mr. Wasson's subject in the course this year will be, not "Providence" as first announced, but "Jesus, Christianity, and Modern Radicalism." On this topic Mr. Wasson cannot fail to be both interesting and able.

Some of the Lowell people do not take kindly to the advent of the "apostles of heresy" among them. On Sunday last, in two churches, the congregations were cautioned not to attend the lectures, while in the Kirk street (Orthodox) the superintendent of the Sunday-school addressed his flock in these words:—"There is to be a series of lectures in Huntington Hall by the devil and his emissaries;" while he instructed his pupils not to attend, and to discourage others from attending. A correspondent asks "if the Orthodox faith is built upon so frail a basis that five lectures will overturn it?" We answer—by no means; we have found it a tough and stubborn article, and think the radicals have a good deal of work yet before them before they wholly neutralize its power. Hence we are surprised that the conservatives should show such trepidation at free discussion. They should remember they have two hundred and fifty years the start of the heretics in inculcating their doctrines among the people.

Mr. John S. Dwight being unable, from a pressure of unexpected engagements, to deliver his lecture at Horticultural Hall to-morrow, Mrs. Cheney, who, as usual, was "forehanded" with her work, kindly consented, with her usual good nature, to exchange places with him. So that to-morrow we shall have Art, and Music will come later—March 27th—immediately preceding Mr. Channing; Mr. Wasson moving up to the 20th, partly for Mr. Dwight's convenience, and partly perhaps to get a little nearer Mr. Abbot, with whom, it is said, he means to break a lance—with which view he has somewhat changed his favors, as appears by the advertisement. Mr. Dwight will have more time to prepare his discourse, and will probably make it a fitting introduction to that of Mr. Channing. Mr. Abbot gave his lecture to a deeply-interested audience in Lowell, Wednesday night, and Mrs. Cheney repeats hers soon in Florence. The course, which will be eloquently closed by America's first orator, Wendell Phillips, is certainly a unique one in the history of Boston culture, and as it may not be continued another season, those who care to preserve its memories will not be likely to be absent from its weekly re-unions of thoughtful and cultivated people.—Boston Commonwealth.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION AND UNITARIANISM.

We have been a good deal entertained—more entertained than instructed—by the recent spirited discussion among Unitarians with reference to forming an “Evangelical Association.” It seems that it is seriously proposed to organize the conservative wing of the Unitarian body by itself; not, however, as a secession from the denomination, but as a union within the denomination of those who are willing to subscribe to some common statement of theological belief, for the purpose of publicly freeing such persons as join in the statement from responsibility for the opinions of their Radical brethren, and also, probably, with a view to wielding an influence which shall help to hold the denomination generally to an evangelical position. Now this discussion does not affect us in the least, and as members of the Free Religious Association we have no special interest in it. Yet from the way in which the name of the Free Religious Association figures in the discussion, it would seem as if our Association were the prime cause of the whole movement. The Liberal Christian advocates the formation of the “Evangelical Association,” on the right wing of Unitarianism, to balance the “Free Religious Association,” on the left wing. In a long leader, of Feb. 26th, it says:—

“We hail the prospect of a special organization among the more conservative member, clerical and lay, in our body, corresponding on the right to the Free Religious Association on the left, where as stringent articles of faith may be agreed upon as the pure breed of historical and supernatural Christian believers in the Unitarian body find acceptable to themselves and each other. The left wing set the right this prudent and sagacious example. When they found they could not discuss their own peculiar views freely, and without arousing much ill-feeling in the Local or the General Conference, they went off and founded an Association, all their own, where they could ventilate their opinions and study their interests without jealousy or complaint. They stayed, meanwhile, in the National Conference, and we expect to see them bringing to its next meeting the fruits of their experience, with a disposition to join the right wing and the moderate men in neither wing, in plans and measures and discussions, which we can all engage in heartily.”

And Rev. A. P. Putnam, of Brooklyn, in an article on the same subject in the same number of the paper, rests his argument on the same basis. He says:—

“The existence of the Free Religious Association calls for the organization of those of the [Unitarian] body who call themselves Christians and who plant themselves squarely upon the New Testament as the one grand rule of faith and practice.”

Now here is an assumption which calls for our notice. We are tempted to say something about the “pure breed” of Unitarian believers,—a phrase, we think, which would have made Channing look aghast,—but that is not a point that concerns us in this department of THE INDEX. But when it is assumed, as it is by both these writers, that the Free Religious Association is an organization within Unitarianism, the Free Religious Association has something to say for itself. It will not consent to be regarded as a fragment of any denomination. It does not represent any sect, much less any portion of a sect. Some of its members are members of Unitarian societies and organizations, as others are connected with other denominations; but a very large part of its membership—we should say a full half—is outside of all denominations. And we should expect a very energetic protest from a great body of our members, if they should learn that they had been voted into the Unitarian denomination by virtue of their being members of the Free Religious Association. As we explained in the first number of THE INDEX, it was a certain course of action in the Unitarian National Conference which furnished the occasion for those preliminary meetings which finally resulted in the Free Religious Association. But before the organization came, all denominational limits and aims were expressly ignored. And now we are sure the Association would conceive that its cause would be greatly damaged, were it publicly understood to be an organized wing of a sect. No, friends, we make no claim to have the Free Religious Association counted in the limits of the Unitarian body. We make a vastly larger claim than that. And we announce to those Unitarians who are urging the formation of an Evangelical Association to balance our movement, that they will have to make their “Evangelical” body a good deal larger than the “right wing” of Unitarianism can furnish material for, in order to get a centripetal power that shall control all the centrifugal tendencies represented in the Free Religious Association. A good many bodies, and nuclei of bodies are being drawn into the harmony of our movement, which never knew the attraction of the Unitarian denominational centre, and they are not likely to be thrown off the sweep of their larger orbit by the counter force of any Evangelical asteroid that can be split off from the Unitarian body. We are glad that we can count so many Unitarians among our members. We hope it is true that there are “forty” Unitarian ministers in full and avowed fellowship with the Free Religious movement, and that “fifty” more are more or less in sympathy with it, as has been estimated during this Unitarian discussion; we should hardly have reckoned the number so large, though we have not taken the trouble to count them. (Perhaps our friendly opponent, Rev. Dr. Thompson, will send us his list, which we might occasionally find useful.) But whatever the number be, forty, fifty, or a hundred, if these Unitarian ministers and the laymen they represent—this mere section of Unitarianism—constituted the Free Religious Association, we should think there were little reason for its existence, and, for ourselves, should have little interest in it. It is because it represents the converging, progressing tendencies of so many sects and religions that it enlists our interest and service. No mere fragment of a sect, but the representative of the natural sympathies of all religions, and of a spiritual fellowship, above all claims of religious party or sect or system, on the ground of natural intuitions of truth and goodness,—that is the position of the Free Religious Association, so far, perhaps, as one sentence can express it. And if there has been any comparison of lines between Unitarianism and the Free Religious movement, it is not because the latter is an organization within the former, but because the logical orbit of Unitarianism necessarily coincides in part with the larger path of Free Religion.

We might have saved ourselves the trouble, perhaps, of writing the above article, by simply quoting the following from the Christian Register, which most energetically opposes the projected Evangelical Unitarian Association, and which seems in this matter to have the larger part of the Unitarian denomination on its side:—

“Surely the Liberal Christian will thank us for directing the attention of its clear and bright eyes to a fallacy which was overlooked in its last number. The proposed Evangelical Unitarian Association is pitted against the Free Religious Association as if both were organizations within the Unitarian lines. So far as the Free Religious Association is concerned, this is wholly wrong. Persons identified with the Free Religious Association would leave it instantly, if it were in any way connected with Unitarianism. Mr. Abbot has publicly renounced all responsibility for the denomination, and as publicly absolved the denomination from all responsibility for him. When Mr. Emerson is staying in Boston, his letters are not sent to the care of Rev. Charles Lowe, 42 Chauncy St. [Headquarters of the Unitarian Association.] Probably Col. Higginson's name is not on the subscription list of either Register or Liberal Christian. To be sure there are Unitarians among the Free Religiousists, but their denominational relations are ignored at the Free Religious meetings.”

The persons whose names are given above have, indeed, formerly been identified with the Unitarians; but we could have given the Register a long list of members of the Free Religious Association, and several of them persons of a national reputation, who have never had any connection with the Unitarian movement, and would be very much surprised to find themselves counted within its lines.

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on “THE WORSHIP OF JESUS,” (50 cts.) and an Essay on “REASON AND REVELATION,” by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on “THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;” Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on “PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;” the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

We have at last a Beecherian suggestion as the best way to solve the vexed question of the Pope's personal infallibility. Rev. T. K. Beecher, of Elmira, New York, referring to the statement that five hundred out of the seven hundred Bishops in the Great Council favor the dogma of infallibility, thinks most ministers are sure to be right five times out of seven, or five hundred times in seven hundred, and suggests a pro rata decree:—Let him be accused who shall deny that the holy father hits right five times in seven, and errs two times in seven, according to the ratio of the seven hundred fathers in council, who divided five to two.—Toledo Blade.

AN HEROIC ACTION.—At a boiler explosion in New York, on Monday, the conduct of the engineer, John Donnelly, was in the heroic vein. He saw that the boiler was leaking and that an explosion was inevitable, but with a high sense of duty, instead of flying from the danger, he bravely stood to his post, knowing that many lives were in danger, and commenced to draw out the fires. Before he completed the task however, the explosion took place, and the gallant fellow was blown several rods in an adjoining yard, and his head, arms and face were dreadfully scalded. He is a poor man, with a family, and his life is in a critical condition.—Boston Investigator.

“GIVE ME A PIN AND I’LL SHOW YOU A SHOW.”

“Give me a pin, and I’ll show you a show!”
My little boy shouts as he climbs my knee;
And he holds up his toy with childish joy;
“Peep through the hole and see what you’ll see!”

He fancies I’m tranced with the wheeling stars
And the shifting crosses of green and gold;
But my heart looks out through the years that are gone,
And these are the pictures it sees unrolled:

A bright lad reading a pictured page
To a fair young girl, who is kneeling there—
“And when I am king you shall wear my ring,
And weave me a scarf of your waving hair!”

A bride half turned at her bridal door,
All her sweet face lit by the taper’s glow
That one white hand holds, while the other enfolds
His neck, as she murmurs, “I love you so!”

A warrior armed for the morrow’s field:
To his breast is clinging a weeping wife;
And she sobs, “If you fall, I will lose my all,
But, dearest, your honor is more than life.”

A mother, hushing her restless babe,
Suddenly ceases the cradle song,
And the wan lips cry, “If he come not, I die,
For my heart is faint with watching so long!”

Ah! never those lips will greet him again:
Cold, cold is that heart as the wintry sleet.
Though her lord spurs fast through the rising blast,
Too late! too late! nevermore shall they meet.

“Give me a pin, and I’ll show you a show!”
My darling! henceforward, through life, to me,
The bravest shows that the wide world knows
Are not worth the weight of your childish fee.

YOUNG AMERICA.

A lady walking along Canal street, New Orleans, was attracted by the bright eyes and blonde curls of a little urchin seated on the curbing. She approached and asked him if he was a newsboy.
“No, ma’am, I aint nothin’.”
“Have you no home?”
“No.”
“Would you like to have one?”
“You bet!”
“You should not speak so idly, my son. But come, how would you like me for a mother?”
The little fellow scanned her from head to foot for a moment, and then inquired:—
“Would you whip me?”
“Not unless you were bad.”
“Let me go bar-footed?”
“No.”
“Play hoss?”
“No.”
“Pull the cat’s tail?”
“No.”
“Lick the puddin’ dish?”
“No.”
“Cuss?”
“No.”
“Smoke?”
“No.”
“Then go ’long with you; you don’t know anything. I reckon next you’d say a feller shouldn’t cross his legs and whistle ‘Come along Josy!’” and the little fellow’s face glowed with ineffable contempt.

RESTITUTION.—A certain Rabbi had two sons, whom he and his wife tenderly loved.
Duty obliged the Rabbi to take a journey to a distant country; during his absence, his two promising boys sickened and died.
The grief-stricken mother laid them out on their bed, drew the curtain, and waited anxiously for her husband.
He came—it was night.
“How are my boys?” was the first question. “Let me see them.”
“Stay awhile,” said his wife; “I am in great trouble, and I want your advice. Some years ago a friend lent me some jewels. I took great care of them, at last began to prize them as my own. Since your departure, my friend has called for them, but I did not like to part with them. Shall I give them up?”
“Wife! what a strange request is this? Give them up, and that instantly, this very night! Show me the jewels.”
She took the Rabbi to their bed, drew aside the curtain, and said—“Husband, there are the jewels!”
The Rabbi bowed his head and wept.

A Western paper relates this story:—
“Deacon B., of Ohio, a very pious man, was noted for his long prayers, especially in his family. One Monday morning the Deacon and his wife were alone, and, as was his custom after breakfast, a prayer was offered. There being an unusual amount of work that day, the Deacon’s prayer was short; and seizing his hat and milk pail he started for the barn. His wife, being deaf, did not notice his absence, but supposed him to be still engaged in prayer. On his return from milking he was surprised to find her still kneeling. He stepped up to her and shouted ‘Amen,’ when she immediately arose and went about her business as if nothing happened.”

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. ADVERTISEMENTS.

The City of Toledo,

To Capitalists and Manufacturers.

The Population of Toledo

In 1840 was 1,220.

In 1850—3,829.

In 1860—13,784.

In 1866—24,401.

In 1870—35,000.

The City is located on the Maumee River, four miles from Lake Erie, and has the best harbor on the Lakes. Nearly 2,000 miles of railroad and over 800 miles of canal centre here.

Two new railroads are projected and in process of construction; one extending south-east through the coal field of Ohio to the Ohio River, the other extending north-west to the lumber districts of Michigan.

In 1867, upwards of eight miles of Dwelling Houses were erected in Toledo.

In 1869, 18,000,000 bushels of Grain, 32,000,000 feet of Black Walnut Lumber, and over 115,000,000 feet of Pine Lumber, 80,000,000 feet of Shingle and Lathe were shipped from Toledo, making the Toledo market second only to Chicago.

The Wholesale Trade, in all Departments, is very extensive, amounting to nearly $50,000,000.

The total trade of the city for 1869 exceeded $500,000,000.

The Public Schools are not surpassed in the West. The City contains 25 Churches, 6 Banks, 3 Savings Banks, 6 Building Associations, Street Railways, and a Public Library.

The City is largely engaged in the manufacture of Railway Cars, Sash, Doors and Blinds, Trunks, Wheels and Bent Work, Sheet Iron, Tin and Copper Ware, Marble Work, Brick, Iron and Wood work of all kinds.

During the past six years the City has expended in improving streets, and in the construction of side-walks and sewers upwards of $2,250,000.

The rapid growth of Toledo, and its favorable position for commerce and manufacturing, renders it a very inviting field for the investment of capital and the establishment of factories of all kinds.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Dec. 5, 1869.]

"Still through our paltry stir and strife
Glow down the wished Ideal,
And Longing moulds in clay what Life
Carves in the marble Real."

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

Every species of animal or plant is developed out of a germ, in which is contained the law of its own development. Throw into the soil a kernel of corn, and no assiduity of culture, no skill of science, no combination of natural or artificial circumstances, will ever bring out of that kernel a blade of grass or a stalk of wheat. If it lives and grows at all, it will inevitably spring up into a corn-stalk,—that, or nothing. Bury an acorn in the earth, and it will become an oak,—never, under any influences, an ash, a maple, or a birch. Take a duck's egg, and hatch it under a hen or in an oven,—and, despite all human ingenuity, out of its broken shell will emerge a duckling, and nothing else. And so on. The vitalized germ of each animal and of each plant will become an individual of its own species, by a law which knows no exception. Forces which operate with the certainty of fate determine its evolution according to a pre-established plan or type. In long periods of time, I believe that new species are gradually evolved out of old ones; but the change is insensible from one generation to another. The nutrient matter which supplies the materials of increase arranges itself with unerring precision so as to reproduce the ancestral form. Prior to the existence of every organic being, its idea or type exists in Nature, moulds plastic matter in strict accordance with its own law, and presides, like an invisible architect, over the construction of the new edifice of life. Whatever theories men may hold concerning the reality of a "vital principle" in the organism,—under whatever terms they may formulate the process of organic development,—the essential fact can be denied by no one, that the young individual, even if slightly varying in some particulars from the form of its parents, will inevitably belong to the same species, and assimilate all nourishment in subordination to its pre-existent type or idea. Inexplicable as the fact is, it remains a fact still; and I claim it as an indisputable truth of science, as well as of common experience, that organic forces build up each new living structure in the strictest accordance with the typical form of its own species.

Now in this case we see the individual plant or animal obeying in its growth a definite idea, and yet doing this in utter unconsciousness. The physical development of a living organism takes place according to laws of which it knows nothing,—as mechanically, so far as the organism itself is concerned, as a piece of cotton cloth is woven in a modern factory. The idea or type exists in Nature, but not in the consciousness of the young being. Consciousness, even in the human race, is itself impossible, until the physical structure has reached a high degree of perfection, under the superintendence of this pre-existent idea. For my own part, this simple fact alone proves to me, almost with the force of absolute demonstration, that intelligence is the very root of outward Nature and pervades the universe as omnipresent and ever-active cause. But, avoiding all digression, let me emphasize the thought to which I would call your attention now,—that organic life obeys the idea which determines its development, in utter blindness and unconsciousness. Every plant and every animal develops from its germ involuntarily and necessarily; and the idea which dominates this growth into a specific form, acts in absolute independence of the organism itself.

With this truth, which under some phraseology or other every thinker is forced to recognize, we find a striking contrast, when we turn from physical to spiritual life, and contemplate the formation of moral character. Here we discover the introduction of a new element into the phenomenon. Take the character of any person you please, and study the causes which have produced it. If I mistake not, you will discern both a voluntary and an involuntary element in its formation. On the one hand, it will be plain that moral character is partially determined for every man by influences over which he has no control. He is born with a nervous organization which he cannot change, inherited from his parents and earlier ancestors, and capable of only a certain amount of moral development. He is born also into a set of surrounding circumstances which he cannot escape, and which practically decide for him in large measure the direction his moral development must take. Organization and circumstance, therefore,—temperament, early habit, and so forth,—appear as the involuntary element in the formation of moral character.

On the other hand, every man, or almost every man, is able, notwithstanding his surroundings, to exert a certain choice in modifying or controlling them. I am aware of the great controversy concerning moral freedom, and would not disguise the fact that many able thinkers deny its reality; but on this subject I will now say only this,—that either moral freedom exists, or there is no such thing as morality. The whole distinction of right and wrong is based on the pre-supposition of moral freedom; and no man who denies all moral freedom has any logical right to talk about moral distinctions. Believing, therefore, in the reality of moral character as the supreme fact of life, and wishing now to distinguish its voluntary from its involuntary element, I maintain that every man, no matter what his condition of life, has the power to determine his own moral character in that condition to a greater or less extent. As a moral being, he cannot help having a conception of what he ought to be in that condition,—he cannot help having the power of being what he ought to be in it. There is a conscience, a sense of right and wrong, in every human soul; and although conscience may be woefully dark, and the will woefully weak, still every man not an idiot is able to make himself morally better or morally worse under his peculiar circumstances. Over and above, therefore, the involuntary element in the formation of character, there is also a voluntary element which cannot be ignored: and it is the existence of this voluntary element which distinguishes spiritual from physical life.

Thus the pre-existent idea or type which determines absolutely the species of every developing organism, and acts irrespectively of its consciousness, presides alone in the formation of the human body as a member of the human species; while in the sphere of spiritual life, the pre-existent idea of human nature, which makes each man a free moral being without any choice of his own, is supplemented by a MORAL IDEAL which he is at liberty to obey or disobey as he chooses, and thus to decide for himself his character as a good or bad moral being. In other words, the "creative idea" (to use a phrase of Claude Bernard) of the species makes the body human; the "creative idea" of human nature makes the soul human: but it is voluntary obedience or disobedience to the moral ideal which makes the soul's humanity noble or ignoble. It is the existence of a moral ideal in the soul which renders possible our spiritual life. Destroy that, and we shall be no more responsible for our characters than we are for the shape of our bodies. In fact, we shall have no characters, but shall live as characterless as so many apes in the forests of South America. To expunge our ideal would be to paralyze our sense of right and wrong, extinguish every high aspiration, put out the lamp of conscience, and condemn us to the melancholy twilight of purely brute existence.

If I have succeeded in making my thought intelligible, it will be clear that the possession of a moral ideal is the very crown and glory of our humanity. It is the struggle to realize our ideal which constitutes the true essence of religion. The Infinite Thought which pervades Nature and eternally creates the offspring in the image of its parents, makes us human, both in body and soul, irrespective of our own choice or preference; but by setting our ideal before us and leaving us free to obey or disobey this as we will, it makes our humanity divine. Our ideal is God's idea of humanity as it ought to be; and to our free, conscious effort has he entrusted the realization of his own idea. It is the natural, unmiraculous revelation of our possible destiny,—the constant, ever-powerful allurements to accomplish this destiny,—the gentle but piercing rebuke of Eternal Goodness when we fail to follow it as our trusted guide. Free fidelity to it is the condition of all moral greatness and spiritual peace,—the exercise of a divine prerogative in the creation of our own character,—the assimilation of ourselves to the Perfect Rectitude and the fulfilment of the audacious dream of becoming in a high sense the children of God. Born of aspiration and nurtured by high endeavor, every great character is thus a faint outshadowing of the Infinite Perfection, and testifies to a profound unity between the human soul and the Origin of all being. Nature everywhere manifests God without us; but the ideal is his living voice within us. Friends, my whole religion centres in the fact of this perennial, this natural, this unutterable revelation of Eternal Being in the soul of man. Whoever manifests his faith in ideal excellence by his daily walk among men, by his single-minded love of truth, and by brave obedience to the truth as he himself sees it, exhibits to me the essential reality of all religion, I care not what may be his thought or speech concerning names that other men revere. Atheists may and do exhibit this devotion to ideal excellence as conspicuously as any theist, and thus prove that it is independent of speculative theology. The fundamental verity is the transcendent value of the ideal in the soul; this is the fact of facts, the essence of all that is real, the core and pith and marrow of human life. What do I care whether you call this "creative ideal" of moral excellence the voice of God or the voice of Nature, provided you do but live it out in character and conduct? Pick your names to suit yourself; you may call yourself an atheist or materialist if you please; but so long as you feel and obey the marvellous attractions of this great magnet in the soul, I claim you as my brother in all that I hold dear as religion. Behind the shows and semblances of things, I know that we prize the highest that which is worth the most; and I ask no more. Before the rough marble of our opportunities, I know we stand with mallet and chisel, eager to hew out the same shape of surpassing beauty as our life-work; and whether we succeed or fail, I know we have both been touched with awe and hope by the same magnificent vision. Be the record of our lives what it may, we shall at least have aimed at the best; and before the ultimate Justice all lives must be measured at last by their persistent aims. Accomplishment is fatally alloyed; but the divine passion for ideal goodness shall burn away the dross of every failure, leaving the pure gold of a life not lived in vain.

I might spend much time in disrobing the false ideals of men,—the evil things that mask themselves as angels of light, and lead foolish feet astray. But the time would, I fear, be ill-spent. I am persuaded that men are too often wilful accomplices in such self-deceptions. An inward protest accompanies every misdirection of human powers away from that which is morally and spiritually pure. Men cheat themselves by their own sleight of hand, and, fascinated by the jugglery of selfishness, chuckle as they make the worse appear the better reason; but they are never quite befooled by their own sophistries. I doubt if any man lives below his true ideal, without being at least half-conscious of the fact. It is because we turn a deaf ear to our own expostulations, and blink our ideal out of sight, that we at last justify ourselves in wrong. By experience alone, after all, are we taught to dismount our false ideals from their pedestals, and re-instate the true. Bitterness clings to every desertion of the just and upright; in the end, the laws of God are too strong for us, and we are glad to purchase peace, even on the difficult terms of repentance and disgorgement of our prey. There is a retributive power in our ideal that terribly avenges our contempt of it. We need very little instruction when we are on a wrong course; we are aware of the fact far better than our would-be instructor. Presently the upshot comes; and the lesson is at last taught us through our fingers' ends. Instead of dwelling on the eclipse of our ideal by opaque self-interests, let me touch on a threefold distinction in the thing itself.

There is some looseness in the use of the word ideal, under which I would distinguish the Ideal of Society, the Ideal of Human Nature, and the Ideal of the Individual Soul.

By the first, or Ideal of Society, I would indicate that social state in which all social wrongs should be abolished, and, in place of governments restraining evil passions from their innocent prey, there should be only voluntary unions for co-operative ends. When governments, through the disappearance of all crimes, escape the necessity of governing, and possess no function beyond that of promoting public interests which are too vast for individuals or small associations to manage,—when every man is a law to himself and lives by the Golden Rule,—then the equality, liberty, and fraternity of the race will be established. The community of mankind will never be perfected until, on the one hand, each individual shall have absolute freedom of self-development, and find all possible furtherance in this object from all other individuals,—and, on the other hand, the welfare of the whole race shall be the paramount object in the activity of each of its members. But it would be futile to hope to anticipate the special arrangements befitting a state of things so remote, and seemingly so chimerical. The Ideal of Society can only be realized through the universal education of all into the highest virtue and intelligence.

The second, or Ideal of Human Nature, is a concentration in one person of all the perfections possible to all persons,—a summing up of all the powers and faculties, in their highest degree, which are found distributed among the race in lower degrees. The ideal Man, in this sense of the word, would unite all intellectual, practical, moral, æsthetic, and affectional capacities of the race, exactly balanced in their proportions and equally developed in exercise. His life would be the even expansion of this perfect nature, in all directions, from childhood up; and nothing would mar the absolute beauty of it. It is needless to say that such a man has never existed, and never could exist. He would have to combine in one character opposite, nay, contradictory qualities, as for instance those of the two sexes; and even if this could be accomplished, he would still at any given moment represent only a certain stage of development, and therefore not be perfect in any absolute sense. Human Nature was never historically thus developed in an individual. Raphael lacked the spiritual purity of Jesus; Jesus lacked the artistic genius of Raphael; both lacked the scientific intellect of Newton; and so on. The common statement that Jesus was an absolute realization of ideal humanity overlooks the fact that Jesus was as much one-sided in development as any other child of genius. The religious element in his character overbalanced all its other elements. He exhibited a very high degree of moral and spiritual development, but did not exhibit an equal development either on the intellectual or the practical side of his nature. It is futile to seek in any real man a union of qualities which are compatible only in imagination, not in fact. Jesus could not have done his work except for his deficiencies. The genius of a Phidias, a Dante, a Michel Angelo, or the inventive faculty of a Fulton, or the executive ability of a Napoleon, would infallibly have diverted him from his task, and frustrated his life. Had he been indeed the ideal Man of the race, with every human power in its highest perfection, he would probably never have been heard of. Certain it is, that he owed as much to his deficiencies as to his capacities, as does every man who achieves grand results. The Ideal of Human Nature, therefore, can never be realized in any one individual, but expresses to our thought merely the sum of all possible human perfections.

It is the third, or Ideal of the Individual Soul, which acts upon character as a formative and creative force. To each of mankind, this conception of the highest that he can be and do, is private and peculiar. No two human souls can have the same ideal. For our ideal utters to every one of us that which we, with our balance of faculties and degree of culture and environment of circumstance, are able to be and to do, if faithful to our own actual opportunities. These differ in the case of each human being; and therefore each human being has his or her private ideal, unlike all others. It would be fatal folly for me to obey the ideal of a soul differently endowed with natural proclivities or abilities. To develop sacredly our own individualities, yet in perfect harmony with the universal moral laws which ought to govern all human action and life, is the only way to realize our several ideals; and what do we not lose, when, instead of developing our own individualities, we attempt to reproduce the individuality of some other person? Here lies the profound, the deadly danger of all spiritual imitation; it kills individuality, and murders the Ideal of the Individual Soul. It is a high duty to suppress every influence that would divert us from the free development of the capacities we possess, directed by the private ideal which belongs to each of us alone.

It is, consequently, this third form of the Ideal which concerns our conduct as individuals. Neither the Ideal of Society, nor the Ideal of Human Nature, can speak to us with the voice of lawful command. But the Ideal of the Individual Soul is the voice of its own nature, revealing to it its possible destiny and determining its actual duty. Obedience to this voice at every cost is the pathway to that character which is the divine goal of every career. He is the hero, she the heroine, who dares to follow out the mandates of this secret and sacred monitor, forgetful of clamorous crowds or lowering storms or bloody pains. There are such souls as these, rare though they be; and they shine as stars forever in the skies of history. How quick should be our hearing, how instantaneous our obedience, to the whispers of this inner voice! Whatever inclines me to despise or disregard the teachings of the ideal thus ever present to my soul, is the deadliest enemy I can encounter; and if I would not plunge into moral abysses of unfaithfulness and degradation, it behooves me to make stout conflict at the outset with the seductive foe. The first and last word of religion must be ever this,—“Be thyself; obey thy own ideal.” To me, friends, this is the voice of God,—whispered in the depths of the soul, echoed throughout all space and time in the divine order and beauty of universal Nature. This is the perpetual revelation of the Infinite to the Finite, universal, ordinary, and unmiraculous,—independent of all Bibles, because all Bibles are the product of it,—superior to all Christs, because all Christs are its humble servitors. The physical and chemical and purely organic laws which control the life of the body from birth to death, are absolute and inviolable; it cannot escape them for an instant. But the moral laws which ought to control our free action as moral beings, we can and do violate; though we always pay the penalty of the violation. The soul's ideal, therefore, which is our highest insight into these great moral and spiritual laws, shows us the only pathway to that complete unity of self with the cosmos which it is the function of religion to realize. To be one with Nature is to be one with God; is it not, then, true that the soul's ideal, the eternal Duty which confronts us at every step and points us up to the mountain summits of spiritual fidelity, is the highest and best that we can ever know of God? It is the secret of all oneness with him,—his own ever-enduring invitation to find our peace in voluntary unity with himself. So, at least, runs my dream,—and if this divine dream shall ever be dissipated, may the emptier dream of life not long outlast it!

PROFESSOR OAKLEY, in a recent lecture at Edinburgh, maintained that the mediæval and early Christians borrowed their church music from pagan hymns—the church tunes now denominated “Gregorian chants” having the same origin. So it would appear that what is usually considered the most “churchlike” music in existence, is really the same that was used in the pagan ceremonies of the Greeks and Romans.

RELIGIOUS WHITE-WASHING.

[An Extract from Holland's "Life of Lincoln."]

Mr. Newton Bateman, Superintendent of Public Instruction for the State of Illinois, occupied a room adjoining and opening into the Executive Chamber. Frequently this door was open during Mr. Lincoln's receptions; and throughout the seven months or more of his occupation Mr. Bateman saw him nearly every day. Often when Mr. Lincoln was tired, he closed his door against all intrusion, and called Mr. Bateman into his room for a quiet talk. On one of these occasions Mr. Lincoln took up a book containing a careful canvass of the city of Springfield in which he lived, showing the candidate for whom each citizen had declared it his intention to vote in the approaching election. Mr. Lincoln's friends had, doubtless at his own request, placed the result of the canvass in his hands. This was toward the close of October, and only a few days before the election. Calling Mr. Bateman to a seat at his side, having previously locked all the doors, he said:—“Let us look over this book. I wish particularly to see how the ministers of Springfield are going to vote.” The leaves were turned, one by one, and as the names were examined Mr. Lincoln frequently asked if this one and that one were not a minister, or an elder, or the member of such or such a church, and sadly expressed his surprise on receiving an affirmative answer. In that manner they went through the book; and then he closed it, and sat silently regarding a memorandum in pencil which lay before him. At length he turned to Mr. Bateman with a face full of sadness, and said:—“Here are twenty-three ministers of different denominations, and all of them are against me but three; and here are a great many prominent members of the churches, a very large majority of whom are against me. Mr. Bateman, I am not a Christian—God knows I would be one—but I have carefully read the Bible, and I do not so understand this book;” and he drew from his bosom a pocket New Testament. “These men well know,” he continued, “that I am for freedom in the territories, freedom everywhere as far as the Constitution and laws will permit, and that my opponents are for slavery. They know this, and yet, with this book in their hands, in the light of which human bondage cannot live a moment, they are going to vote against me. I do not understand it at all.”

Here Mr. Lincoln paused—paused for long minutes, his features surcharged with emotion. Then he rose, and walked up and down the room in the effort to retain or regain his self-possession. Stopping at last, he said, with a trembling voice and his cheeks wet with tears:—“I know there is a God, and that He hates injustice and slavery. I see the storm coming, and I know that His hand is in it. If He has a place and work for me—and I think He has—I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. I know I am right because I know that liberty is right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God. I have told them that a house divided against itself cannot stand, and Christ and reason say the same; and they will find it so.”

Much of this was uttered as if he were speaking to himself, and with a sad and earnest solemnity of manner impossible to be described. After a pause, he resumed:—“Doesn't it appear strange that men can ignore the moral aspects of this contest? A revelation could not make it plainer to me that slavery or the government must be destroyed. The future would be something awful, as I look at it, but for this rock on which I stand” (alluding to the Testament which he still held in his hand), “especially with the knowledge of how these ministers are going to vote. It seems as if God had borne with this thing (slavery) until the very teachers of religion have come to defend it from the Bible, and to claim for it a divine character and sanction; and now the cup of iniquity is full, and the vials of wrath will be poured out.”

His last reference was to certain prominent clergymen in the South, Drs. Ross and Palmer among the number; and he went on to comment on the atrociousness and essential blasphemy of their attempt to defend American slavery from the Bible. After this the conversation was continued for a long time. Everything he said was of a peculiarly deep, tender and religious tone, and that he should be an actor in the terrible struggle which would issue in the overthrow of slavery, though he might not live to see the end. He repeated many passages of the Bible, and seemed specially impressed with the solemn grandeur of portions of Revelation, describing the wrath of Almighty God. In the course of the conversation, he dwelt much upon the necessity of faith in the Christian's God, as an element of successful statesmanship, especially in times like those which were upon him, and said that it gave that calmness and tranquillity of mind, that assurance of ultimate success, which made a man firm and immovable amid the wildest excitements. After further reference to a belief in Divine Providence, and the fact of God in history, the conversation turned upon prayer. He freely stated his belief in the duty, privilege and efficiency of prayer, and intimated, in unmistakable terms, that he had sought in that way the divine guidance and favor.

The effect of this conversation upon the mind of Mr. Bateman, a Christian gentleman whom Mr. Lincoln profoundly respected, was to convince him that Mr. Lincoln had, in his quiet way, found a path to the Christian stand-point—that he had found God, and rested on the eternal truth of God. As the two men were about to separate, Mr. Bateman remarked:—“I have not supposed that you were accustomed to think so much upon this class of subjects. Certainly your friends generally are ignorant of the sentiments you have expressed to me." He replied quickly:—"I know they are. I am obliged to appear different to them; but I think more on these subjects than upon all others, and I have done so for years; and I am willing that you should know it."

This remarkable conversation furnishes a golden link in the chain of Mr. Lincoln's history. It flashes a strong light upon the path he had already trod, and illuminates every page of his subsequent record. Men have wondered at his abounding charity, his love of men, his equanimity under the most distressing circumstances, his patience under insult and misrepresentation, his delicate consideration of the feelings of the humble, his apparent incapacity of resentment, his love of justice, his transparent simplicity, his truthfulness, his good will toward his enemies, his beautiful and unshaken faith in the triumph of right. There was undoubtedly something in his natural constitution that favored the development of these qualities; but those best acquainted with human nature will hardly attribute the combination of excellencies which were exhibited in his character and life to the unaided forces of his constitution. The man who carried what he called "this rock" in his bosom, who prayed, who thought more of religious subjects than of all others, who had an undying faith in the providence of God, drew his life from the highest fountains.

It was one of the peculiarities of Mr. Lincoln to hide these religious experiences from the eyes of the world. In the same State House where this conversation occurred, there were men who imagined—who really believed—who freely said—that Mr. Lincoln had probably revealed himself with less restraint to them than to others—men who thought they knew him as they knew their bosom companions—who had never in their whole lives heard from his lips one word of all these religious convictions and experiences. They had never seen anything but the active lawyer, the keen politician, the jovial, fun-loving companion, in Mr. Lincoln. All this department of his life he had kept carefully hidden from them. Why he should say that he was obliged to appear differently to others does not appear; but the fact is a matter of history that he never exposed his own religious life to those who had no sympathy with it. It is doubtful whether the clergymen of Springfield knew anything of these experiences. Very few of them were in political sympathy with him; and it is evident that he could open his heart to no one except under the most favorable circumstances. The fountain from which gushed up so grand and good a life was kept carefully covered from the eyes of the world. Its possessor looked into it often, but the careless or curious crowd were never favored with the vision. There was much in his conduct that was simply a cover to these thoughts—an attempt to conceal them. It is more than probable that, on separating from Mr. Bateman on this occasion, he met some old friend, and, departing by a single bound from his tearful melancholy and his sublime religious passion, he told him some story, or indulged in some jest, that filled his own heart with mirthfulness, and awoke convulsions of laughter in him who heard it.

These sudden and wide transitions of feeling were common with him. He lived for years a double life—a deep and a shallow one. Oppressed with great responsibilities, absorbed by the most profound problems relating to his own spirit and destiny, brought into sympathetic relation with the woes of the world, and living much in the depths of a sadness whose natural fountain had been deepened by the experience of his life, he found no relief except by direct and entire translation to that other channel of his life which lay among his shallowest emotions. His sense of the ludicrous and the grotesque, of the witty and the funny, was really something wonderful; and when this sense was appealed to by a story, or an incident, or a jest, he seemed to leave all his dignity aside, and give himself up to mirth with no more self-restraint than if he were a boy of twelve years. He resorted to this channel of life for relief. It was here that he won strength for trial by forgetting trial. It was here that he restored the balance which sadness had destroyed. Such a nature and character seem full of contradictions; and a man who is subject to such transitions will always be a mystery to those who do not know him wholly. Thus no two men among his intimate friends will agree concerning him.

The writer has conversed with multitudes of men who claimed to know Mr. Lincoln intimately; yet there are not two who agree in their estimate of him. The fact was that he rarely showed more than one aspect of himself to one man. He opened himself to men in different directions. It was rare that he exhibited what was religious in him; and he never did this at all, except when he found just the nature and character that were sympathetic with that aspect and element of his character. A great deal of his best, deepest, largest life he kept almost constantly from view, because he would not expose it to the eyes and apprehension of the careless multitude.

To illustrate the effect of this peculiarity of Mr. Lincoln's intercourse with men, it may be said that men who knew him through all his professional and political life have offered opinions as diametrically opposite as these, viz: that he was a very ambitious man, and that he was without a particle of ambition; that he was one of the saddest men that ever lived, and that he was one of the jolliest men that ever lived; that he was very religious, but that he was not a Christian; that he was a Christian, but did not know it; that he was so far from being a religious man or a Christian that 'the less said upon that subject, the better;' that he was the most cunning man in America, that he had not a particle of cunning in him; that he had the strongest personal attachments, and that he had no personal attachment at all—only a general good feeling toward everybody; that he was a man of indomitable will, and that he was a man almost without a will; that he was a tyrant, and that he was the softest-hearted, most brotherly man that ever lived; that he was remarkable for his premeditatedness, and that he was the foulest in his jests and stories of any man in the country; that he was a witty man, and that he was only a retailer of the wit of others; that his apparent candor and fairness were only apparent, and that they were as real as his head and his hands; that he was a boor, and that he was in all essential respects a gentleman; that he was a leader of the people, and that he was always led by the people; that he was cool and impassive, and that he was susceptible of the strongest passions. It is only by tracing these separate streams of impressions back to their fountain that we are able to arrive at anything like a competent comprehension of the man, or learn why he came to be held in such various estimation. Men caught only separate aspects of his character—only the fragments that were called into exhibition by their own qualities.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"If we had a good long summer day before us, seated on a hill-top, under clear sunshine, with a broad landscape before us, it would give me great satisfaction to discuss your Fifty Affirmations with you. For from No. 1 to No. 50, we should find matter for argument, at least in the way of definition and distinction. And some time this spring I do want to meet you for some good, frank, full speech, face to face. Meanwhile, however, though I stand within, and as near to the living centre as possible, of the Christian Religion, I do also heartily rejoice in, and intend to claim for all, and to use myself, a Freedom of Thought that knows no limits other than the Laws of the Universal Reason, and with both hands I long to unite in concerted action with all who are striving to organize human societies in each community and nation, and around the globe, into one grand Family of the Children of God. So though intellectually I may differ from you, in spirit and aim I am quite heartily with you."

"Much of your plan pleased me, though a regular 'minister' in a Presbyterian Church, i. e. one that was Presbyterian, but now is more Congregational. I cannot go the full length you do in a stand 'wholly outside of Christianity,' though if I followed my feelings at such times as I realize the awful stupidity and superstition of orthodoxy, I certainly should go with you. At any rate, I doubt if your position is any less pleasing to Christ, (provided He is all we have thought in earlier days,) than is the present attitude of the mass of Christian professors. So in a broad sense I am one with you, though thus 'in orders' (such as they are). Brother—— agreed that my position, at present, was as profitable as to take a more public stand. At any rate, I carry along with me all the minds here that are worth holding."

"I desire to say I am much pleased with the paper. It corresponds so perfectly with my religious views, that it seems as though I could hardly wish it altered in any single instance; and, strange to say, I have come to these conclusions almost solely from reading the Bible. Previous to reading your paper I had seen no man who I had reason to suppose held such sentiments. I had a conversation this morning with a gentleman who stayed with me last night, in which he expressed sentiments that seemed to harmonize so perfectly with mine, that I ventured to show him the paper, accompanied with a wish that he would subscribe for it, which he pledged himself to do without any urging, and took your address at once. I hope to find others that will do likewise."

"Your description of a Christian does not find any echo in my consciousness, and the principal ends you announce as the especial mark of Free Religion are the ends of my endeavor. It seems to me that just now too much effort is being wasted in attempts to keep the Christian skin on, or to slough it before it is detached. I do not intend to trouble myself about what men say I am or am not, but do my work and come out where that takes me. If it takes me naturally and easily outside of Christianity, I go. If not, I stay. There is 'a logic of events,' a certain natural fitness of things which puts a man in his right place, if he is true to his work."

"Your paper makes a novel appearance on the table of my Library, where 'good, sound Orthodox' papers have found a resting place for more than a half century, but meditation has suggested to me the necessity of investigation, and long since I resolved to encourage Free Inquiry into the grounds on which opinions are based."

"In my opinion the first thing to be overthrown is the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible. That is the citadel that must be knocked to pieces before we can get an inch of religious progress. I hope and expect to see your paper making this point a principal issue and pointing its guns accordingly."

"I am gratified with the full, clear statement given in the 'Fifty Affirmations.' The first, however, permit me to say, I do not deem complete. Not that nine words could express more fully its object, or, perhaps, its essence; but, in the view of the writer, it is not expressed either in its entirety or its essential elements. The strong, fearless spirit and boundless faith in truth manifested in the first two numbers sent me, come refreshingly after witnessing the spirit of Liberal Christianity succumbing to mere denominationalism. The enterprise that has started THE INDEX is, therefore, earnestly seconded by the writer."

"I take the Independent, and in it I saw a notice of your INDEX. From said notice I judge that the INDEX is to be the Independent in reality. I am anxious to see it. I am a strong advocate of free thought and free expression, regardless of consequences or policy motives. I am glad to hear of such men as yourself, who dare to step outside of all authority, except that of truth as recognized by right, reason, and good conscience. We need more just such, and have no doubt but we shall have them. Your paper, I think, will open the eyes of multitudes who now are just beginning to see."

"I have read with pleasure your prospectus, and have circulated copies of it among my friends. I promise faithfully to do everything in my power to assist you. I have a heart-interest in the cause, and hail with joy this step in the right direction. I shall look anxiously for its first appearance. In these days of increasing newspapers and magazines, it is hard to sustain a new enterprise, but there are, I have no doubt, enough people in the country who, if they knew of the existence of such a paper as THE INDEX, would gladly subscribe, and make it a financial success."

"Will you please send to my address THE INDEX for six months? The paper meets my entire approval. It is just what is, and has been needed; many are hungering for this kind of food, and THE INDEX will fill the bill gloriously. It is tax-time, and that is the reason I can't send more. Last week I had to renew for the Anti-Slavery Standard. This has been our household favorite for twenty-six years; I hope THE INDEX will be its boon companion for as long. Wishing you success in your very laudable and useful work, I am &c."

"I take much pleasure in enclosing two dollars in payment for THE INDEX one year. I understand that the paper excites interest in one quarter to which I gave you the address. Hope it may result in another billet deux dollars."

"Having just now seen the first number of THE INDEX, I hasten to enclose my mite, and wish it were two dollars instead. I enclose a few names to which a specimen copy may be sent, if you have them."

"Enclosed find one dollar for six months of THE INDEX. We hope to be enlightened and benefited by your writings. We will read and circulate, and discuss your novel and startling positions."

"I have neither time nor ability to write you as I could wish. I want THE INDEX and send you herewith two dollars. Yours for the truth and mental freedom."

"You are engaged in a noble work; may you be successful in every sense of the word."

CUPID CAUGHT.

[Translated from Anacreon.]

Young Cupid, bound in rosy chain,
To Beauty's charge the Muses gave,
And bade her ne'er release again
Her lovely little slave.

Then anxious Venus came and brought
A glittering heap of golden ore,
And from his laughing mistress sought
Her darling child once more.

But no! ensnared by Beauty's charms,
The boy refused his chains to flee,
And thralldom deemed, in Beauty's arms,
More sweet than liberty.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

We publish this morning the exceedingly valuable article of Mr. Herndon on "Abraham Lincoln's Religion." We also print an extract from Holland's "Life of Lincoln," to which Mr. Herndon alludes. It will be seen that the truth on this subject has not been heretofore made known. The present number of THE INDEX will be furnished at the following rates:—

For 100 copies, - - - -	$3.50
" 50 " - - - -	2.00

For less than 50 copies, the usual rate of 5 cents a copy will be charged.

So many applications for back Nos. of THE INDEX are constantly received, that we are obliged to repeat the notice, already twice given, that Nos. 1, 3, and 4 are all gone.

THE INDEX circulates in THIRTY-ONE STATES OF THE UNION.

The first number of The Iconoclast, dated Washington, D. C., March 15th, has been received. It is to be published monthly by the National Liberal Reform League, at fifty cents a year. Although very small, it is evidently in good hands, and aims to do an earnest work. We like its tone. In the opening article on "The Situation," it is said:—"We desire to be known, not as mere fault-finders or cavillers, but as humanitarians." It perceives the necessity of clearing the ground from old dogmas, in order that liberal principles may strike root. [We] are sorry to see, however, the following statement:—"The only qualification necessary to become a member of the N. L. R. L. is non-conformity to the orthodox church." Why exclude any one for opinion's sake? Why not leave the door open to all, and let natural affinities act freely? Probably no orthodox believer would wish to enter; but let him exclude himself,—don't exclude him.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW.

We have received a letter from Illinois which calls for a public reply. Out of consideration for the writer, we suppress his name:—

RURAL, Ill., Mar. 23, 1870.

ED. INDEX:—I have for the last eight or nine years quit taking papers of the character of THE INDEX, because, with but one exception (that of the lamented Benjamin S. Jones), their editors were the inconsistent advocates of the late war between the States,—a war that will be a lasting disgrace to the age in which it was inaugurated, unless the spirit of "Seventy-Six" has given place to the despotic systems of Europe. But as I see nothing in the first number of THE INDEX on that subject, and as I trust that all those who ignorantly went for the war are now satisfied of its bad policy and wickedness, you may send it to my address, if still published, and I will remit the price.

Yours, &c.,

The conjecture of our correspondent in one point is correct,—we were not an "inconsistent advocate of the late war." On the contrary, we were a consistent advocate of it from beginning to end. It is with pride we remember that the first public "speech" we ever made, was when, a green college boy, we got up one evening (with great inward trepidation) to say a few words in a little New Hampshire school-house in favor of Fremont's election, in 1856: and that the first "sermon" we ever preached in any church was an earnest plea for the war, delivered in the little Unitarian meeting-house at Meadville, Pa., Mar. 29, 1863. If we have allowed our readers thus far to suspect that we have, for any reason under heaven, shunned to speak of the war, we take great shame to ourself. It is time to set this matter right; and we quote a passage from the sermon above referred to, that our correspondent may be enlightened as to our antecedents.

Taking for a text the cowardly words of Naaman the Syrian to the prophet Elisha,—"In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing,"—and after explaining the circumstances under which they are said to have been uttered, we said:—

"We are all Naamans when we are willing to forget one jot or one tittle of the perfect law of righteousness for the sake of any gain whatsoever, or to escape any loss whatsoever. Yes, friends! when we are willing to compromise in a moral question, we just as truly bow down in the house of Rimmon as if the huge idol stood visibly before us, and we got down and grovelled in the dirt before it. This fair land of ours is called a Christian land. On every green hillside, by every broad river, in villages and towns and cities almost without number, tall steeples are pointing heavenwards in silence, while songs of praise ascend from beneath them up to the Great Spirit of Love. This very moment is wafting upwards thousands of prayers which speak of the great mercy of God to his erring children, and implore his blessing upon the assembled worshippers. Surely this must be a Christian country! Alas that these words should be the bitterest of satires! I am not speaking of the South; neither am I speaking of the horrors of the war. I speak of these Northern States, where justice has well-nigh become a by-word and a reproach. I speak of thousands, yes, of millions, who combine to hate and crush their brother because he is weak and poor and black,—who banish him from their soil,—who abuse, rob, and murder him because he has no friend but God. I speak of traitors at heart, traitors to their country, to humanity, and to God, who are now at work here in our midst to put the devil on the throne of the universe and mould the world after his hideous image. When I see these things, is it any wonder that these Christian churches transform themselves into houses of Rimmon, and the whole land becomes black with the smoke of their sacrifices? In times like these, when the State is shaken to its foundations, and when the public righteousness is in extremest peril, every man who, through disaffection or indifference or indolence, neglects to use his utmost power to strengthen the righteous cause, shall strive in vain to clear his skirts of his country's blood. You ought to form a National League; you ought to do your utmost to win the doubting and bewildered people to the right side. The devil and his unholy crew are busy here in this very town, working day and night to sow treason and hatred of the negro in the hearts of the people. Where are your public meetings to counteract their accursed efforts, and create a better public opinion? Traitors and rebels are in terrible earnest; why are you so lukewarm? Do you care nothing for the cause of righteous government? If you say to yourself—"there is no real danger,"—and leave to others the work which God assigns to you, you are responsible for the defeat which is sure to come. This is no matter for declamation; it is a matter of sober, serious, God-imposed duty; and if you compromise this duty, if you bow in the house of Rimmon, woe is unto you! God will not save this nation, unless it is virtuous enough to do the right; and the nation's virtue is to-day in deadly peril. Rally to its support; help make the nation true and noble and brave, by being true and noble and brave yourselves. I cannot forget a great festival which was held thousands of years ago, as the story runs, in a house of Rimmon. To increase the sport and augment the glory of the god they worshipped, the revellers brought out a poor blind captive, and caused him to work for their insolent amusement. At last, in the agony of his humiliation and despair, he seized the two pillars of the temple, and bowing himself with a mighty effort, crushed the god, his worshippers, and his temple in a common and awful ruin. We, too, have our blind Samson, whom we have caused for many a weary year to sigh that we might laugh, and weep that we might revel; beware lest the strength of God be given to his despair, and the proud fabric of our house of Rimmon crush us in its dizzy fall. The virtue of the nation is nothing but the virtue of the men and women who compose it; and if you do not put forth your uttermost strength to fight this growing hatred of the negro, then you are doing your best to bring down the curse of God upon the national cause, and your damnation is just. I think I love my country; I think I should be willing to make any sacrifice she might require; but before God, I love justice more. If my country's triumph is to bring about the victory of wrong over right, and to block the progress of mankind in righteousness and truth, I have no prayers for her success. It is no prowess of rebel arms which I fear for the cause we uphold, but this inward rottenness in the heart of the North. You must feel your own responsibility at this awful crisis, yes, every man, woman, and child among you; you must leave no deed undone and no word unsaid to combat this increasing hatred of the blacks. If you fail here, I care not how good you may be in other things, how generous, how pure; you are bowing in the house of Rimmon, you have turned your back on God, you have crucified Christ afresh."

This was what we said early in 1863, when the storm-cloud of the terrible negro-slaughtering riots was gathering blackly in the horizon. Since that day, our theology has changed greatly,—our faith in the war and in the cause for which the war was urged, not a whit. We accept no subscriptions like this. We tell our would-be patron that, if he wants to put bridle and bit on the paper he subscribes for, he must seek a ride elsewhere. He will find no steed in THE INDEX, and no stable-keeper in its editor.

Woes must be, and the daughters of Time must walk their accustomed paths; but there is a staff in books and acquirements, and in the habit of looking away, and not always into the sky, either, but out upon the wide, struggling world, losing in the sense of its large movements the dizzying pain of the heart, circling forever round its own personal enigmas—bringing back to the private life and duties the clearer vision, the deeper faith, that comes from knowing the things beyond them.—"A Looker-on," in *N. FREE RELIGION AND "FREE LOVE."

HAMMONTON, N. J., March 4, 1870.

F. E. ABBOT:

Brother,—You say,—“we fear The Truth will hardly approve our way of thinking.” We do most heartily approve your way of thinking, with possibly one or two exceptions. We should like to see more of your paper devoted to “PRACTICAL PLANS” for the elevation of humanity. But our experience has taught us that bigotry will not allow of a practical religion until we do away with superstition. You are doing a good work, stating fundamental truth. But, dear brother, for Humanity’s sake—not for Christ’s sake—give us more practical plans to reform and elevate humanity. To us, your “Free Schools” speak volumes in favor of “The First Independent Society.”

How do you propose to keep “Free Religion” in the hands of those who will use it to elevate mankind? We have found, in this place, and throughout the country, that “free lovers” and selfish adventurers have disgraced and almost ruined Spiritualism. One practical “free lover” asserts that he personally knows sixty Spiritual speakers who openly or in private practise “variety in sexual relations.” We have printed, written and verbal testimony implicating many of the most prominent speakers. The mass of Spiritualists have so little confidence in the leaders, that they endow no Colleges, build very few Halls, and give but little support to Societies and Lyceums, in which there is constant struggle for leadership.

“Free Religion” will have the same evils to contend with. Leading Free Love Spiritualists find Spiritual organizations “don’t pay.” If “free religionists” extend full and honorable fellowship to all, regardless of moral character, “free-lovers” and selfish adventurers will flock to your ranks. Already we notice “free-lovers” are falling in with “free religion.” One of the vilest and most influential in all their ranks has lately stated that Spiritual organizations must fail, and “free religion” prevail. Now if “free religion” means no standard of morality, no code of discipline, and no rule of fellowship, we shall expose it and fight it, as we do “Free Love Spiritualism.”

We are both surprised and pleased with your position; and if you can assure us freedom from “free love” selfishness and sensuality, we shall not let our name, paper or Association divide a movement which is essentially one, but give up our name and paper, and support “THE INDEX” and “Free Religion.” All of our Association, and thousands of virtuous Spiritualists, are closely watching your movement, to see what practical means you are going to use to make “free religion” a means of PURITY and PROGRESS. We shall give it a most hearty support when convinced that it means real PHILANTHROPY and genuine REFORM.

Please answer through “THE INDEX,” and greatly oblige thousands of earnest Reformers.

Fraternally Thine,
TRUTH ASSOCIATION.

W. B. P. Sec’y.

[It is no part of our aim to build up Free Religious organizations. Where these are needed, they will build themselves up. Fully realizing the enormous power of organized bodies, we shall rejoice to see men and women associating for the purpose of mutual improvement and common service of humanity, provided they plant themselves on absolute liberty of thought and conscience. But we have no faith in “tests of fellowship,” even moral tests. If we undertake high and noble work, low and ignoble souls will give us a wide berth. We all go each “to his own place.” We do not “propose to keep Free Religion in the hands of those who will use it to elevate mankind.” It is our business to teach it and live it as well as we can,—not to pull wires in the interest of any organization bearing its name. We need not “keep” it,—it will keep us. It will fill us with such deep disgust at what is monstrosly called “free love,” but ought to be called “free lust,” that the licentious will slink away from our presence as owls slink away from the sunlight. We feel no fear that bad men or women will abuse the principles we advocate. What can they do with these principles except to grow daily better under their influence? We seek to plant the love of truth, the enthusiasm of humanity, the devotion to ideal purity, the fearlessness of free conviction, the faith in great ideas and moral goodness, in every human soul; and shall we dread lest these be prostituted to vile ends? These are Free Religion; and when they once strike root in the soul, they bear perpetual fruit in “practical plans” and practical efforts for human welfare. We would plant the seed,—the eternal laws of God will bring the harvest. —Ed.]

A little reconstructed Southern girl, five years old, asked a colored servant, in the course of a theological examination, what the fifteenth commandment was. The reply that there were only ten commandments was scornfully received, and the child gravely announced that the fifteenth commandment was that the colored people should vote.—Anti-Slavery Standard.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN’S RELIGION.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Feb. 18, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—Some time since I promised you that I would send a letter in relation to Mr. Lincoln’s religion. I do so now. Before entering on that question, one or two preliminary remarks will help us to understand why he disagreed with the Christian world in its principles, as well as in its theology. In the first place, Mr. Lincoln’s mind was a purely logical mind; secondly, Mr. Lincoln was purely a practical man. He had no fancy or imagination, and not much emotion. He was a realist as opposed to an idealist. As a general rule, it is true that a purely logical mind has not much hope, if it ever has faith in the unseen and unknown. Mr. Lincoln had not much hope and no faith in things that lie outside of the domain of demonstration; he was so constituted—so organized—that he could believe nothing unless his senses or logic could reach it. I have often read to him a law point, a decision, or something I fancied; he could not understand it till he took the book out of my hand, and read the thing for himself. He was terribly, vexatiously skeptical. He could scarcely understand anything, unless he had time and place fixed in his mind.

I became acquainted with Mr. Lincoln in 1834, and I think I knew him well to the day of his death. His mind, when a boy in Kentucky, showed a certain gloom, an unsocial nature, a peculiar abstractedness, a bold and daring skepticism. In Indiana, from 1817 to 1830, it manifested the same qualities or attributes as in Kentucky; it only intensified, developed itself along those lines, in Indiana. He came to Illinois in 1830, and, after some little roving, settled in New Salem, now in Menard county and State of Illinois. This village lies about twenty miles northwest of this city. It was here that Mr. Lincoln became acquainted with a class of men the world never saw the like of before or since. They were large men—large in body and large in mind; hard to whip, and never to be fooled. They were a bold, daring, and reckless set of men; they were men of their own minds—believed what was demonstrable—were men of great common sense. With these men Mr. Lincoln was thrown; with them he lived, and with them he moved, and almost had his being. They were skeptics all—scoffers some. These scoffers were good men, and their scoffs were protests against theology—loud protests against the follies of Christianity; they had never heard of Theism and the newer and better religious thoughts of this age. Hence, being natural skeptics, and being bold, brave men, they uttered their thoughts freely. They declared that Jesus was an illegitimate child. I know these men well and have felt for them,—have done my little best when occasion offered, to educate them up to higher thoughts. These men could not conceive it possible that three could be in one, nor one in three Gods; they could not believe that the Father ruined one of his own lovely children. This was monstrous to them. They were on all occasions, when opportunity offered, debating the various questions of Christianity among themselves; they took their stand on common sense and on their own souls; and though their arguments were rude and rough, no man could overthrow their homely logic. They riddled all divines, and not unfrequently made them skeptics—disbelievers as bad as themselves. They were a jovial, healthful, generous, social, true, and manly set of people.

It was here, and among these people, that Mr. Lincoln was thrown. About the year 1834, he chanced to come across Volney’s “Ruins,” and some of Paine’s theological works. He at once seized hold of them, and assimilated them into his own being. Volney and Paine became a part of Mr. Lincoln from 1834 to the end of his life. In 1835, he wrote out a small work on “Infidelity” and intended to have it published. The book was an attack upon the whole grounds of Christianity, and especially was it an attack upon the idea that Jesus was the Christ, the true and only begotten Son of God, as the Christian world contends. Mr. Lincoln was at that time in New Salem, keeping store for Mr. Samuel Hill, a merchant and Postmaster of that place. Lincoln and Hill were very friendly. Hill, I think, was a skeptic at that time. Lincoln, one day after the book was finished, read it to Mr. Hill—his good friend. Hill tried to persuade him not to make it public—not to publish it. Hill at that time saw in Mr. Lincoln a rising man, and wished him success. Lincoln refused to destroy it—said it should be published. Hill swore it should never see the light of day. He had an eye to Lincoln’s popularity—his present and future success; and believing that, if the book were published, it would kill Lincoln forever, he snatched it from Lincoln’s hand, when Lincoln was not expecting it, and ran it into an old-fashioned ten-plate stove, heated as hot as a furnace; and so Lincoln’s book went up to the clouds in smoke. It is confessed by all who heard parts of it, that it was at once able and eloquent; and if I may judge of it from Mr. Lincoln’s subsequent ideas and opinions, often expressed to me and to others in my presence, it was able, strong, plain and fair. His argument was grounded on the internal mistakes of the Old and New Testaments, and on reason, and on the experiences and observations of men. The criticisms from internal defects were sharp, strong, and manly.

Mr. Lincoln moved to this city in 1837, and here he became acquainted with various men of his own way of thinking. At that time they called themselves free thinkers or free thinking men. I remember all these things distinctly, for I was with them, heard them, and was one of them. Mr. Lincoln here found other works, Hume, Gibbon, and others, and drank them in; he made no secret of his views, no concealment of his religion. He boldly avowed himself an infidel. When Mr. Lincoln was a candidate for our Legislature, he was accused of being an infidel, and of having said that Jesus Christ was an illegitimate child; he never denied his opinions, nor flinched from his religious views; he was a true man, and yet it may be truthfully said that in 1837 his religion was low indeed. In his moments of gloom he would doubt, if he did not sometimes deny, God. He made me once erase the name of God from a speech which I was about to make in 1854, and he did this in the city of Washington to one of his friends. I cannot now name the man nor the place he occupied in Washington; it will be known sometime. I have the evidence and intend to keep it.

Mr. Lincoln ran for Congress against the Rev. Peter Cartwright, in the year 1847 or 1848. In that contest he was accused of being an infidel, if not an atheist; he never denied the charge—would not—“would die first.” In the first place because he knew it could and would be proved on him; and in the second place he was too true to his own convictions, to his own soul, to deny it. From what I know of Mr. Lincoln, and from what I have heard and verily believe, I can say—first, that he did not believe in a special creation, his idea being that all creation was an evolution under law; secondly, he did not believe that the Bible was a special revelation from God, as the Christian world contends; thirdly, he did not believe in miracles, as understood by the Christian world; fourthly, he believed in universal inspiration and miracles under law; fifthly, he did not believe that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God, as the Christian world contends; sixthly, he believed that all things, both matter and mind, were governed by laws, universal, absolute, and eternal. All his speeches and remarks in Washington conclusively prove this. Law was to Lincoln everything—and special interferences, shams and delusions. I know whereof I speak. I used to loan him Theodore Parker’s works; I loaned him Emerson sometimes and other writers, and he would sometimes read and sometimes would not, as I suppose—nay, know.

When Mr. Lincoln left this city for Washington, I know he had undergone no change in his religious opinions or views. He held many of the Christian ideas in abhorrence, and among them there was this one, namely, that God would forgive the sinner for a violation of his laws. Lincoln maintained that God could not forgive; that punishment has to follow the sin; that Christianity was wrong in teaching forgiveness; that it tended to make man sin in the hope that God would excuse, and so forth. Lincoln contended that the minister should teach that God has affixed punishment to sin, and that no repentance could bribe him to remit it. In one sense of the word, Mr. Lincoln was a Universalist, and in another sense he was a Unitarian; but he was a Theist, as we now understand that word; he was so fully, freely, unequivocally, boldly, and openly, when asked for his views. Mr. Lincoln was supposed, by many people in this city, to be an atheist, and some still believe it. I can put that supposition at rest forever. I hold a letter of Mr. Lincoln in my hand, addressed to his step-brother, John D. Johnson, and dated the 12th day of January, 1851. He had heard from Johnson that his father, Thomas Lincoln, was sick, and that no hopes of his recovery were entertained. Mr. Lincoln wrote back to Mr. Johnson these words:—

“I sincerely hope that Father may yet recover his health; but at all events tell him to remember to call upon and confide in One great and good and merciful Maker, who will not turn away from him in any extremity. He notes the fall of a sparrow, and numbers the hairs of our heads; and He will not forget the dying man who puts his trust in Him. Say to him that, if we could meet now, it is doubtful whether it would not be more painful than pleasant; but that if it be his lot to go now, he will soon have a joyous meeting with many loved ones gone before, and where the rest of us, through the help of God, hope ere long to join them.

A. LINCOLN.”

So it seems that Mr. Lincoln believed in God and in immortality, as well as a heaven—a place. He believed in no hell and no punishment in the future world. It has been said to me that Mr. Lincoln wrote the above letter to an old man simply to cheer him up in his last moments; and that the writer did not believe what he said. The question is—was Mr. Lincoln an honest and truthful man? If he was, he wrote that letter honestly, believing it; it has to me the sound, the ring, of an honest utterance. I admit that Mr. Lincoln, in his moments of melancholy and terrible gloom, was living on the border land between theism and atheism,—sometimes quite wholly dwelling in atheism. In his happier moments he would swing back to theism, and dwell lovingly there. It is possible that Mr. Lincoln was not always responsible for what he said or thought, so deep—so intense—so terrible was his melancholy. I send you a lecture of mine which will help you to see what I mean. I maintain that Mr. Lincoln was a deeply religious man at all times and places, in spite of his transient doubts.

Soon after Mr. Lincoln was assassinated, Mr. Holland came into my office, and made some inquiries about him, stating to me his purpose of writing his life. I freely told him what he asked, and much more. He then asked me what I thought about Mr. Lincoln’s religion, meaning his views of Christianity. I replied, “the less said, the better.” Mr. Holland has recorded my expression to him, (see Holland’s Life of Lincoln, page 241). I cannot say what Mr. Holland said to me, as that was private. It appears that he then went and saw Mr. Newton Bateman, Superintendent of Public Instruction in this State. It appears that Mr. Bateman told Mr. Holland many things, if he is correctly represented in Holland's Life of Lincoln (pages 236 to 241 inclusive). I doubt whether Mr. Bateman said in full what is recorded there. I doubt a great deal of it. I know the whole story is untrue—untrue in substance—untrue in fact and spirit. As soon as the Life of Lincoln was out, on reading that part here referred to, I instantly sought Mr. Bateman, and found him in his office. I spoke to him politely and kindly, and he spoke to me in the same manner. I said substantially to him that Mr. Holland, in order to make Mr. Lincoln a technical Christian, made him a hypocrite; and so his Life of Lincoln quite plainly says. I loved Mr. Lincoln, and was mortified, if not angry, to see him made a hypocrite. I cannot now detail what Mr. Bateman said, as it was a private conversation, and I am forbidden to make use of it in public. If some good gentleman can only get the seal of secrecy removed, I can show what was said and done. On my word the world may take it for granted that Holland is wrong, that he does not state Mr. Lincoln's views correctly. Mr. Bateman, if correctly represented in Holland's Life of Lincoln, is the only man, the sole and only man, who dare say that Mr. Lincoln believed in Jesus as the Christ of God, as the Christian world represents. This is not a pleasant situation for Mr. Bateman. I have notes and dates of our conversation, and the world will sometime know who is truthful and who otherwise. I doubt whether Bateman is correctly represented by Holland. My notes bear date Dec. 3, 12, and 28, 1866. Some of our conversations were in the Spring of 1866, and the Fall of 1865.

I do not remember ever seeing the words Jesus or Christ in print, as uttered by Mr. Lincoln. If he has used these words, they can be found. He uses the word God but seldom. I never heard him use the name of Christ or Jesus, but to confute the idea that he was the Christ, the only and truly begotten Son of God, as the Christian world understands it. The idea that Mr. Lincoln carried the New Testament or Bible in his bosom or boots, to draw on his opponent in debate, is ridiculous. If Christianity cannot live without falsehood, the sooner it dies, the better for mankind. Every great man that dies,—infidel, pantheist, theist or atheist,—is instantly dragged into the folds of the church, and transformed through falsehood into the great defender of the faith, unless his opinions are too well known to allow it. Is Christianity in dread or fear? What is the matter with it? Is it sick, and does it dream of its doom? Would that it would shake itself free from its follies, and still live till all mankind outgrow it!

My dear sir, I now have given you my knowledge, speaking from my own remembrance of my own experience, of Mr. Lincoln's religious views. I speak likewise from the evidences, carefully gathered, of his religious opinions. I likewise speak from the ears and mouths of many in this city; and after all careful examination, I declare to your numerous readers that Mr. Lincoln is correctly represented here, so far as I know what truth is, and how it should be investigated.

Yours truly,
W. H. HERNDON.

Miscellaneous.

WOMAN'S WRONGS.

C. S. Middlebrook writes the following to the Winsted (Ct.) Herald. Such cases are doubtless rare. But a single case of such abominable oppression justifies all the appeals ever made in behalf of woman's rights, and convicts "modern civilization" of barbarism.

"Jessup Sherwood, of Fairfield, Conn.—a bankrupt—married a maiden lady of one of the oldest and most respectable families, having a well-stocked farm prized at $10,000. The law made him her trustee, giving him the right to all the proceeds of her estate during his life. All he could make from it he could invest in his own name, he being obliged to give her a reasonable support. He had two daughters by a former marriage that he brought with him, and clothed and educated from her property. Mrs. Sherwood had, by the decease of a brother, some personal property fall to her, consisting of notes and stocks. These her husband demanded. She refused to give them up. He had her brought before the Superior Court, Judge Phelps, then sitting in Bridgeport, and the Judge told her she must hand them over to her husband or go to jail. She told him she would go to jail and rot there, before she would do it, and the law sent her to Bridgeport Jail among common felons, where she remained six months, and her lawyer, I. M. Sturgis, one of the best in the State, could only get her out by applying to the Legislature for a divorce, which he at length obtained; P. T. Barnum, then a member, speaking nobly in her cause. She was set free, and what property remained returned to her, her husband and his two daughters living on her property, in her house, paying from her money counsel to send her to jail and counsel to oppose her release before the Legislature. His two daughters were married from her house, while she lay in jail with common felons, and took such things from her movables as he chose to give them to commence house-keeping with. The law gave her no redress, and the same law is now in force in Connecticut, and the same injustice can be practised by any man contemptible enough to repeat it."

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.

[They would scarcely believe him when he told them that, when in Thurso some time ago, he on one occasion saw six hundred people asleep in church.—Speech of Dr. Guthrie.]

O'er their devoted heads,
While the law thundered,
Snugly and heedlessly
Snored the six hundred.
Great was the preacher's theme;
Screw'd on was all the steam;
Neither with shout nor scream
Could he disturb the dream
Of the six hundred.

Terrors to right of them,
Terrors to left of them,
Terrors in front of them—
Hell itself plundered
Of its most awful things,
Weak-minded preacher-dings
At the dumb-founder'd.
Boldly he spoke and well;
All on deaf ears it fell;
Vain was his loudest yell
Volley'd and thunder'd;
For, caring—the truth to tell—
Neither for heaven nor hell,
Snored the six hundred.

Still, with redoubled zeal,
Still he spoke onward,
And, in a wild appeal,
Striking with hand and heel—
Making the pulpit reel,
Shaken and Sundered—
Called them the Church's foes,
Threatened with endless woes—
Faintly the answer rose
(Proofs of their sweet repose)
From the united nose
Of the six hundred.

L'ENVOY.

Sermons of near an hour
Too much for human power;
Prayers, too, made to match (Extemporaneous batch, Wofully blundered);
With a service of music
Fit to turn every pew sick—
Should it be wondered?
Churches that will not move
Out of the ancient groove
Through which they flounder'd,
If they will lag behind,
Still must expect to find
Hearers of such a kind
As the six hundred.

FOOD FOR REFLECTION.

[From the Vermont Phoenix.]

MR. EDITOR:—I observed in a recent issue of the Phoenix an article in reference to the observance of the Christian Sabbath, in which the writer states that four-fifths of the people of Brattleboro habitually neglect public worship on that day. Assuming that this statement is based upon accurate information—and I dare say no one will question its substantial truth—I was led to follow out the train of reflection thereby suggested, which ran somewhat as follows:—One-fifth of our people attend church. Of these say one-half constitute the "elect," or chosen people of God, according to the popular "plan of salvation." Nine-tenths, then, of our citizens—those whom we meet upon the street, or with whom we mingle in our social and business relations—our brothers, sisters, sons, daughters, friends, neighbors—even the very companions of our hearts, it may be—are doomed to endless destruction! And this in Brattleboro—in moral, virtue-loving, Christian Vermont. How much larger must be the proportion in other parts of our country and of the civilized world, to say nothing of the heathen nations! And this is the state of things nearly two thousand years after the inauguration of the Christian religion. How awful, how disheartening the view we have thus to contemplate! Is it possible that God has left a "screw loose" somewhere in the construction of man's mental or spiritual nature, or must it be that those who insist upon Sunday observances and a belief in certain doctrines as necessary to salvation are laboring under delusion?

NEW APPLICATION OF ELECTRICITY.

[From the London Daily Telegraph.]

Some Parisian electrician has developed a brilliant idea: he electrifies singers just before they "go on," and they electrify the audience. They sing with spirit, energy, fire—all derived from the battery at so much per shock. Thus the work of a manager becomes simple: as he depends for light on the gas company, he will henceforth depend for the life and vigor of his operas on some new electrifying company, contracting to do the work nightly. Vocal genius will be laid down in wires, and turned on or off as required—the charge so much per Grisi-power. If the singers do not sing well, the gallery will know that the manager is stingy or has no funds; or that, through a dispute with the Company, the electric supply is cut off. But if this is true—if brilliant singing can be bought by cash—why not extend the principle? Could not sublime and startling oratory be distributed in "mains" all over the land, with connecting pipes, and of course meters, to every town hall and assembly room? Could not even a hostess secure a certain amount of electricity to enliven a dull dinner party—just as now she secures table ornaments and buys flowers! And, before all and above all, could not the nineteen thousand nine hundred and ninety-five dull pulpits in the land—the total number of pulpits being twenty thousand—be electrified, so that the plague of sleepy sermons might finally be exorcised?

MODERN SKEPTICISM.

[From the Watchman and Reflector.]

The arrangement for a series of free lectures in Boston by first-class minds is a timely one. The old infidelities of the past were met in their day and vanquished. The Christian Church, however, has kept faithfully and vigilantly on guard at the old point of attack, with arms adapted to the old methods of offence. But the spirit of infidelity has not been killed out, any more than the spirit of rebellion is ever killed out by the overthrow of its armies in the field. That spirit will live as long as sin lives, and will organize for aggression again in every period of spiritual declension or general worldliness. It was never more aggressive than at the present day.

The tactics, however, of infidelity are all changed. Its weapons are new weapons. The points of attack are not only different, but more vital. It seeks also to connect itself with the best tendencies of the times, with free thought, with the critical spirit, and especially with science. It assumes to be a part of the progress of the age. Formerly it was vulgar and rash and weak in strategy, and depended for success less on a show of reason, and more on that fully developed depravity of heart and life which wished the Bible false and therefore believed it to be. Now it is scholarly. It is associated with intellectual pride, rather than with carnal lust. It does not set aside Christianity, but gives it a high place among religions of the ages. It professes to explain religion, like every thing else, on natural principles. Science is its stronghold. Nor is this a stronghold to be despised. The progress of science is the proudest fact of the present century. Its triumphs in every direction are marvelous. The spectroscopic, as supplementing the telescope and microscope, is now making discoveries that awe us with their sublimity, as well as startle us with their certainty and clearness. We are beginning, at length, man's predestined high mastership of Nature. But elevation brings peril. We reach high, and then wish to get higher. It was an archangel that aspired to God's throne. So man, realizing through science his earthly sovereignty, would throw off his dependence on the Central Throne. Hence, nearly all the more important attacks on Christianity now come from science. Of course, our old weapons of defence are useless. The foe comes against us with cannon instead of arrows—indeed, with mortars, and monitors, and needle-guns; and we must meet him accordingly. True, Christianity is its own evidence, and vital personal godliness is the best weapon both of defence and offence; and that preacher does the most to stay the progress of infidelity who does the most to extend living, active, intelligent piety around him. Still the ministry need to prepare themselves specially for the conflicts of the present periods. In this they will be but imitating Paul and James and John. The old sermons on Christian evidences will not answer now. Nor is it our great cities alone that are exposed. The middle-men between scientists and the community are at work everywhere, making a speciality of the literary and secular press, and of the lecture system, and even availing themselves of Christian pulpits. They have stolen a march on us. They have secured most important vantage ground. Nothing but persistent and wisely-directed effort by our religious guides can now save from infidelity those who are to lead the thought of the next generation.

We say, then, that the effort being made in Boston is timely. But its chief value will be in inciting to similar efforts elsewhere. Let the pulpit everywhere, after fully mastering the arguments of modern skepticism, prepare itself to meet them, sometimes in set sermons and oftener by single home strokes, as occasion may present. Let special lectures be arranged in every community by a union of the churches for the purpose, or, where it is practicable, by the young men's Christian associations. We know of no way in which the latter could render more appropriate or more effective services.

ANECDOTE OF SYDNEY SMITH.—It was at this same dinner (at the Foundling Hospital) that the great wit met with a retort that he was never tired of referring to afterward. He had been conversing, in the half-bantering manner in which he was inimitable, with his vis-à-vis at the table, a Swiss gentleman of education connected with his country's embassy at the Court of St. James, upon the relative merits of Swiss and English soldiers, and urged the superiority of the latter, inasmuch as they fought for honor, while the Swiss fought for money.

"The fact is," answered the Swiss gentleman, "we each of us fight for what each most wants."—Lippincott's Magazine for March, 1869.

In a certain church a question was to be taken. Having no boxes the minister's hat was borrowed. It was passed all around the church, and report says nothing was put in. As the hat was returned to the pulpit the minister looked into it, and, seeing it empty, said:—"Well, brethren, I am very much obliged to you for returning my hat."

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Anne Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

VOICES FROM THE PEOPLE.

We are very grateful for the response which has been made to the circular issued by the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association last autumn, and which was reprinted in the second number of THE INDEX. The result is that our list of members is much larger than it has been in any previous year, that we have received many encouraging letters from various portions of the country, and that nearly enough money has been sent to our Treasury to cover the expenses of the Association for the year. Our friends must not stop, however, because the year is nearly at an end. We want more members; we need still further contributions. Our Treasurer informs us that he does not yet see his way entirely clear for squaring up accounts in his annual report. Let us hear, therefore, still further from our friends, wherever they are and whoever they are. Every dollar—the annual fee for membership—helps. Most of our donations have been in small amounts. We do not object to that, provided we have enough of them. Our constituency is not very much among the rich, but among those who either with their brains or their hands are laboring for their daily bread. So much the more hopeful is our cause. We have, indeed, a few friends who are rich in this world's goods, and to whose large generosity we are greatly indebted. But our contributions come mainly in single dollars, with a sprinkling of twos and fives. In one respect, however, in the present position of our cause especially, the single dollars are worth more to us than the donation of a millionaire, though it should more than double their aggregate sum. For every dollar represents some interested mind and heart. We should be vastly richer with one hundred dollars in our Treasury from one hundred different persons than if we had five hundred dollars all from one man. For it is not the dollars only that we count, but the personal interest and earnestness behind them. We like to hear the ring of the friendly voices that come with the contributions. We detect in them the harmony of a common thought and purpose. They confirm our conviction that the Free Religious Association is representative of a grand, far-reaching movement in behalf of religious freedom and human brotherhood. And we cannot do better than bring together in the space here allotted us some of these voices. The following are a portion of the letters we have received since the issue of our circular last November. We would gladly give the names of the writers, but do not feel that we have in every case the right to do so:—

PINE PLAINS, N. Y., Nov. 18, 1869.

"Enclosed you will find $1.10,—my yearly contribution to your Association, and ten cents for your discourse on 'Reason and Revelation.' . . . I can but regret that the writings of Theodore Parker should have gone out of print. The impressions that I received from reading his works three winters since, then twenty years of age, will continue through life. I have since endeavored to procure them, but have failed. If they could affect the world as they did me, their mission would be a glorious one. I rejoice that I have been thus fortified against superstition so early in life; and I now take pleasure in aiding, in an humble way, these associations for enlightenment."

JANESVILLE, WIS., Nov. 5, 1869.

"The great West is in a transition state. I should like to give all my remaining energies to the Liberal Faith. But dependent upon my own efforts, with no society to back me, it is but little that I can do. Still I rejoice in that little, and shall never fail to do it. Devoted to the world's advance, I remain, Yours for work."

JACKSONVILLE, ILL., Dec. 24, 1869.

"I understand that the spirit and aim of our society [a local religious organization] are substantially the same as those of the Free Religious Association. We are proposing to distribute gratuitously printed discourses setting forth our principles. . . . We have not, however, any means at present with which we may make purchases, and are consequently under the necessity of selecting the best that may be had gratuitously. If the Free Religious Association had discourses printed for circulation in the cheapest possible form, I should hope to procure them. I am thus frank in stating our wants, not for the sake of begging, but thinking that where there is a want it ought to be expressed, and this may lead to future supply. Hoping that circumstances may lead to a future acquaintance, and that the F. R. A. association may long live to advocate the principles of religious liberty, I am," &c.

BOSTON, Nov. 18, 1869.

"Enclosed please find Five Dollars, which I wish were Five Hundred, as my subscription to the Free Religious Association, with the request that my name be added to the list of members."

LA FAYETTE, N. J., Jan. 15, 1870.

"In response to the circular of the American Free Religious Association, published in the second number of THE INDEX, I herewith send you two dollars as my first contribution to the funds of the Association. You will please send me a few copies of your publications for distribution in this locality, and accept my thanks for the work which you and your co-laborers have so nobly begun."

MARIETTA, O., Jan. 15, 1870.

"Believing in religious culture as the most powerful means for perfecting human nature, and believing also that such culture should be as untrammelled as scientific modes of investigation, as earnest reasoning on other subjects, I enclose one dollar with my name, for membership in the Free Religious Association."

FORT SCOTT, Kansas, Jan. 24, 1870.

"Your circular dated Nov. 1, '69, has been duly and cheerfully received. I like it very much. Have been noticing the workings of your Association for the last year, and had been contemplating a correspondence with some of its officers, but knew not where to address any of them. We have a similar organization here, which has been in operation since last April. Ours does not bear the same name, but I see that the objects and aims are identical. We have struggled for our existence, but 'still live.' Our organization is called the 'Fort Scott Institute.' Our representative papers are The Radical (magazine) and THE INDEX. Some of us are readers of the Investigator (Boston), which I think a good paper. I enclose $2,—one for membership and one for your Report and Essays. Would be glad to hear from you, and to receive any documents you may have for distribution."

So. WOLFBO'RO', N. H., Jan. 18, 1870.

"Desiring to become a member of the Free Religious Association, I herewith enclose $1 and my best wishes for the continuance of the Association."

TOWANDA, Pa., Jan. 28, 1870.

"I send $1 for which please send me Reports of the Free Religious Association for 1865 and 1869. I have that of 1867, and consider them invaluable."

LAWRENCE, Kansas, Feb. 13, 1870.

"Please find enclosed 60 cents for one copy of Samuel Johnson's Essay on the 'Worship of Jesus,' and one copy of your own essay on 'Reason and Revelation.' A few of us in this city are going to commence a series of meetings next Sunday, preparatory to organizing a Free Religious Association, upon the plan of the one in Boston."

GROTON, N. Y., Feb. 23, 1870.

"Enclosed find $1.50, for which please forward to my address the following reports: . . . I hope soon to be able to send you the names of several friends of your noble Association for membership."

DAYTON, O., Dec. 15, 1869.

"Your circular came duly to hand. Please find enclosed one dollar for membership, with my sincere wishes for the speedy success of the Free Religious Association."

CUMMINSVILLE, O., March 10, 1870.

"The undersigned claims to be a member of your noble Association, and desires to be enrolled on your list. I am an old man, and never could see any other religion; and for the want of better instruction I have been a reader of the Boston Investigator since the days of Abner Kneeland. Enclosed find Post-office order for $5, as annual subscription for five years in advance, and oblige."

COURTLAND, N. Y., March 15, 1870.

"Please send me your Essay, 'Reason and Revelation' which I see advertised in THE INDEX,—that glorious little sheet which dares to be free and braves so much. We have here a choice little band of true men, who are trying to grow into God's blessed universal freedom. Recently we decided to concentrate and organize our material, and we are surprised at our own strength, numerically. The Evangelicals hold the sway, however, and turn the social, the financial, and every other possible screw upon us, with no less vigor than strategy. But we are here to grow every way, except narrow and bigoted. My excuse for saying this to you is that we want a live, able man, a young, growing man here, to direct us. . . . Now, my dear sir, can you put us in the way of procuring such a man as we need—a free religionist? We could soon sustain the right man well."

This must suffice for extracts this week. We will simply add that sales of our publications, according to the appended standing "Notice," help the Association financially as well as spread information with regard to it and its principles. Let us join hands and keep the ball moving and growing.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

MAGNETIC TRAVELLING STONES.—They have walking stones in Australia, and, as we are informed, they have travelling stones in Nevada. Here is a description:—They were almost perfectly round, the majority of them as large as a walnut, and of an iron nature. When distributed about upon the floor, table or any other level surface, within two or three feet of each other, they immediately begin travelling toward a common centre, and there huddle up in a bunch, like a lot of eggs in a nest. A single stone removed to a distance of three and a half feet, upon being released, at once started off with wonderful and somewhat comical celerity to join its fellows; taken away four or five feet, it remained motionless. They are found in a region that, although comparatively level, is nothing but barren rock. Scattered over this barren region are little basins, from a few feet to a rod in diameter, and it is in the bottom of these that the rolling stones are found. They are from the size of a pea to five or six inches in diameter. The cause of these stones rolling together is doubtless to be found in the material of which they are composed, which appears to be loadstone or magnetic iron ore.—Seaside Oracle.

CORNELIUS O'DOWD says, in Blackwood, that in England he meets a marvellous energy and "go" that he finds nowhere else. "I, of course, except America," he adds, "for with us we work life at high boiler pressure, but the Yankees do more—they sit on the valves."

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

FREE RELIGION!

Published by the Index Association, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

THE INDEX will be sent for three months to new subscribers on trial for Sixty Cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of Five Cents.

All subscriptions and communications to be addressed to FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Lock Box 19, Toledo, O.

✂ Publishers who insert the above Prospectus three times in their respective papers and call attention to it editorially, shall be entitled to a copy of THE INDEX for one year. It will be forwarded to their address on receipt of the paper with the advertisement.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"It is a handsome quarto sheet, well filled with the leading ideas, as enunciated in Horticultural Hall and elsewhere, of those who gave religion pre-eminence to Christianity."—Boston Commonwealth.

"It bears the marks of vigorous and careful editing."—Christian Register, Boston.

"The editor, Mr. F. E. Abbot, promises in addition 'short and snappy' articles by able co-operators of his—Mr. O. B. Frothingham for one, and Mr. W. J. Potter for another, who both will fill regularly a certain space. . . . We do not know where the friends of what we may call religious rationalism would be likely to find an editor better able to express their views and opinions."—New York Nation.

"That he is one of the most original and independent thinkers of our country cannot be denied. We see no reason to doubt that in his present position he is thoroughly honest, and thinks himself a champion of the truth. We believe there is no stain upon his character, and that he sincerely desires to benefit his fellow men. It is difficult, we know, for many who have been trained in the Orthodox fold, and never had a doubt of the doctrines taught them in childhood, to understand how a man can be honest and at the same time believe there is something higher and better than Christianity. Nevertheless, we believe such error to be perfectly compatible with the purest motives and the highest moral aims."—New York Independent.

"Though disclaiming, as we think unnecessarily, the name Christian, Mr. Abbot is conscientious in his convictions and earnest in action beyond the average of men. He is a young man of decided intellectual ability, and will no doubt render the journal over which he is to preside attractive, especially to free and independent thinkers. It will quite certainly be sufficiently fearless and outspoken in all matters pertaining to religion to interest the extreme religious radicals. We understand that among Mr. Abbot's supporters in this journalistic enterprise is the distinguished Rev. Petroleum V. Nasby."—Anti-Slavery Standard, New York.

"Mr. Abbot's fifty affirmative propositions, published in THE INDEX, are not surpassed, either in boldness or in truth, by the famous theses of Luther."—Col. T. W. Higginson at the Boston Radical Club, reported in Anti-Slavery Standard.

"The name of the editor, to all who know him, will be assurance sufficient that it will lack nothing in ability nor in fearlessness to espouse and champion all new and progressive ideas, especially in the cause of a free, pure and practical religion."—New York Revolution.

"It will be able, beyond question, and bold to the extremest utterance."—Warrington, in Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

"It is only just to say that THE INDEX promises to be fair, thoughtful, and able. It is impossible not to respect a frank and intense moral earnestness; and a Christian should be the last to complain of thorough fidelity to conviction, wherever that is found."—Morning Star, Dover, N. H. (Free-will Baptist.)

"Mr. Abbot is a clear and forcible writer, and an independent and fearless thinker. Those who agree with his views of religion and morals will recognize in him an able defender."—Toledo Blade.

"THE INDEX is the freest and most radical religious paper in America. Those who sympathize with the free religious movement now sweeping over this country, will find THE INDEX a most interesting paper."—Northwestern Farmer, Indianapolis, Ind.

"When we state that its editor is Francis E. Abbot, persons familiar with current American literature will understand that it is conducted with ability, scholarship, the most admirable courtesy, and the widest catholicity of spirit. We give orthodox fair warning that it must prepare to make a brave and vigorous warfare against the new enemy, and to send him in utter rout and discomfiture from the field."—Evening Post, Chicago, Ill.

"A new and beautiful journal published at Toledo, Ohio—THE INDEX is the advocate of Free Religion, it is most ably edited, and we should like to see it in every family in the land. Success to THE INDEX."—La Fourche (La) Republican.

THE ESSENCE OF RELIGION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, March 27, 1869.]

"When we say that M. Comte has erected his philosophy into a religion, the word religion must not be understood in its ordinary sense. He made no change in the purely negative attitude which he maintained towards theology; his religion is without a God. In saying this, we have done enough to induce nine-tenths of all readers, at least in our own country, to avert their faces and close their ears. To have no religion, though scandalous, is an idea they are partly used to; but to have no God, and to talk of religion, is to their feelings at once an absurdity and an impiety. Of the remaining tenth, a great proportion, perhaps, will turn away from anything which calls itself by the name of religion at all. Between the two, it is difficult to find an audience who can be induced to listen to M. Comte without an insurmountable prejudice. But, to be just to any opinion, it ought to be considered, not exclusively from an opponent's point of view, but from that of the mind which propounds it. Though conscious of being in an extremely small minority, we venture to think that a religion may exist without belief in a God, and that a religion without a God may be, even to Christians, an instructive and profitable object of contemplation."

JOHN STUART MILL, The Positive Philosophy of Auguste Comte, p. 120.

"We should find that the purest truth lies hidden in even the most despised religions of the world."

MAX MUELLER, in a recent lecture on "The Science of Religion," quoted by M. D. Conway in the RADICAL.

In the "Fifty Affirmations," published in the first seven numbers of THE INDEX, I gave the following short and simple definition of religion:—

"RELIGION IS THE EFFORT OF MAN TO PERFECT HIMSELF."

This definition has been criticised by many of my friends as vague and inadequate; and I propose this morning to consider two of the most important objections thus made. [They will be found among the "Communications" printed in the present number of THE INDEX]. If the question were merely one of verbal definition,—one turning merely on the right use of words,—I should not deem it of sufficient importance to call your attention to it at this time; but the fact is, that the question what is religion? is one of the most vital issues of the nineteenth century. The Catholic Church will tell you that religion is Romish Christianity; and each branch of the Protestant Church will tell you that it is its own peculiar form of Christianity. Many persons, on the other hand, will tell you that religion is in all its forms superstition. The old Roman poet Lucretius, in his great poem on the Epicurean philosophy entitled "De Rerum Natura," after referring to the sacrifice of the maiden Iphianassa or Iphigeneia on the altar of Hecate at Aulis, exclaims—"To such crimes has Religion had power to instigate mankind!" [I, 101]; and he declares it his great ambition "to free the mind from the hard knots of religious beliefs" [artis religionum nodis: I, 933; IV, 7]. So likewise Frances Wright, in her brave and earnest little volume entitled "A Few Days in Athens," makes her hero, Epicurus, declare to the assembly of his hearers,—"I have found the first link in the chain of evil; I have found it in all countries, among all tribes and tongues and nations; I have found it, fellow-men, I have found it in—RELIGION!" [p. 199]. This conception of religion is by no means a rare one to-day; and thousands of noble minds are asking themselves in great seriousness whether there is anything at all in it of permanent value to mankind, or whether it is not destined to perish ultimately from the earth. The question I propose, therefore, is not one of mere words, but rather of ideas and facts; it concerns the highest welfare of our race. To find the right definition of religion is really to attain a true comprehension of it; and until we do attain a true comprehension of it, we cannot cast its horoscope.

Now I hold it to be a truth which no person at all acquainted with the great tendencies of the times will gainsay, that the day of dogmatism is rapidly passing by. It is going,—and it will go to stay. The future will tolerate no doctrine which has no better foundation than the simple—"I say so"—of some great man. Every truth must rest on its own basis in facts; and mankind will both claim and exercise the right to test these facts for themselves. If religion, consequently, is to endure, it must prove itself capable of existing without dogmas,—without any tenets beyond the universal jurisdiction of reason. The thoughts of men are changing; ideas and institutions which cannot survive change are in imminent peril; the mists are melting away before the rising sun of knowledge, and nothing will abide but the solid truth. I am convinced that, if there is any one dogma which is essential to the existence of religion,—any affirmation which cannot be submitted to the test of reason without destroying or imperilling its continuance among men,—then there is no certainty whatever that religion will not become as obsolete as witchcraft. In order to be permanent, it must be based on realities as stable as humanity itself,—on something which will survive all possible changes in human thought or social institutions. With these convictions, I have for years been seeking for that universal element in religion which, being part of human nature itself, is independent of all historical mutations,—which cannot be shaken by any conceivable enlargement of knowledge or any possible revolution in society. In other words, I have been studying to discover that eternal fact in the constitution of Man which has been the real root of religion as a universal historical phenomenon,—that indestructible impulse or tendency of humanity which must underlie and logically antedate all the religions of the world. If no such universal and indestructible element exists, then all the world's religions may be merely ephemeral creatures of circumstance,—born of nothing permanent and fated soon to die. If otherwise, then every advance of civilization will only bring about the purification and development of religion into higher and higher forms.

Perceiving, therefore, that all dogmas are mere expressions of thought, and that thought is forever changing, I came to the conclusion that no dogma can be a permanent part of religion, assuming that religion itself is permanent. Perceiving, also, that the race is perpetually striving to better itself in some way or other, and that this endeavor, in proportion to its earnestness and comprehensiveness, assumes more and more distinctly the form of religion, I concluded that the struggle for general improvement in outward condition and inward character was the fact I sought. Here, then, in the natural and universal effort of humanity to reach a higher state of development, now feeble and scarcely conscious, now powerful and conscious to a high degree, I thought I discovered the essence of all living religion; and although fully aware that this idea of it would cover human development in all directions, political, social, and industrial, as well as moral, and that I must therefore greatly expand the commonly received notion of religion, I became convinced that the truest and profoundest definition I could give of it was the effort of Man to perfect himself. If a man has a low and mean idea of himself, he will limit his effort to the perfection of his surroundings or outward condition; if he has a higher idea, he will seek to include the perfection of his intellectual and æsthetic character; if he has the highest idea possible, he will seek to include, as first and most important, the perfection of his moral and spiritual being. But, in the large sense I have indicated, every man is religious in proportion as he seeks the development of his own humanity; and the man is most truly so, who seeks to develop himself most earnestly in the best directions. If I am correct, then religion must include what is commonly called civilization, and not vice versa. All effort for development is essentially religious; that is religious in the highest degree which aims most directly and energetically at the highest and completest development.

With these ideas, I see a way open for the reconciliation of religion with common life, otherwise impossible; and I also see that the Christian Church, which has created and maintained the feud between the two, must be disintegrated by this higher conception of them. Catholicism is right,—to distinguish Christianity from religion is to doom it. Religion must be secularized,—that is, de-christianized,—but only to become more powerful and real; common life must be made religious,—but only to become more simple, earnest, high-toned, and happy. The "World" will absorb the "Church," but will retain all its good, rejecting all its evil. This is what I meant by my definition of religion as the effort of man to perfect himself.

Now the objections to which I have referred are these:—

1. That religion is not always an effort of man to perfect himself, since it has often been a mere effort to escape some disaster threatened by higher powers,—by the gods or God; that the whole system of sacrifices, including the vicarious sacrifice of Christ taught by the Church, has been simply a device to avert the Divine displeasure; and that perfection of character, when aimed at at all, has always been a secondary matter.

2. That, defined as I have defined it, the word religion does not even suggest a belief in God or the gods; and thus the most important element of religion is left wholly out of sight.

I propose to consider first the second of these two objections,—namely, the omission of all reference to God in the definition under discussion.

Those of you who have attended the meetings of our Radical Club, will remember that the same objection was expressed there some months ago. The derivation of the word religion was alluded to, as coming from the Latin verb religare, which signifies to bind together or to bind fast, and as thus referring to the obligations or duties which bind man to God. This derivation, it was urged, proved that the word religion contains a manifest implication of God's existence, which, therefore, should not be left out in the definition. Now the truth is that the etymology of the word is obscure, and not agreed upon by scholars. Servius, Lactantius, Augustine, and others, give the derivation just mentioned; but Cicero, an authority surely entitled to weight in a question of this sort, derives the word from relegere, in the sense of going through or over again,—that is, in the sense of carefully and conscientiously reviewing one's thought [De Nat. Deor., II, 28, 72]. Prof. Andrews, in his lexicon, inclines to this latter etymology; and Dr. Ramshorn [Dict. of Lat. Synon., § 876] gives, as the definition of religio,—"properly the scruple of conscience; the awe and fear of that which is sacred, holy; religion, externally as well as internally." The word was undoubtedly associated in the mind of every Roman with the worship of the gods; but its primary reference was to the conscience or natural sentiment of duty, and only by association to worship of the gods. While I lay no stress at all on the simple etymology of the word, it is at least some confirmation of my use of it, that conscientiousness seems to have been its root-meaning.

Remembering, however, how words drift away from their earlier meanings, and taking a larger view of the matter, I would point out, as a fact, that it is not true that the word religion, even in its popular application, always implies belief in God or in gods.

The most striking illustration of this fact is Buddhism, which is more than 2000 years old, and includes among its adherents about 455,000,000 of human beings. There is no question that Buddhism is a religion, in the popular sense of that word; yet it is a mooted point whether Buddhists do, or do not, believe in any God,—whether they do, or do not, even believe in immortality. The best authorities seem to establish the latter alternative as the true one. "Belief in a supreme God, the Creator and Ruler of the universe," says Prof. Wilson, "is unquestionably a modern graft upon the unqualified atheism of Sakya-muni; it is still of very limited recognition." "Buddhism has no God," says M. Saint-Hilaire. "Buddha himself," says M. Burnouf, "though perhaps not a nihilist, was certainly an atheist." So also Wuttke, Schmidt, Tennent, Hardy, Schott, Gutzlaff. "Buddha," says Max Mueller, "denies the existence not only of a Creator, but of any Absolute Being. . . . How a religion which taught the annihilation of all existence, of all thought, of all individuality and all personality, as the highest object of all endeavors, could have laid hold of the minds of millions of human beings, and how at the same time, by enforcing the duties of morality, justice, kindness and self-sacrifice, it could have exercised a decided beneficial influence, not only on the natives of India, but on the lowest barbarians of Central Asia, is a riddle which no one has been able to solve." To one who conceives a belief in God to be the deepest and most essential element of religion, the riddle may well be insoluble; but the conception I have formed of its true essence,—that is, the struggle after improvement,—is compatible with any belief or disbelief concerning God. Given the ideal conception of a higher state of human development, whether enlightened or not,—I believe that a motive of sufficient power is at hand to account for any amount of practical effort to realize it. Every man wants to better himself; and he will certainly struggle to attain what he really (not professedly) believes to be a betterment. If he thinks wealth to be his betterment, he will work for it; if pleasure, he will work for that; if self-sacrificing virtue, he will work for that also. Some ideal he must have faith in; but the important point to notice is, that the religious impulse to work upwards to some ideal or other, exists in every soul, and is quite compatible with the most diverse conceptions of it. The highest benefit you can confer on any man is to purify and exalt his ideal. That Buddhism, destitute as it apparently is of all belief in God, should yet exhibit a moral code which Mueller declares to be "one of the most perfect which the world has ever known," and which makes Laboulaye exclaim—"It is difficult to comprehend how men not assisted by revelation could have soared so high and approached so near the truth,"—that it should actually inspire men with the spirit of universal charity, kindness, pity, equality, and toleration,—that it should work out a great social reform in the direction of liberty, purity, and brotherly love,—that it should inflame the souls of numerous missionaries, like Hiouen-tsang, to go forth preaching the new gospel with all the fervor, perseverance and utter unselfishness of a Judson or a Scudder,—that atheistic Buddhism, I say, should yet prove itself a practical religion by doing the work of religion, may well astonish the world, and compel others, as it has compelled me, to form a new notion of what religion in its essence is. Even the narrow and bigoted Archdeacon Hardwick cannot withhold a tribute of wondering admiration from this strange religion:—"But while we charge the creed of Gautama," he says, "with atheism and nihilism, we must acknowledge that it rose in one respect superior to all other heathen systems,—in the loftier tone of its morality. It was a practical, not a speculative, philosophy, concerning itself not with God and the invisible, but with the charities and duties of the present life." His unjust and cavilling accusation that the "Buddhist's love is little more than animal sympathy," and that the "Buddhist's principle of action is devoid of moral motive," cannot weaken the force of his previous admission. The one was honest testimony,—the other is captious detraction.

Nor is Buddhism the only system to which the name of religion is popularly applied, yet concerning which we find the same dispute, whether it is, or is not, atheistic. Prof. Neumann declares that "the words, God, soul, spirit, in the sense of something independent of matter and freely governing it, are utterly unknown to the Chinese language." Many Chinese scholars repeat the statement made by the Jesuit Longobardi two hundred years ago, that, at least in theory, the followers of the Chinese State-religion are "atheists to a man." It is a striking characteristic of the writings of Confucius that they barely allude, in the very vaguest way, to God. He condemned the study of theology as fruitless, and dissuaded his followers from speculation on the subject. "He who offends against Heaven," he says, "has no one to whom he can pray." When one of his disciples, Tsze-Kung, said to him,—"If you, master, do not speak, what shall we, your disciples, have to record?"—Confucius replied,—"Does Heaven speak? The four seasons pursue their course, and all things are being continually produced; but does Heaven say anything?"

I might refer to the "religion of humanity,"—which the great French apostle of Positivism proclaimed, and which has in Europe, and in New York city itself, I believe, little bands of devoted adherents,—as another instance of a religion which has no God; but I have said enough to substantiate my statement that, even considered historically, it is perfectly correct to use the word religion as not necessarily implying belief in God. The lesson I would draw from these examples, of course, is not that I regard the idea of God as superfluous or untrue; far from it. But I cite them to show that an intellectual belief in God is not essential to the fact of religion, which is compatible even with absolute disbelief in him. That which gives religion its real power must be something deeper than any intellectual belief whatsoever,—must be rooted so profoundly in the human heart that it can exist, and thrive, and mould the character into high virtue, even if this belief be absent altogether. If this be the case,—and I think that observation, no less than historical study, proves it to be so,—then the fact that my definition does not refer to God is no objection to its essential accuracy. It is plain that religion itself, even in the popular use of the word, is consistent both with belief and with disbelief in God; and we must consequently look deeper than belief altogether, in order to discover the true source of its power. The strong, secret, purifying impulse to seek ideal excellence is, in my own thought, the natural revelation of God within the soul; but the fact is one thing, and my intellectual theory of it is quite another. It is the fact, not the theory,—the fact which I see to co-exist with theories infinitely different from mine,—which I regard as the true essence of religion; and that is why I forbear to express in my definition an idea which would make it inapplicable to Buddhism, Confucianism, and Positivism.

To recur now to the first objection brought, I think a closer analysis of the lower and more degraded forms of religion will show,—what I am satisfied is incontrovertible with regard to the higher forms of it,—that even the gross imaginations of the gods cherished by savage and barbarian tribes are really conceptions of a greatness which they conceive to be superior to their own,—which, therefore, stand to them in the relation of moral ideals. Their gods are, in fact, simply these ideals made objective. True, their gods may be our devils; but I doubt if any savage, however imbruted, ever worships what he himself conceives to be his own inferior. If he worships a stone or a crocodile, it is because he fancies that a great invisible power, superior to himself, inhabits it. Worship is always, I believe, an expression of aspiration, however rude, untutored, or even perverted. Aspiration always ennobles. It is a struggle, at least in sentiment, to reach the higher,—a struggle which, even if not seconded by subsequent endeavor, does something to invigorate the love of what we believe to be noble. The poet Lowell has beautifully expressed this idea:—

"The thing we long for, that we are
For one transcendent moment,
Before the present, poor and bare,
Can make its sneering comment.

Ah, let us hope that to our praise
Good God not only reckons
The moments when we tread his ways,
But when the spirit beckons,—
That some slight good is also wrought
Beyond self-satisfaction,
When we are simply good in thought,
Howe'er we fail in action."

Does not the effort of man to perfect himself really include all that constitutes religion, as distinguished from theology? What we shall believe about God and immortality, must be settled for all independent persons by scientific and philosophical thinking. The intellect must solve all intellectual problems. No begging of the question will answer here. But the effort to reach the perfection of our being, to discharge the duties and to fulfil the destiny marked out for us by our nature itself, is that which distinguishes the good man from the bad. It implies three things,—

1. An ideal conception of the perfect, more or less enlightened.
2. An aspiration or longing to realize this ideal,—a love of it.
3. A determination and actual endeavor to realize it.

Now here we have thought, feeling, and will,—the activity of the whole soul,—directed towards the higher development of its being; or, at least, towards what it regards as such, and what consequently must stand to it as such at any given time. Men never aspire downwards. They may act downwards, they may think and feel downwards; but it is always under protest, even if it be an angry protest. This downward tendency and effort is irreligion, the only irreligion that I would we might all shun as moral disease and death. Upwards or downwards,—these are metaphors, I know; but do they not express the only two kinds of living,—religious and irreligious? The one is in the direction of improvement; it is progress. The other is in the direction of debasement; it is retrogression. Even in the grossest forms of religion, a sympathetic eye will discern a blind struggle to realize a good, however mistakenly conceived; and it is this effort to reach the better and the higher which invigorates the soul, and tends to develop its nobler character. For instance, the system of sacrifices was not created by fear alone; it was associated in the mind of the ancients with that conscientiousness, that sense of duty to the gods, which we have seen to be the true root-meaning of the word religion; and if any ethical principle is sound, it is the principle that what we sincerely believe to be our duty, is a duty to us at the time. If we are mistaken in our conceptions of duty, we need intellectual enlightenment; but the willingness and the resolve to do right is the essence of all human goodness, the pith of all true religion. I think it will be found that, in all religions, this sentiment of duty has been at the bottom of rites the most absurd and practices the most abhorrent to the modern conscience. It is in this conviction, at least, that I find reason for believing religion in all its forms, so far as real and sincere, to be a struggle upwards into larger light and higher culture and better life. This aspiration and struggle are, as I believe, prompted in every human soul by the great, beneficent, and universal Power that we ignorantly call God; but whatever we call it, or whatever we think about it, I find this struggle to reach a higher development to be the one healthful element common to all the religions with which I am at all acquainted,—the only element which is common to them all. Hence I can give no better description of the fundamental verity at the bottom of all the world's conflicting faiths, than that it is the universal effort of man to perfect his own being, though manifested in many ways; and I find no little satisfaction in the thought that whoever thus strives to realize his own ideal, is in truth, whether he knows it or not, struggling upward towards the life and peace of Infinite Being.

Until this yearning to attain some greater good than we have, and to be something better than we are, shall be eradicated from the human heart, so long will religion, if I have rightly conceived it, endure. Time will but brighten and beautify its ideal of perfection, as knowledge and wisdom increase. Free from dogma, it is, as it were, the nisus formativus of humanity,—the impulse, unconscious in the brute, increasingly conscious in man, to realize the true idea of the species, and thus work out the ends of the Eternal Thought. Anticipating all the objections thus far brought against such a conception of religion, and many other objections besides, I have come at last, after patient reflection, to the conclusion that in no other sense can religion be in truth undogmatic,—that in no other sense, therefore, can it perpetuate itself in history. True, the whole tenor of my thought and the whole experience of my life have strengthened my own faith in God; but my faith has reasons to render, and does not fear to review them. I do not hold his existence as a dogma; I reverence reason too highly to dispute its judicial function, and listen with absolute confidence to its decisions. But flaming like a sun in the firmament, and flooding all my being with light, is this amazing vision of perfect excellence. To drink in its rays and appropriate them to the growth of the soul,—that is my religion, beyond all reach of argument or doubt. The ideal is a FACT. Prove what it may, it cannot be disproved. Ever above us, it commands in its own right; and religion is obedience to it.

"Sweeter than any sung,
My songs that found no tongue;
Nobler than any fact,
My wish that failed of act.

A dream of man and woman,
Diviner, but still human,
Solving the riddle old,
Shaping the Age of Gold."

A CHRISTIAN FRAME OF MIND.

[From the London Fun.]

There was once a Colonial Bishop, whose See was on the Coast of Africa.

He was an energetic Bishop who labored nobly, according to his views, and no man gainsaid him.

In his immediate neighborhood resided a barbarous tribe—the Tribe of the Canoodle-Dummers. You have heard of them.

They were idolaters.

They were a simple race, with a primitive religion. They were a mild and peaceable people, and lived in perfect harmony with one another.

The Bishop said (and very properly), "I will convert these poor benighted heathens."

He entered among them, and they received him hospitably. He is indebted to them for teaching him the flavor of ape, which, to this day, is always served in various forms at the Episcopal banquets. There are few pleasanter dishes than ape stewed with oysters and port wine. But, on the other hand, he found them but little prepared to listen to the beauties of the religion he was about to unfold to them.

He began by entering into conversation with their Chum, or High Priest.

The Bishop learned from the Chum, or High Priest, the heads of the Canoodle-Dummer's faith.

He found that at sunrise they were summoned to prayer by the beating of a tom-tom, or the blowing of a horn.

"It does not matter which," said the Chum.

"How is this?" said the Bishop. "It does not matter which?"

"It does not in the least matter whether it is a tom-tom or a horn?" said the Chum. "Why should it?"

"Oh," said the Bishop, "this is a terrible state of things." And he thought to himself,—"It is useless just at present to endeavor to inculcate the beauties of Christianity among this ignorant and unsophisticated people. In their present state of mind they will not appreciate what I have to tell them. I will begin by endeavoring to instil a healthier moral tone, so they will the more readily apprehend the doctrine that I shall then lay before them."

With the permission of their chief, he summoned the tribe. They came like lambs.

"Oh, Canoodle-Dummers," said he, "I am pained to find that you are indifferent as to whether a tom-tom or a horn is used to summon you to your devotions."

"We are quite indifferent," said they, with one voice, "so that we are summoned."

"But," said the Bishop, "Observe, if a horn is right, a tom-tom must be wrong. So, likewise, if a tom-tom is right, a horn is out of the question."

"But, why?" said the Canoodle-Dummers.

"Why?" echoed the Bishop indignantly, "Why, of course!"

"I see," said each Canoodle-Dummer, thoughtfully. And the members of the tribe looked askance at each other, and each edged away from his neighbor.

And the next day the tribe was divided into two mighty religious factions, those who stood up for the horn, and those who stood up for the tom-tom.

The Chum, or High Priest, endeavored, but in vain, to reconcile them. "Why," said the Chum, "should you quarrel on such a point? You are all good men. You are all amiable, sufficiently virtuous, tolerably sober, charitable, and generally well conducted. You agree on all the vital points of your religion. Why divide on matters of unimportant detail?"

"Why, indeed?" said the tribe. And the two factions embraced.

"Stop!" said the Bishop, "I am pained beyond measure to see this. What are the ingredients of a plum-pudding to the shape of the mould in which it is boiled?"

"Nothing at all," said the tribe. And they were again, and finally, divided.

The Bishop persevered.

He addressed the Horn party, and said, "I notice with pain that some of your horns are long, and some are short. This should not be."

"Which is right?" said the Horn party.

"I am not of your religion," said the Bishop, "so I cannot undertake to offer an opinion. But one thing is certain,—if one is right, the other is wrong."

So the Horn party was divided into two sects—the Long Horns and the Short Horns. And the Long Horns hated the Short Horns even more than the Horn party hated the Tom-tom party. And the Short Horns returned the compliment.

The Bishop then addressed the Tom-tom party, and said, "I am grieved to see that some of your tom-toms are long and narrow, while others are short and stout. If it is right that a tom-tom should be long and narrow, it is a sin to use those that are of diametrically opposite form."

And the Tom-tom party were accordingly divided into two sects, the Long and Narrow Tom-tom, and the Short and Stout Tom-tom.

And the feud that existed between the Horn party and the Tom-tom party, was as nothing compared to that which raged between the Long and Narrow Tom-tom party and the Short and Stout Tom-tom party.

The Bishop still persevered.

He pointed out to the Long Horn party that some of the Long Horns were sharp, and some were flat.

So the Long Horn party were subdivided, and became the Sharp Long Horns and the Flat Long Horns. He pointed out to the Short Horn party that some of the short horns were cow's horns and some were ram's horns.

So the Short Horn party were subdivided, and became the Short Cow Horns and the Short Ram Horns.

The Bishop still persevered.

He pointed out to the Long and Narrow Tom tom party that some of their long and narrow tom-toms were headed with the skin of sheep, and some with the skin of pigs.

So the Long and Narrow Tom-tom party were subdivided, and became the Long and Narrow Sheep-headed Tom-tom party, and the Long and Narrow Pig-headed Tom-tom party.

He pointed out to the Short and Stout Tom-tom party that some of their short and stout tom-toms were bored in with wood, and some with iron. So the Short and Stout Tom-tom party were subdivided into the Short and Stout Wooden-boxed Tom-tom party, and the Short and Stout Iron boxed Tom-tom party.

And here the good Bishop took breath and rested. For by this time there was only one man to each subdivision, and the process of disintegration could be carried on no further.

Let us hope, however, that he was as successful in converting them to Christianity, as he was in bringing them to a Christian frame of mind.

QUEER RELIGION.

The Chicago Tribune gives an amusing account of the adventures of an amiable old gentleman from the rural districts, who had been wavering between orthodoxy and heterodoxy for some time. He went into the city to hear Robert Collyer preach. It was his first visit to Chicago. Stepping into a North Clark street horse car, he rode out as far as Turner Hall, where many of the passengers alighted, and he perceived a crowd of people, and inquired of the conductor if that was Robert Collyer's church. The conductor, amused at the simplicity of the question, promptly replied in the affirmative, and our curious inquirer passed into the hall. He saw a vast crowd of men and women sitting at small tables drinking beer. This rather staggered him for a moment, but he reflected that they were possibly receiving the communion. So he sat down at a table and looked around him. Presently a young man with a white apron came up and asked if he had ordered. No, he replied, he was not exactly a member, but he came to hear Mr. Collyer. The youth with the white apron stared and passed on. Very soon a number of gentlemen stepped on the platform, with trombones, and fiddles, and cornets, and began to play. "The Unitarians have a queer way of worshipping," thought the old gentleman, "but I have been living out of the world; that is what's the matter, I suppose." He thought it would come out all right when Mr. Collyer came on. But after the music there was "communion," and after a long interval there was more music; and by-and-by a man dressed in tights came forward and commenced to swing round and round on a pole. Then another man, dressed like the first, went through a course of exercise on the cross-bar. And then there was more music, and no end of "communion." The stranger sat out the "services" very patiently, and then went home. He had come to the conclusion that Unitarianism was all very well in theory, but these new-fangled notions of worship were not so edifying, after all, as the good old Presbyterian psalms and prayers.

A BOSTON TETZEL.—In this enlightened land, in this year of our Lord, 1870, is sent out from Boston, Mass., the "Athens of America," a circular from Rev. Geo. F. Haskins offering for sale the pardon of sin on terms specified below.

The circular states that a great difficulty stands in the way of providing for the large family in the "Home of the Angel Guardian," in Boston, which purports to be an "asylum for orphans, homeless and wayward boys, where all are alike taught the principles of the Catholic faith and the virtues of a Catholic life." To aid in removing the difficulty referred to, this Boston Tetzal offers for $10, or $1 annually, the privileges granted to benefactors of the Society of the Angel Guardian, which he says were "graciously accorded by our Holy Father, Pope Pius IX, during my visit to Rome in 1854.

1. A plenary Indulgence [i. e., entire forgiveness of past sins] on the day of admission.

2. A plenary Indulgence, each year, on the 2d of October, which is the feast of the Angel Guardian.

3. A plenary Indulgence in the hour of death.

4. A partial Indulgence of three hundred days as often as the members shall recite a Pater, Ave, and Gloria Patri in honor of the Angel Guardian.

These are times for laying up treasures in heaven."

If this is not blasphemous, what is?—Morning Star.

Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan has, by an order approving and applauding the massacre of the Piegan Indians by Col. Baker, done an act of greater hardness than any deed of his during the war. He has braved and outraged the moral sentiment of the civilized world.—Boston Commonwealth.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I want to see your movement carried out thoroughly, and hope you will be enabled to go ahead. I can't yet say, decisively, where I shall come out; I sympathize largely with you, but not altogether. If I had to sum up my judgment I should say, I think, that you seemed to me right from the point of view of Comparative Theology (the scientific view), wrong from that of Practical Religion. I grant Affirmation 9 scientifically, but practically the special element is not Christian, but rather the universal, except with very narrow religionists. To the world at large Christianity is Religion. That is, on the great fundamental truths of Natural Religion, Jesus has, providentially, set the seal of his name. Why not use this practical view? Whipple's little article in the February Radical is suggestive, and conveys the idea I intend."

"I certainly sympathize heartily with the movement and with Mr. Abbot, and feel that the time has come for us as Spiritualists to unite in an endeavor to organize the Free Religious movement. So soon as our friends are ready to leave the sectarian name Christianity, I am ready to leave that of Spiritualism, and join them to build up a Natural and Rational Religion unfolding the human conscience into harmony with the Divine Law, and, cultivating the Deific element in our own nature, find the God in man ever incarnate in the race."

"A stranger to you, I take the liberty of writing to you as to the publication of a periodical journal or weekly paper, in which a full and Free Religion, higher, nobler, better, and purer than the Orthodox Christianity of to-day is to be advocated, a Christianity resting upon the eternal foundations of reason and truth; a Religion not afraid of free inquiry and unrestrained discussion and investigation. One more pure, more genuine, than the Pope, Priest, or sectarian has ever yet given to society or to man."

"A friend has kindly shown me the first number of THE INDEX, with which I am much pleased. I have been waiting and hoping for such a paper as you have started; and have thought that there were great numbers of people, and especially men in my profession, who would welcome and encourage it. Many have expressed to me such views, and many more who are skeptical of all sectarian beliefs only need such a paper as THE INDEX to show them that there is a true religion."

"I would like very much to see a copy of the paper, as I would like to become a subscriber. I am really glad to see or hear of a paper of the kind. The Bible has done a great deal of good and a great deal of mischief; I honestly do not believe it to be a revelation from God. God does not deal in nor depend upon a paper: raggy book to teach man his will or wishes."

"What I read there makes me desirous of seeing your paper. I am a believer in the dignity and sacredness of Humanity; in God, in all that is elevating, refining, purifying, and ennobling in its influence on character and destiny. It seems as if our souls are akin."

Poetry.

THE EVENING STAR.

Thou watchest from thy lonely tower
The glowing sunset sky,—
Hath earth to draw thy gaze no power,
No charms to lure, thine eye?
Why turn from scenes so passing fair
To burning fields of empty air?

Thou heed'st me not; but gazing still
With eye serene and clear,
Thou waitest patiently until
The Evening Star appear;
And, lost in girlhood's idle dream,
Thou fain would'st hail her earliest beam.

Still linger and enjoy thy trance,
Albeit of briefest date;
The dreams of later years, perchance,
May share as stern a fate.
Hope not Time's ruthless hand will spare
Thy glittering mansions in the air.

O, maiden, when thy castles fade,
And sudden melt away,
Grieve not to see them lowly laid;
All earthly hopes decay.
Our airy temples perish all,—
The loveliest are the first to fall.

But when the eve of Life draws nigh,
And years thy spirit bow,
Still upward turn thy tear-dimmed eye,
As in thy girlhood now;
Though clouds and storms awhile may bar,
Still seek to find the Evening Star!

The Index.

APRIL 9, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

There is something very illiberal in the manner in which we reward our public servants. When Mr. Lincoln was assassinated, Congress ought to have voted the salary for his full term to his family; the pitiful higgling over the amount to be paid them seemed to us at the time, and still seems, a public disgrace. Another instance of this same parsimonious temper is found in the refusal to advance the salaries of some of our highest officials. The New York Nation, referring to Gen. Sherman's recent letter to Senator Wilson, says:—

"As to the 'invidious comparisons' which have been made between the salaries of the Chief-Justice and cabinet ministers and that of the General, he points out that whatever shame there is in the matter arises out of the fact, not that the salary of the General-in-Chief is too high, but that those of the Chief-Justice and cabinet ministers are too low, and that he holds it to be a shame that a country with forty millions of people should stint their Chief-Justice and cabinet ministers as this Government now does. Finally, in an outburst of honest indignation, he says (in substance) what some member of the House should have said for him, that he has earned his pay, be it high or low; that, during the war, when filling the world with his fame, helping in no considerable degree to save the country, and commanding more men than the Duke of Wellington ever commanded, he lived and supported his family on less pay than Wellington's private secretary received, and asks—what the economical saints and purists of the House will find it hard to answer—'What money would pay Meade for Gettysburg? What, Sheridan for Winchester and Five Forks? What, Thomas for Chickamauga, Chattanooga, or Nashville?'"

There will be no need to pay Thomas any longer. The old hero has gone to his rest; his remains passed through Toledo Wednesday morning. Let Columbia see to it that she grudge no honor and no reward to the men yet alive who stood between her and death! A gratitude that stoops to be economical in such a case is a fit title to infamy.

THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The official proclamation of the Fifteenth Amendment marks the complete victory of the ideas for which the war was waged. This victory has come so gradually that it excites far less enthusiasm than might naturally be expected. Like a mountain seen too near, it is hidden from us by its own greatness; but time will make only more evident its stupendous moral grandeur and influence for good on the destinies of mankind. New wars, however, must be waged before the victory of the American idea in all its comprehensiveness can be complete. To-day political power is concentrated in the hands of only half the American people. This is a wrong that must be righted. Women must enjoy their full rights and discharge their full duties as citizens of the State. Nor will the idea of perfect freedom, which is the vital principle of American civilization, ever fully accomplish its destined work for mankind until the shackles of superstition and ignorance and vice shall be stricken from every human soul. Rejoicing in what has already been achieved, and welcoming with the utmost cordiality our colored brothers to the full exercise of all civil and political rights, we still press forward to the things which are before, and will not rest until absolute justice for each and all shall be the all-pervading spirit of human society.

THEOLOGICAL ASSUMPTIONS.

The Sunday essay which we print this morning answers certain criticisms on our "Fifty Affirmations," which will be found in a communication from a friend whose judgment we highly respect. It aims to show that religion does not depend on any particular dogma, since all dogmas have their root in the intellect, but that it is synonymous with the effort of the race and of the individual soul to reach a higher stage of development. This effort has a deeper origin than the intellect alone, arising as it does from the very depths of our moral and spiritual nature. That this discussion is not untimely is evident from the last number of the Liberal Christian. "What?" it exclaims, "assume there is any such being as a God and claim to be in absolute freedom of mind? Assume the existence of a soul or a spirit and be wholly free to question or deny them?"

We assume nothing except the unity of the universe and the trustworthiness of human faculties, and are therefore free to question everything. If Free Religion cannot exist without a dogma, that is, if it cannot be religion and yet be free, then we discard the word religion forever. It is because we believe that an undogmatic religion is possible,—one favorable in the highest degree to the natural development and use of all human faculties,—one, in short, that shall directly tend to foster this natural development and use,—that our faith in religion has not been shaken by any change in human dogmas. What we must think on the great questions that stir men's souls must be determined by the scientific use of reason. But if God is, he will continue to be, despite all errors of human thought; and if he is good, each human soul will fulfil its highest duty to him by being true to the inward law of constant, unwearied progress. This practical truth of life, which is in great measure independent of speculative truth of thought, is the real substance of religion, independent of every dogma and of all ecclesiasticisms. Those who would do justice to Free Religion must recognize this undogmatic and un-ecclesiastical character of it; and to the Liberal Christian, especially, we commend the patient study of our fundamental principle, that religion, in order to be free, must be undogmatic.

A CARD EXTRAORDINARY.

To the American People, Greeting:

I am commissioned to procure the name and address of every person in the United States who takes a friendly interest in Woman's Enfranchisement. In order to compile this roll of honor, I hereby request every such person, immediately on reading this announcement, without waiting long enough to forget or neglect it, to take pen and ink, write the name and address legibly, and forward the same to me by mail, postage paid—a trifling cost which you will not begrudge to a good cause. Any one sending in one envelope all the names in a family, village, or association, will render a helpful service. Three thousand American newspapers will oblige a brother editor by generously printing this card in their columns. The purpose of this registration is to know to whom to send important documents. Friends of the cause are urged to respond so simultaneously that their letters shall fly hither like a snow-storm. Sign at once. And the day will come when your children and children's children will be proud of the record.

Fraternally,

Editor of The Independent.

A FEMALE SCHOOL EXAMINER—RESIGNATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS.—Messrs. E. W. Lenderson and P. H. Dowling, having been elected to important county offices which require their undivided attention, on the 21st inst., resigned their positions as members of the Board of School Examiners, and Judge Jones has appointed Miss Henrietta J. Angier of this city, and Mr. A. B. West, of Sylvania, to fill the places thus made vacant. The appointment of Miss Angier is the inauguration of a new era in this section of the country, for she is the first female member of a Board of School Examiners that has ever been known in these parts. She is an assistant teacher in the High School and has charge of the Free Evening School. No one acquainted with Miss A. doubts her fitness for the position, nor can we see any reasonable objection to the appointment of a lady to that office, especially since a large majority of those who apply for certificates to teach are ladies. And then, it may be some time before she will find it necessary to resign in consequence of being elected Auditor or Sheriff of the county. Mr. West is an old and much respected teacher, and his appointment, like that of Miss Angier, will give universal satisfaction.—Toledo Commercial.

FALSE ISSUES.

[From the Woman's Journal.]

The opponents of Woman Suffrage in Vermont, as elsewhere, shrink instinctively from discussing the main question. They try to divert attention by raising false issues, quite aside from the question submitted by the Council of Censors. It is as follows:—

"Article No 24. Hereafter women are entitled to vote, and with no other restriction than the law shall impose on men."

The Montpelier Watchman and State Journal, instead of considering this proposition, renews its former charge that "many of the advocates of Woman Suffrage have thrown scorn upon marriage and upon the Divine Word." It seeks, by garbled quotations and groundless assertions, to implicate Tilton, Rev. Mr. Frothingham, John Stuart Mill, and other eminent friends of the movement. It renews an unfounded and wicked calumny for the purpose of exciting prejudice and preventing candid investigation.

Now, in the name of reason and common-sense, Mr. Poland, what connection has the marriage question or the Bible question with the political rights of American citizens?

Do not married men vote without detriment to the marriage relation? And, if so, why may not married women vote also? Is there any possible connection between easy divorce and impartial suffrage?

Is the Watchman aware that, in Holland, where married women do actually vote on the same terms and qualifications as men, divorces are far less numerous than in Vermont, where all women are disfranchised?

Would it therefore be fair for us to claim that Women Suffrage would put an end to domestic unhappiness?

Does the Bible command men to vote? Does it forbid women to vote? Does the word vote occur at all in the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelations? Why, then, array the word of God, who is no respecter of persons, against our demand for personal rights and political equality irrespective of sex?

Let us ask the Watchman three plain questions.

1. Do you believe in the principles of the Declaration of Independence? Yes, or no.

2. Do you believe in the bill of rights of the State of Vermont? Yes, or no.

3. Do you believe in representative government? Yes, or no.

When we have the editor's answer to these simple questions, we will meet him on his own ground. For the man who denies a woman's right to vote can show no title to his own.

ERRATUM.—In the letter from Mr. Lincoln, printed in Mr. Herndon's article, for—"One great and good and merciful Maker,"—read—"Our great, &c."

CRITICISM OF THE "FIFTY AFFIRMATIONS."

To the Editor of the Index:

The first three of your "Fifty Affirmations" are, I think, quite unsatisfactory. You start by saying that "Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself,"—a definition which is faulty both in what it does say, and in what it does not say. For, first, it is not true that religion is, in all its forms, an effort of man to perfect himself.

As a rule, most religions have aimed not at perfection, but at salvation, in the sense of escape from the displeasure of God. This was the aim of all sacrifices, including the so-called vicarious sacrifice of Christ taught by the Church. Perfection of character, when aimed at at all, has always been deemed an incidental and subordinate matter. And as a matter of fact it may be questioned whether its influence upon the character has not been for evil quite as often as for good.

Again, this definition gives no place to the belief in a God or gods as an element of religion, although in all historical, if not in all possible, religions, this is the most important element.

I am aware that Mill argues that there may be such a thing as a religion which does not recognize a God. But certainly to use the word in this way is to change its common acceptation, which, in a definition at least, we have no right to do.

You go on in Nos. 2 and 3 to say that—"The root of religion is universal human nature," and that "Historical religions are all one, in virtue of this one common root."

Now these statements seem to me glittering generalities and nothing more. For there is nothing in all human experience—as War, Tyranny, Sleep, Property, Marriage,—of which exactly the same cannot be truthfully said. They all have root in universal human nature, and are all one in virtue of this common root, which is much as if we should say that black and white are both one, in that they are both modes of being—a statement which is true, but certainly not very important.

I would therefore modify your first three aphorisms somehow thus:

1. Religion is the practical recognition, under some form or other, of the being and agency of God.
2. This practical recognition of God or of "the divine" is the root of all religion.
3. Historical religions are all one by virtue of this common root.

Thus modified, they point out the essence of religion which is found in all its forms, and also distinguish it from Theology, which is an intellectual, but not a practical or living, recognition of God.

R. M.

[To bring religion into the same category with all other forms of "human experience," was the precise object of Aff. 2; for the Christian theology makes it a supernatural gift arbitrarily bestowed. Considering the state of public opinion on these subjects, it is not a "glittering generality" to say that religion has its roots in the earth rather than in the skies, or that this common origin puts Christianity on a level with all other religions.

The other criticisms are replied to elsewhere.—Ed.]

A VOICE FROM NEW ENGLAND.

MIDDLEFIELD, CONN., March 27, 1870.

To the Editor of The Index:—

DEAR SIR:—I enclose one dollar (greenback), for which send me a few copies of THE INDEX which is to contain the paper on Mr. Lincoln's religious belief.

And here let me express my sincere thanks for THE INDEX generally. It is already a power in the land. It has proved, among other things, that a journal need not be large in order to be influential. The Independent, commonly regarded as the best religious paper in America, (equalled and surpassed in my estimation only by THE INDEX), is good, not because it is big, but because it has a generous heart. Every week I look carefully through its vast pages and find therein much instruction; and yet, in the little INDEX, I find as much reading and more food for thought. I also take and read the Christian Register, devoting, perhaps, half an hour to each number, which half hour, generally, not always, seems well enough spent. If THE INDEX were larger, would it be better? Would it be as easy then to find in it such sentences as the following, copied from the last No.?

"We hope the human soul is immortal, but do not feel justified in saying we know it to be so"; "we hope, and calmly wait."

"The problem is to find the One in the Many and the Many in the One"; "recognizing Being as one in essence and manifold in manifestation."

"Highly as I value human life, it is not above all price; freedom is worth more, honor is worth more, country is worth more, the welfare of the race is worth more, great ideas are worth more."

I had the happiness of hearing the admirable lecture on "Socrates and Jesus." There was a world of meaning in that little sentence: "Socrates has too little of the woman in him, Jesus too much." A part of the meaning, as I understand it, is, that the classic civilizations were too exclusively masculine; that Christianity worked long and successfully to restore the equilibrium, thereby establishing a feminine type of religion; no longer needed; outgrown in fact; the way being open for broader, freer religion, as well as for better culture of all sorts; and since in moving forward we are called upon to readjust our relations with the past, we must see to it that we understand the true positions of Aristotle, Socrates, Pericles, Homer, as well as of Paul, Jesus, David, Moses.

Truly yours,

JAS. T. DICKINSON.

ETERNAL LIFE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Rejoicing in the courageous honesty of your reply to the question concerning conscious Immortality, I beg leave to offer a protest against the following:—"We hope the human soul is immortal, but do not feel justified in saying that we know it to be so." "But whether our hope is well grounded or not, we have no quarrel with the changeless order of the universe, which we believe to be as truly rooted in Love as in Intelligence."

It is difficult to conceive by what process of reasoning you are able to arrive at belief in the one case, and can only attain to hope in the other. Neither the Love you believe in, nor the Immortality you hope for, is a subject of ocular or mathematical demonstration. There are many things in outward nature and inward experience, which militate against the idea that the universe is rooted in Love. To meet the force of this warring element, I find but one conquering thought. The highest and deepest in us is a grand "hunger and thirst after righteousness." The ideal of benignant Justice sits forever on the soul's judgment seat, reducing everything beneath it to order and beauty—claiming allegiance even to the sacrifice of every inferior good, and to the acceptance of death itself in its high service. Whatever in nature apparently conflicts with the belief that this same goodness, in its infinity, pervades all things and stands at the helm, gives us the deepest concern, and we are always "searching for the keys of the heavenly harmonies,"—seeking to bring all notes into accord with this divine music. Let a noble human soul once entertain a skepticism in regard to this supreme benignty, and existence becomes a nausea; he loathes the thought of immortality, and longs to be scattered to the winds; and so we ask, how came we by this high conformation of soul? "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" and we find the answer,—the highest in us is—must be—a faint image of the highest in the Creator. God is good! That which would contradict it, is but a seeming; benignant Justice is at the foundation of the universe! This triumphant faith we can only demonstrate by our spiritual consciousness.

By a similar process of thought, we discern the immortality of man; and belief in the one requires belief in the other. If it be true, that the universe is rooted in Love, all that follows as a necessary consequence must be true also. The present life demands another, or rather, Life calls for continuance as certainly as the eye requires light, the lungs air, or the stomach food. To create this complex being of man, to carry him through all the vicissitudes of life with its unutterably solemn experiences—to place within him an ideal of excellence, towards which he must ever erect himself, or what it will—to awaken within him the belief that his nature is too lofty to stoop to the things "which perish in the using"; to create him thus—and that not as the necessity of an immortal being—would be to create a need and furnish no supply—a thing which Love could not do, which Intelligence alone would have no right to do, and which malignity alone would do. The Creator has no right to make the quivering substance of the human soul the mere plaything of his power, to experiment upon its loves, joys and agonies, to please himself alone with his creation; the very statement confutes such possibility. Life is no play to many of us. It is no play to travel a thirsty desert wherein is no water—to gaze into thick darkness with wide open eyes—to go down into the deep, and struggle in the great sea with all God's billows swelling over and surging into our souls; and if we may not draw from thence the one "pearl of great price," utter faith in God, so that we can exclaim "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him!"—if these experiences serve not the needs of the immortal man, then the power which rules is a malignant one, and we have good cause of "quarrel with the order of the universe;" for Life is a failure, the world more a chaos than in the beginning, and thick darkness is upon the face of its deep.

Thus belief in God's goodness involves belief in man's immortality. We cannot even speak of goodness—truth—honor—the dignity of human nature, without an underlying recognition of it. Why interest ourselves in eternal Truth, if we have not affinity for it—are not a part of it! Why talk of preserving our integrity, if the soul's identity is to be destroyed to-morrow! What dignity has he, who is counted unfit to live! If we are not worthy of life, we are not worthy of the death chosen by heroic souls in all ages. Let us have no more heroism! Let us eat and drink! Let us satisfy ourselves with husks—with things which perish in the using! for the great universe spues us out—retaining only our elements as fertilizers for other beings as petty as we.

Though Immortality cannot be proved like a mathematical problem, the knowledge of it is "spiritually discerned," and is founded on a rock which nothing can overthrow. Love and Intelligence preside over the universe, and verily we have "eternal life abiding in us."

"Normine the faith of India's son,
Of millions blending into one,
Dust atoms of the Infinite,
Sparks scattered from the central light,
And winning back through mortal pain
Their old unconsciousness again."

BREVITY.

[We are glad to print so forcible and fine a criticism of our words. To the question—"Do you believe in conscious immortality?" we answered unequivocally that we hope, but do not know; and that no one believes without thinking that he knows. Our esteemed friend beautifully states some of the grounds of our hope; but one who has candidly studied modern thought on this subject must, we think, come to the conclusion that, when Socrates said,—"This one thing I know, that I know nothing,"—he went far to prove the truthfulness of the Delphic oracle. That Law is Love, is the generalized lesson of our own experience of this life; while we have had no experience of a life to come. That is why we are more sure that the Universal Power is benevolent, than we are that the soul is immortal. If the latter followed as a "necessary consequence" of the former, we should feel as little doubt of the one as of the other; but of this we are not perfectly convinced. Our sympathies, our hopes, our longings, side with our friend; but we are not bold enough to sue the Infinite for a supposed debt. If it is best for us to live again, we shall live again; if otherwise, we do not even desire it. For we do not love existence as we love virtue; and virtue is its own sufficient reward. The high opportunity of virtue, even for a day, is a boon worthy of Infinite Bounty.

If Free Religion is anything but a sham, it will make us masters of our own souls, happen what may,—will make us self-centred and serene under all contingencies,—will bear us up on pinions of pure conscience and resolute will beyond the reach of all arrows of if and but. Logic can but play about this great problem of life and death. There is more religion in a modest—"I do not know, but my peace is not pinned to knowledge,"—than in all the creeds. The free soul will not lie at the mercy of a doubt. The faith that trusts in God, even though he slays, alone gives the victory over fear.—Ed.]

THE PERPETUITY OF PROPHETISM.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—Your discourse in THE INDEX of the 19th, on "The Hebrew Prophets" interests me so much, as what seems to me a judicious application of the method of Theism to historical interpretation, that I venture to make it the occasion of a word of criticism. I go with you fully to the conclusion of your explanation of the position and work of the Hebrew prophet. He was, in the finest instances, as Jeremiah and Isaiah, exactly what Garrison and Phillips have been in American history, barring the differences created by the different age of the world in which they flourished.

There is one point, however, to which you do not allude, which is undoubtedly deserving of particular study, and the proper appreciation of which must ultimately form the threshold of an accurate representation of this subject. I refer to the part played by the trance, in its best and most remarkable form, in the rise and influence of Hebrew prophecy. Renan, in his "Histoire Générale des Langues Semitiques," calls attention to the peculiar susceptibility of the people dwelling at the east end of the Mediterranean to the whole circle of experiences which modern "Spiritualism," as it is called, is engrossed with, and suggests that this circumstance made that region a cradle of religions for the world. He also describes the origin of the Koran in terms which strongly suggest that Mahomet was virtually a "trance-speaker." However it may have been with the Meccan camel-driver, turned prophet and become the founder of a world-religion, it is undeniable that a careful study, with this clew in hand, of early Hebrew prophecy, and of the indications of Hebrew language and Hebrew ceremonial, disclose the fact that trance-speaking was the original basis of the prophet's vocation. So much by way of a suggestion supplementary to your exposition.

A criticism which I venture to make touches the first words of the next to the last paragraph of your discourse, in which you refer to Moses, and even to Jacob, Isaac and Abraham as "the earliest prophets." I hope I shall not imperil THE INDEX, with any of its Unitarian friends, by assuming that you do not really believe in Moses and the patriarchs as other than shadowy figures in old Hebrew fable. I have noted your recognition, once at least, of "the transcendent greatness of Jesus," the identical notion out of which that beloved disciple, Dr. Furness, has blown such an infinity of delightful bubbles, and now you appear to recognize as a real person and veritable prophet the great hero of Hebrew legend, strongly suggesting to me that you may still be an object of intercessory interest to Old and New, which affords at last an example of religion attended to in secret, and that possibly even you may incur only suspended damnation from such Heads of the Church as R. P.

S., and the Angels of Resurrection employed in the vain attempt to bring life out of the Unitarian newspaper offices (one of whom, by the way, has taken, I see, to whistling "Uncle Ephraim" to keep his courage up, weary, I suppose, of sitting helpless on a stone that won't move, and within sniff of remains that are evidently dead beyond hope). I don't want to be the agent of your final perdition with your late brethren, but I must ask whether your studies have not freely convinced you that the first spoken or written teaching of the Hebrews dates from Samuel, 400 years after Moses is said to have lived, and that the book of Deuteronomy, which would naturally be considered the great prophetic utterance of Moses, was not written earlier than the time of Jeremiah, 900 years after the assumed age of Moses? The admirable People's Edition of Bishop Colenso on the Pentateuch, which includes in a single three dollar volume the substance of his five original volumes, is a manual of information on this subject which ought to be generally read, as it alone, I believe, would entirely convince any candid reader that the most ancient fragments of the so-called books of Moses were from the lips or pen of Samuel, and other parts from prophets trained by him; and that their completion was the work of some one about the time of Jeremiah, if not of Jeremiah himself.

But a more important criticism which I am prompted to make does not affect the discourse before me, but rather uses this against a general position taken by THE INDEX. You rightly treat as contemptible the "vagaries of orthodox theology" on the subject of the true function of the old Hebrew prophets. You even dismiss the misconceptions which these prophets themselves entertained in regard to certain aspects of their work. You eliminate their truth, and show its present and lasting use, thereby putting yourself in the line of these old prophets, and justly claiming that the continuity of their work is to be found in the free thinkers of today. Now I challenge you to do as much for Jesus and his companions. You have assumed, in taking your position ("squarely outside of Christianity"), the truth of the orthodox method of looking at Jesus and at Christianity,—the justice of the orthodox presuppositions. If you had assumed the great Theistic presuppositions, and applied the Theistic method of interpretation, you would have claimed the Christian, as you do the prophetic banner. I do not indeed believe you can long continue to hold your recent opinion of "the transcendent greatness of Jesus," but I am confident that you will soon have to face square about, nominally that is, towards the identical mark of the prize of the high calling of God which fixed the gaze of Jesus and of Paul, and both confess and claim association with the Truth as it was in Jesus. I see that you ascribe to Jesus some words which abundant critical evidence entirely acquits him of. In short, your account of him lacks critical completeness and accuracy, a very natural thing if you have not had more than usual time and opportunity to devote to this special study, and if circumstances have not specially driven your attention in this direction. The presuppositions of Christendom are continental in their sweep; it takes almost a lifetime to travel beyond their reach; but these once over-passed, it is impossible for the thoughtful scholar not to adjust happily his relations to that eminent movement of mankind during eighteen centuries which we call Christianity. Only view the subject as you view prophecy, entirely strip off orthodox error, even though you speak a century before your word can be fulfilled, and you will say of Jesus and his Apostles, as you say of the Hebrew prophets, that they fulfilled their vocation in a fair measure, and that we, on whom the labors and cross of radical teaching are laid, to-day press their identical footsteps, and have the best right in the world to the name which implies close connection with them. I have just improved a Saturday and a Sunday of confinement to my room to read a new work on the life and teaching of Jesus, an English book entitled "The Jesus of History." It is decidedly the best existing work on the subject. I imagine it to be from the pen of an English layman of legal training, and judicial or diplomatic employment, whose life has been passed in various dependencies of England, or in foreign residence, and who has devoted the leisure of many years to reflection upon the varied aspects of the evangelical story. The use which he has avowedly made of D'Eichthal's "Les Evangiles," the most useful book for the study of the gospel history which has ever come into my way, commends him as a most appreciative student, while the calmness, candor, and breadth of his survey, show a judicial thoughtfulness which no other writer on this theme has so conspicuously displayed. With his work, and that of D'Eichthal, I would name also, as extremely suggestive and helpful, "Christianity in the Cartoons referred to Artistic Treatment and Historic Fact," by W. W. Lloyd, also an English book, and unfortunately an expensive one, because of the photographic illustrations. With these works I believe any competent student can so remove Jesus from the accretions which considerably hide him from view now, as to see, first, that he was no miracle of greatness, and yet that he was true with a truth which forbids any of us to stand apart from him, and particularly forbids a Theist and free-thinker to do this. It seems to me in particular too bad that you, with your great opportunity, and the grand spirit with which you have accepted it, should throw away the colors which thirty centuries of inspiration have consecrated, because a Hebrew youth showed excess of enthusiasm in snatching them from the iron grasp of Judaism, and Paul made some mistakes while he bore them round the world. Rather, I beseech you, put your hands where you see the blood-stains of theirs, and gratefully bear off from the successors of those who crushed Jesus the standard which floated over his death on Calvary, and of which the sufficient device was GOD WITH US. Even though Jesus misthought something, and the following course of history wrapped the truth of his life and teaching in manifold error, yet what GOD meant in and by him, in making him a link in the chain of religious history, none the less concerns us; and that concerns us without regard to any existing amount of misconception and misrepresentation. It is surely ungrateful to that young Nazarene to take him in his fictitious guise, instead of in his simple humanity, and ungracious towards the Providence of history to judge him as men have misused rather than as God has used him. I do not speak of the immense satisfaction it gives all along the line of traditionalism to see that you have left the old flag flying over church and creed, as the current orthodoxies have established and still maintain them; for you need only to consider what the truest truth is, irrespective of either the fears or favors of men.

Yours very truly,

EDWARD C. TOWNE.

WINNETKA, Ill., March 20, 1870.

[Our old friend and comrade raises more questions than we can answer briefly. One or two only can we notice at present. Mr. Towne thinks that we do not use Jesus and the prophets impartially, since we seem to stand by the latter and retire from the former. A little closer look at our position will show him that he is mistaken in his criticism. Both the prophets and Jesus were radical reformers of religion; and we, too, are trying in a modest way to carry on the same unending work. But because the prophets preached Judaism, we do not therefore call ourself a Jew. Why, then, because Jesus preached Christianity, should we call ourself a Christian? We are as truly outside of Christianity, as Mr. Towne is outside of Judaism. We recognize the fact that every local and historical religious movement is limited by its very nature; and we decline to identify ourself with any such limited movement, because the religion we have faith in is universal and spiritual. Mr. Towne fails to perceive the fact that Christianity is a great system of faith and life, having certain fundamental and essential beliefs. Orthodox believers understand this,—radicals like Mr. Towne, Mr. Wasson, Mr. Phillips, Mrs. Howe, and others, slur over it. Hence the former appreciate the importance of such a step as passing outside the Christian lines: and the strong common sense of the people at large equally appreciates it. It is only a small number of persons, almost but not quite ready to take this step, who underrate its great significance. To all such we put the plain question,—“Do you, or do you not, believe that Jesus is the Christ, in the New Testament sense of the word?” Yes? Then you are Christians. No? Then you are not Christians. This is not a mere question of words; and whoever represents it as such, deceives himself. Twenty-five years hence he will be amazed at his own blindness. The lines of Lowell are full of truth:—

“Let us speak plain: there is more force in names
Than most men dream of: and a lie may keep Its throne a whole age longer, if it skulk
Behind the shield of some fair-seeming name.
Let us call tyrants tyrants, and maintain
That only freedom comes by grace of God,
And all that comes not by his grace must fall;
For men in earnest have no time to waste
In patching fig-leaves for the naked truth.”

Mr. Towne regrets that we “throw away the colors, etc.” But it was necessary to throw away the Union-jack of Great Britain, before the Stars and Stripes could be hoisted. In the new “war of independence,” it will not much longer be possible to serve under two banners.—ED.

THE TRANSITION.

[From the Banner of Light.]

Every person conversant with the present condition of Spiritualism in this country must be aware of the apathy generally prevalent among Spiritualists, and the want of confidence in one another, the personal and local prejudices and jealousies, which are quite equal to those of the churches, of politicians and of individuals and societies generally, but could not well exceed them. Some persons, even of good judgment, take these as signs that it is dying out, and some are even looking about for a Hepzibam to flee to for social and religious protection from the falling ruins of a crumbling temple. Such are mistaken, and need not flee at all, for they will soon see the rising and protecting walls of a newer and sublimer temple growing up around them, built from the fragments of all the institutions of the past, with no sectarian name or character, built without creed or catechism, Bible or Koran, bishop or priest, authority or dogma.

We are surely in a transition from the phenomenal and theoretical to the real and practical religion of nature and life—a transition in Spiritualism as well as in all other religious theories. Christians are casting off the sectarian shell of their church, and Spiritualists are shedding the ism, as a tadpole does its tail to become a frog. A “free religion” is demanded, and it must and will be inaugurated, and while it will not, and cannot ignore the truth and fact of spirit-intercourse, it will arise from its authority as Christians will from church authority, and, taking hold of angel-hands extended, have the inspiring influence to help human nature up to the standard and recognition of its Godhood through its arisen manhood which was crucified by the Christian Church.

Strong minds, some with long and some with short purses, have not only lost all confidence in the churches, but have also lost the little faith they once had, that out of Spiritualism would arise a Savior or a saving institution for the race. They now see no Savior can come to us, but it must be raised in us and developed from our own nature. The temples of all idols must be taken down, and from the fragments a temple of humanity be built, a temple that can shelter every human soul, and a church door open to all, with all its blessings free to all, requiring nothing of any one, and giving of its bounty to every one that asketh, requiring no confession, no faith, no ceremonies—a church that shall be as the river of pure water, washing every soul that steps into it.

The age is ripe for a free church, and the question is, who shall inaugurate it? how shall it be built? who shall set the ball in motion? Not who shall be priests; for it can need none where every one shall minister as he or she is qualified. “To him that hath shall be given,” and to him that hath not shall be given, for from him nothing can be taken. The old church took the soul from him that had no money to give it, and the world took the time, strength and substance from the poor spiritual mediums and speakers, till they are mostly starved out, and the old pioneers are fast crossing over to the summer and sunny side of the river of death, but to new hands the work before us must be intrusted, and by new builders must the temple be constructed.

The cry has gone forth, and the angels are already looking for the workmen. Is it strange that those who have graduated from, not in Christianity, and from its highest class—Unitarian—should be found most ready and best qualified? Education, refinement, scholarship and manners they had, but not these alone would answer; hearts as well as heads are needed, and mortar as well as bricks. Not alone of polished marble can a temple be constructed.

“Free religion,” we opine, means more than even those who named it could have designed it to mean; a religion free for all to take whatsoever they please, and appropriate all they can, but a religion that shall surely make all better who partake of it in large or small quantities; an ever flowing, never ceasing fountain of the “waters of life,” over which is written: Come and drink freely, all ye that thirst, and no questions shall be asked you how or why you became thirsty, and no charge shall be made for what you choose to take. We must strike hands with every human brother and sister, and open wide our doors to all, bidding them come and partake of the waters of life freely, without questionings of hope, faith or belief, or even of knowledge or intent.

The day of damning churches has passed, and the day of blessing churches dawns. The creed that crucified has had its day and victims enough. The blood of its martyrs cries from the ground, and from the ground hearts of its oppressed millions. Poor Ireland and the poor of all Europe are groaning with the agony of crucified hearts impoverished and crushed by the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, and the cry must be heard.

At a Union Prayer Meeting at Cincinnati, the other day, the question was agitated whether the loss of voice by Rev. Mr. Gifford, a Universalist minister, was a direct answer to prayer, or was produced by bronchitis. A case in point that occurred in Chicago, under Rev. Mr. Hammond's ministration, was cited, wherein a Christian man, but who was opposed to the revival system, was struck speechless and not able to talk in meeting for some months. It seems a new idea to pray that men may be struck dumb. Perhaps the Almighty will answer such prayers, but few will believe that of a God of Love. We fancy, had the Rev. Mr. Gifford been an orthodox divine, his throat malady would hardly have been classed as a special interposition of Divine Providence. People who talk thus of special Providences should not find fault with spiritualists who see all manner of supernatural things.—Cleveland Herald.

The city of Elmira, N. Y., has passed an ordinance empowering magistrates to fine and imprison any person found intoxicated. T. K. Beecher says of it: “That's sensible. Fine and imprison every man found drunk. But don't make fools of them by sentimental pity, or by throwing the blame of their sin on the liquor sellers. Liquor dealers have sinned enough of their own to answer for. The crime of drunkenness is committed by the man who drinks. A well kept jail is the best inebriate asylum. To be drunk is a crime.”—Seaside Oracle.

CHARLES V.—A swallow, having built her nest upon his tent, Charles V., upon the removal of his camp, ordered it to be left standing till her young had fled, so sacred did he hold the rights of hospitality. If this anecdote (which is related by Vieyra) be true, there is hardly any fact in his life which does more honor to his heart.

LETTERS ADMONITORY.

We published last week extracts from a number of letters received in response to our circular of last autumn. All these expressed unreserved approval of the objects and work of the Association. But we have also received a few letters which mingle admonition and criticism with approval. To this we do not object. We rather invite it. The admonitions of true friends are often the most valuable aid. And there is so much hearty friendship manifested towards the free religious movement by the writers of the following letters, that we print their letters with pleasure, and bespeak a thoughtful consideration of their words. Especially would we call attention to the admonitory sentences in the first of the letters with regard to subordinating the speculative problems of religion to the humanitarian.

"NEW YORK, 30 Nov., 1869.

I have received your circular in behalf of the Free Religious Association, and herewith send you my mite. I only wish I were able to send you a hundred times $5.00 for a cause in which I feel a very deep interest.

I sometimes have a fear that some of our Radicals are making too much of their (or our) theology, as if converting men to that were the same thing as converting them to all that is good in human character; whereas it seems to me that it is quite possible for men to be convinced of our radical ideas, and full of zeal against Orthodoxy, and yet be far below the average standard of Orthodoxy in all that pertains to noble manhood. . . . If our faith does not make us better men than our neighbors, it will be in vain that we offer other demonstrations of its correctness. I may be wrong in all this, but really it does seem to me that we are giving too much time and attention to speculation, criticism, etc., and too little to practical things."

At the same time our friend will agree, probably, that there is an advantage in holding truth rather than error, even if persons are equally humane in character and conduct. And our friends of a speculative turn of mind will claim that they are only searching after truth, which, when found and accepted, must by and by have a practical effect in the improvement of society.

The writer of the following letter makes a plea for the spiritual aspects of truth as well as for the practical.

"AUGUSTA, Me., Dec. 10, 1869.

Enclosed you will find contributions for the Free Religious Association as follows. [In aggregate $15.] I find many friends to the Association who decline having their names entered as members. I am glad that the Association is to be represented in THE INDEX, for which I am now forwarding subscriptions for myself and a few others.

I hope in the ideas put forth by Free Religionists, real religion, piety, something for the heart and spirit, will have a large place. We need assurance of a personal, self-conscious Being at the centre of things, and next to this that of our own continued conscious existence. I am afraid the world generally cannot be brought to a high plane without this. I am afraid everything that can be called religion or morality will be lost in chaos without it."

The writer of the following, as he had explained the previous year, wants the Association to do a vigorous, aggressive work against the popular theology and its ecclesiastical organizations.

"SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Dec. 29, 1869.

I received a circular letter from you a few weeks ago, asking money for the Free Religious Association. I send you one dollar enclosed to pay my membership fee, which is all I want to spare now. I made a small contribution to the Treasury of the Association last Spring at the annual meeting, and hope to be able to do more hereafter.

I am not satisfied with the work done by the Association, but its mere existence is worth something."

A UNIVERSAL BIBLE.

We heard recently a piece of information which led us to hope that we shall have by and by, and perhaps before very long, a Bible of Universal Religion; that is, a collection, in one volume, of the best things in the sacred writings of all religions. Such a book is greatly needed, and the age is fast ripening for it. It would be immediately adopted by many religious societies for devotional reading in their public services. And we believe not a few Christian people, and people still attached to other specific religions, would heartily welcome it, and find in it good nutriment for faith and morals. The new science of comparative theology is disclosing the riches of the spiritual utterances of human nature under all forms of civilization and religious development; and though it is probably true that the proportion of pure gold to dross is much larger in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures (it certainly should be so, historically considered) than in the Scriptures of other religions, yet this does not prevent our searching for and putting to use the gold that actually lies in the strata of these other faiths. As was said by Blanco White,—"Gold might be miraculously drawn from the bowels of the earth, but its miraculous origin could not raise its standard when put into circulation with other gold." Truth is the test of all moral and spiritual utterances, and not the place where we chance to find them. As a slight specimen of what may be drawn from the ancient Hindu Scriptures as an aid even to modern devotion, take the following sentences recently read in the ordinary Sunday service of a church in Massachusetts, selected from Mrs. Child's quotations from the Vedas. But these were selected, it will be said, from much that is not so moral or spiritual. True; but what judicious Christian minister, who is not enslaved to the letter of the Bible, does not select from the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures his lessons for pulpit reading?

"Any place where the mind of man is undisturbed is suitable for the worship of the Supreme Being.

There is one living and true God; everlasting, without parts or passion; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the Maker and Preserver of all things.

That Spirit, who is distinct from Matter, and from all beings contained in Matter, is not various. He is One, and He is beyond description; whose glory is so great there can be no image of Him. He is the incomprehensible Spirit who illuminates all and delights all; from whom all proceed, by whom they live after they are born, and to whom all must return. He is the ruler of the intellect, self-existent, pure, perfect, omniscient, and omnipresent. He has from all eternity been assigning to all creatures their respective purposes. No vision can approach Him, no language describe Him, no intellectual power can comprehend Him.

He who inwardly rules the sun is the same immortal Spirit who inwardly rules thee.

That all-pervading Spirit, which gives light to the visible sun, even the same in kind am I, though infinitely distant in degree. Let my soul return to the immortal Spirit of God, and then let my body return to dust.

Preserve thyself from self-sufficiency, and do not covet property belonging to another.

The way to eternal beatitude is open to him who without omission speaketh truth.

If any one assumes the garb of the religious without doing their works, he is not of the religious. Whatever garments he wears, if his works are pure, he belongs to the order of pure men. If he wears the dress of a penitent, and does not lead the life of a penitent, he belongs to the men of the world; but if he is in the world and practises penitential works, he ought to be regarded as a penitent.

No man can acquire knowledge of the soul without abstaining from evil acts, and having control over the senses and the mind. Nor can he gain it, though with a firm mind, if he is actuated by desire for reward. But man may obtain knowledge of the soul by contemplation of God.

To a man contaminated by sensuality, neither the Vedas, nor liberality, nor sacrifices, nor strict observances, nor pious austerities, will procure felicity.

A wise man must faithfully discharge all moral duties, even though he does not constantly perform the ceremonies of religion. He will fall very low, if he performs ceremonial acts only, and fails to discharge his moral duties.

The soul itself is its own witness and its own refuge. Offend not thy conscious soul, the supreme internal witness of men! The sinful have said in their hearts, None see us. Yet the gods distinctly see them, and so does the Spirit within their own breasts. Oh, friend to virtue! that Supreme Spirit, which thou believest one and the same with thyself, resides in thy own bosom perpetually, and is an all-knowing inspector of thy goodness or thy wickedness. If by speaking falsely thou art not at variance with that great Divinity that dwells in thy own breast, go not a pilgrimage to the river Ganges, nor the plains of Curu; for thou has no need of expiation.

The sacrifice of a thousand horses has been put in the balance with one true word, and the one true word weighed down the thousand sacrifices. No virtue surpasses that of veracity. It is by truth alone that men attain to the highest mansions of bliss. Men faithless to the truth, however much they may seek supreme happiness, will not obtain it, even though they offer a thousand sacrifices. There are two roads which conduct to perfect virtue; to be true, and to do no evil to any creature."

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

IMPROVING CREATION.—Carl Vogt mentions, in a scientific article in the New Free Press, an anecdote which Leopold Von Buch told at the Congress of friends of Natural Science in Erlangen. Over the entrance of the former Botanical Garden, in Munich, the following inscription was placed:—"What God the Lord has scattered all over the earth, the Elector Max has caused here to be planted in order according to system."

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR.

To the Friends of Free Thought, Free Speech,
and a Free Press:

The Boston Investigator.
VOLUME XL.

Truth, Perseverance, Union, Justice, the Means; Happiness, the End; Hear all Sides, then Decide.

The Fortieth Volume of the BOSTON INVESTIGATOR will commence on the 4th of May, 1870, and, as heretofore, it will be devoted to the development and promotion of Universal Mental Liberty. To the maintenance of this great principle, without which we cannot possess and extend that genuine and untrammelled Free Inquiry which is the direct road to Truth, the INVESTIGATOR will continue, as formerly, to lend its undivided and constant support. The field it occupies in the domain of thought and action, though deemed a dangerous one by its opponents, is yet to us a realm which contains all the facts of Nature and Reason; and under the inspiring influence of this true and healthful Philosophy, we have all the incentive we need to go forward with our publication. We are thoroughly satisfied with the Liberal or Infidel principles we maintain, believing that they lead to Truth, and promote in every rational and practical way the best interests of Humanity in this world. We deal with facts, not fiction—with earth, not heaven; and wish to substitute for the vagaries of eternity and faith the substantial realities of reason and knowledge, and of every demonstrated or conceivable improvement which appertains to time and sense.

Assisted as we shall be through the coming year by an able corps of contributors, we are confident we can make the Fortieth Volume of the INVESTIGATOR acceptable to the Liberal public, and therefore we solicit their continued aid and support. We again ask our old friends who have stood by us so long, and cheered us in our arduous task by their kind patronage, to stand by us through the coming volume; and should any new friends be disposed to enrol their names on our list of subscribers, we think we can furnish them a paper which will prove in all respects satisfactory. At least, this will be our continual study and highest ambition.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

THE MANAGEMENT OF CHILDREN.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Dec. 26, 1869.]

"Let the history of your domestic rule typify, in little, the history of your political rule: at the outset, autocratic control, where control is really needful; by and by an incipient constitutionalism in which the liberty of the subject gains some express recognition; successive extensions of this liberty of the subject, gradually ending in parental abdication."

HERBERT SPENCER, "Education; Intellectual, Moral, and Physical," p. 214.

"Great severity of punishment does but very little good. Nay, great harm, in education; and I believe it will be found that, ceteris paribus, those children who have been most chastised seldom make the best men."

JOHN LOCKE, quoted in the above.

There is no plant, capable of cultivation, which is not improved by it, both in beauty and productiveness. Any gardener will testify to this fact. Some plants, like the exquisite may-flower or trailing arbutus, cannot be cultivated at all; they perish unless left in their native wilds. But if they can survive transplantation, they are bettered by the care bestowed upon them, and frequently attain a state of development which may at last constitute them new species. "Not a few botanists," says Mr. Darwin, [Animals and Plants under Domestication, vol. 1, p. 368], "believe that several of our most anciently cultivated plants have become so profoundly modified that it is not possible now to recognise their aboriginal parent-forms."

Such, then, is the power of cultivation, when applied to the vegetable kingdom. Can any one doubt its equal power when applied to man? Nature is plastic wax in the hands of intelligence; nay, so great is the dependence of all organic life upon its surrounding conditions, that a change in these conditions inevitably brings a corresponding change in its development. Man is no exception to this universal law. Not only his body, but also his mind, will be developed or stunted in growth by external influences. Hence the exceeding importance of education. What is education but artificial cultivation, directed by an intelligent, or too often by an unintelligent, purpose? Every schoolhouse in the land is a monument to our faith in the power of culture. In fact, civilization is the result of culture. The difference between the savage and the civilized man is due to the simple fact that, while the savage is in a state of wild nature, the civilized man is in a state of cultivated nature. The infant savage, as has been proved by repeated efforts, cannot be educated to the same degree as the infant offspring of civilized parents. Blood tells. That is the modicum of truth which lies at the root of the world's aristocracies. The improved stock has always a great advantage over the wild stock, whether we consider plants, animals, or men. Democrat as I am, both by conviction and instinct, it is impossible for me to deny that good parentage, that is, descent from virtuous and intelligent ancestors, creates a great presumption in favor of the future virtue and intelligence of a child. What is loosely termed the "Caucasian race" is itself in this sense, an aristocracy,—that is, an improved variety of the human race. So much as this I cannot honestly refuse to concede to him who denies the equality of man. I cannot refuse, for instance, to admit that most of the negro races are inferior, in point of actual development of brain, to most of the white races. Fortunately, however, I see in this natural inequality of brain-power no reason for any inequality in respect to civil or political rights. That is a wholly different question; and when it comes to that, I side with the most ultra abolitionist. All I say is, that cultivation improves the human race, as it improves the horse or the rose; and that long cultivation at last results in the improvement of the breed.

Every home, therefore, is a garden, and every parent is a gardener. Intelligence or ignorance with regard to the best modes of culture,—fidelity or neglect with regard to their proper application,—will infallibly betray themselves in the varying quantity and quality of the fruit. I wish that parents might always realize the full amount of their responsibility. A human infant is the tenderest and most beautiful plant ever entrusted to the care of human hands. Its future depends in great measure on the cultivation it receives. When I see how little thought is bestowed in most families on the rearing of children,—when I see how frequently they are left to "come up" of themselves, without even the anxious and conscientious attention which is bestowed on a fuchsia or geranium,—I seem to see a garden left untilled, unwatered, and unweeded. It is ignorance, thoughtlessness, or pre-occupation in other cares which is the cause of this neglect, I am glad to believe, far more frequently than indifference or criminal recklessness. Often, also, the influence of general intelligence and conscientious intentions is neutralized by some mischievous theory or some infirmity of will or temper in the parents. But is it not true that a well-ordered household, in which the children are carefully trained in accordance with wise principles, is rarely to be seen? Surely there is no subject of profounder importance than home-culture, the wise and right management of children. Not only does it involve the welfare of the little ones themselves, but also the welfare of future generations; for, hard as it seems to realize the fact, these rosy and romping little boys and girls are to be the fathers and mothers of posterity. The good consequences of our care, and the evil consequences of our neglect, will perpetuate themselves for ages after we are buried and forgotten; and if there is a duty which ought to be ever present to our minds,—which ought to engage our most earnest reflection and enlist our most active and persistent energies,—it is the management of our children. My morning's subject, therefore, ought to interest every one of you who is, or may be, a parent; and although my own experience may seem to you too limited to give me a right to speak upon it, it is, perhaps, not presumptuous for me to say, that my limited experience, fructified by very earnest and very continuous thought, has given me convictions which I ought to state. Take them for what they are worth.

The one great and dominant idea which, in my opinion, should guide us in all endeavors to educate the young, is that of natural development. The child's nature is to be developed, not repressed or changed. The individuality should be sacredly respected. The utmost we should aim at is to call out every latent capacity in its due proportion. The object of all wise education is to direct and train, not to mutilate or prune; for there is no faculty in human nature which is inherently bad. Every vice is the perversion of a virtue,—the diseased or misdirected activity of tendencies which, in themselves, are good. Faults are either the exuberance or defect of powers which could not be spared. Children will differ greatly in their natural faculties; but no faculty should be suppressed,—every faculty, on the contrary, should be encouraged or discouraged in exercise according to the relation it bears to other faculties. The natural bent of character, if not absolutely vicious,—a case which rarely happens,—should be the guiding hint in education. Nothing is gained by attempting to force all into a single mould. To thwart a child in a strong natural proclivity may be the extinction of a fine genius,—possibly the blighting of what would be a noble and useful life. Nature fearfully avenges such insults. Home government, therefore, ought never to be the application of a straight-jacket. Chinese women and Flathead Indians,—the former cramped in feet and the latter distorted in skulls,—are miserable specimens of human beings. The healthy development of all natural powers, therefore, is the object never to be lost out of sight in managing a child. Without this clear general conception of the object to be sought, education will prove a failure worse, perhaps, than absolute neglect.

The new-born infant is a little animal, with only animal wants. We need not be too sentimental about it. The babies are all cherubs, if we may believe their mothers; but, if they are, cherubs think first and last of their meals, which would hardly be inferred from their traditional deficiency of stomach. It is the body which first needs our care,—it is the senses which first manifest themselves as active faculties. The perceptive powers of the mind are the earliest to unfold themselves; the affections, the conscience, and the reason are of later development, and, as I believe, in the order named. It is, of course, impossible to assign a date for the manifestation of these various faculties; their beginnings are very obscure, and hard to trace. But, in the rough, the order of development appears to be, first, the purely organic life, then the perceptions of the senses, then the affections, then the conscience, and lastly the reasoning powers. In the management of children, therefore, appeal should be first made to the senses, and afterwards to the affections, the conscience, and the reason. Family government based upon this principle will, I think, be most in conformity with nature, and lead to the best results.

The notion, however, seems to have found no little acceptance in some quarters, that family government, in the strict sense of the word, should be reduced to a minimum, if not altogether abolished,—that parents have scarcely any right to enforce obedience,—that they should forbear to exercise authority, if authority cannot be exercised without compulsion, especially physical compulsion. This notion, based on the idea that children have all the natural rights of adult humanity, has given rise to what is practically (though not yet reduced to a theory) a "children's rights movement;" and I think it has led to results which are highly unfavorable to the wise education of the young. Have children, from the first manifestation of an independent will, the same right of self-government which belongs to grown men and women, or are they rightfully subject to parental government? If the former is true, coercion is an injustice,—if the latter, coercion is both just and necessary. Inasmuch as this question underlies all other questions concerning the management of children, it deserves to be carefully considered. If parental government is a mistake,—if children should be left to govern themselves, and learn for themselves the natural consequences of natural laws, without help or interference from their parents,—then the whole idea of "management" is out of date. Self-government is an admitted right of the adult,—is it also a right of the child?

My answer is in the negative.

In the first place, self-government is not even a right of the adult, if in the exercise of his freedom he infringes on the rights of others. Society in this case assumes, and possesses, the right to govern him by penal laws,—to take away his freedom, and thus protect itself by putting him into jail, or inflicting some other punishment. Even if, therefore, the child has the same right of self-government possessed by the adult, it is equally limited by the rights of others. Now what person, who ever came into contact with young children, has failed to see how devoid they are of any conception of the rights of others, and how habitually they infringe upon them? Granting that the parent has no more right to control his child's will than society has to control the will of the adult individual, it is nevertheless plain that the parent must continually exercise this right of control over his child, or else allow other persons to be continually annoyed and disturbed by him. Every one who has ever been in a house where the children are uncontrolled, will appreciate the force of this argument; and every one who has ever watched children at play together will appreciate it with almost equal vividness. Surely the child's right of self-government cannot include the right of making himself a pest to every grown person about him, and a tyrant to every child he plays with. Yet the only remedy for all this lies in the continual abridgment of his right of self-government by parental control.

But I deny that the child does possess the right of self-government enjoyed by the well-behaved adult, because no child, left wholly to itself, ever was or will be well-behaved. On what is this right in the case of the adult based? Clearly on his having a developed conscience, reason and will, which prevent him, even in the absence of external constraint, from injuring or annoying other people. But the conscience and reason of the child are not developed, and do not prevent him from thus trespassing on the rights of others. His will is strong even to imperiousness, while his conscience and reason are exceedingly feeble. I maintain that the right of self-government depends on a certain degree of development of these latter faculties. The very young child, as I said before, is an animal, with no more right of self-government than an animal; the child of somewhat larger growth acquires somewhat of this right, which should be respected; but it is not until maturity that his right to self-government becomes perfect. When the youth has learned to govern himself by conscience and reason, his right of self-government is then complete. Every human being begins his existence without any right of self-government at all, because he is utterly unfitted to govern himself, even in matters that concern himself alone: he ends, at maturity, by having this right unquestioned, because he has learned how to exercise it. Clearly the transition from one extreme to the other must be gradual. That is, he must begin by being under parental control; he gradually acquires the right of self-control, and then enters the arena of life, a free and developed human being. However unpopular with "young America," I fear that this conclusion cannot be escaped.

The ground I take, then, is this,—that it is the duty of the parent to control his child, until the child is fit to control himself; and that the parent's control should be directed constantly to the one aim of developing in the child this power of self control, by developing in him his natural individuality. To teach the child how to govern himself by conscience and reason, and, in order to carry out this purpose, to educate his conscience and reason as rapidly as Nature permits, without resorting to any hot-house culture,—this I conceive to be the duty of the parent in the management of his offspring.

So far, then, as management is concerned, the relation of parent to child can be tersely stated. The parent is to his child an external conscience and reason, whose authority continues until the child's internal conscience and reason are developed. Precisely in proportion to the degree of this internal development, the rightful control of the parent ceases. Parents too seldom perceive this natural termination of their authority; the habit of command, re-inforced perhaps by the love of power, blinds their eyes to the growth of the child's mind, and they usually err in prolonging unduly the period of subjection. The law, I think wisely, prescribes a limit beyond which parental control shall not extend, namely, the age of twenty-one years. This limit is sometimes too early, sometimes too late; but, on the average, is perhaps about right. The wise and conscientious parent, however, will not be wholly guided by the law; if his child earlier becomes mature, he will relax all control before the legal limit is reached. He will never forget that his only right to govern his child depends utterly on the child's inability to govern himself, and that to prolong his authority unduly is simple tyranny. Furthermore, to use his authority for any selfish purpose,—for any purpose but the child's best good,—is to be false to his duty as the child's external conscience and reason. He has no right to domineer even over his own flesh and blood; he is a trustee of power, and is responsible to his child for its right use. The obedience he exacts is only the child's first lesson in self-control, obeying the external conscience and reason blindly before he can obey the internal conscience and reason with open eyes. Obedience always implies exercise of the will; and it is by obeying the command of his parent that the child's will acquires the power to obey the command of the inward monitor at a future day. Obedience, therefore, is the child's peculiar virtue,—his schooling in the grander virtue of spiritual self-control. Thus the wise and good parent purposely commands that he may at last cease to command; the dutiful child unknowingly obeys that he may at last cease to obey.

There can, I think, be no greater disaster in the home, no greater mistake in the attempt to manage a family, than the failure of the two parents to make their authority absolutely one. The household in which, for any reason or from any cause, a conflict of authority exists, is the saddest of sights to one who wishes well to children. There should be earnest conference between parents concerning the best methods and objects; there should be perfect unanimity in the general system of management adopted by them. It is unspeakably better to make some mistakes in unison, than to let the minds of children get confused as to whom they shall obey. Let the father and mother speak with one voice, if they wish the voice of either to be respected. Appeals from one to the other should never be permitted. Where this is allowed, wretchedness of many kinds ensues, and management gives place to mismanagement.

But, made as human nature is, it would be expecting altogether too much to suppose that, even when both parents are perfectly agreed, and their commands are dictated by wisdom and goodness, children will always obey. Disobedience is sure to occur. What then? What means should be used to secure obedience? Should we ever resort to corporal punishment, or rely on "moral suasion" alone?

In the first place, there should be as few commands as possible,—fewer and fewer as the child grows older. The fewer commands, the fewer acts of insubordination. This being premised, I should say that the means used to secure obedience must vary with the age of the disobedient child, with his natural character, and with circumstances. In every case, appeal to the highest motive that will secure the desired obedience; but, I say it earnestly, secure the obedience. If the appeal to reason and conscience, and the appeal to affection, and every other form of moral suasion fails, I have no hesitation whatever in saying, that the appeal to the dread of pain is necessary. There is too much mawkish sentimentality on this subject. Resort to the infliction of physical pain is often the most merciful course. I should never resort to it, if the child were old enough to feel his self-respect injured by it; but long before this period comes, if rightly managed, he will have passed beyond the age of disobedience. Obedience to a parent who is always firm, uniform, and kind, soon becomes a habit which acts like instinct; and wilful disobedience becomes obsolete. There is nothing worse than "breaking a child's will," as it is called; but this hateful result can be accomplished by other means than castigation. The infliction of physical pain, if unaccompanied by any signs of irritation, will not beget irritation; it will come as the natural consequence of wrong-doing, as the pain of a burn follows the touching of a hot stove. No disgrace should attach to it. Immediately afterwards the child should be completely restored to favor. The wrong has been done; its consequence has followed; all is over. There is no degradation, no wounding of self-respect, in a punishment thus administered. There is more cruelty a hundred-fold in many penalties thought less severe. It is only in the very earliest years that physical pain need be inflicted, if the right method of treatment be adopted at the outset. The lesson of obedience should be learned so early, that the learning of it shall be forgotten. Begin with the infant of a year old, or even less, and teach it the meaning of a simple "No—no!" The slightest possible rap on the little hand conveys the meaning. Let the tone be impressive, but very gentle, without any symptom of displeasure; let the experience be repeated as often as is necessary, and the lesson is soon learned thoroughly. For a long time let that be the only command of any kind; and for a still longer time, let the only commands be SIMPLE PROHIBITIONS. The distinction between a negative and a positive command is very important; for the one can be easily enforced, the other not. The foolishness and wickedness of attempting to enforce a positive command were frightfully illustrated in the conduct of the minister, named Linsley, who a year or two ago beat his little child of three years old to death for refusing to say its prayers! One such case as this may well shock every one at the bare idea of punishing a little child. But observe the difference between a positive and a negative command. No power on earth could make the little creature repeat a word. But suppose you were quietly to say "No—no!" when a child of a year old pulls pettishly at the table cloth. He repeats the action. Without betraying the least irritation, you rap the mischievous little fingers two or three times; perhaps the offence and its inexorable consequence are repeated. How soon will it take the child to learn that pulling the table-cloth and touching the lamp produce equally certain and equally disagreeable sensations? He will not be angered in the one case more than in the other; he will cry in both cases. But you have an enormous advantage. He has to take the initiative, and draw upon himself the distasteful consequence. You are thus certain of imparting your lesson, at a very moderate cost of pain to your little disciple. He learns that "No—no!" if unheeded, means a smart in the fingers, and stops very soon whenever he hears the sound. The habit of obedience is thus commenced: it is founded without any hurt to self-respect, any excitement of angry emotions, any sense of degradation; and by degrees the habit of obeying prohibitions can be made to cover also positive commands. Within the first four or five years of life, the relation between parent and child can be well established; and it will never occur to the child to disobey. There is no "breaking of the will" here; the child's will acts in other directions freely, without any collision with that other will which is, for the time being, its conscience and reason. As fast as the ideas of right and wrong develop, or can be developed, the parent throws the child on its own decision, seeking to influence him freely in favor of the right; and in proportion to his success, he forbears to command at all. Thus the child's supreme allegiance is gradually transferred from the outer to the inner conscience; the power of self-control gained through obedience to the one enables him to obey the other; and thus, by a natural growth, the little follower of another's will becomes a free moral being. But I believe this result cannot, at least in most cases, be accomplished, unless the process is commenced in early infancy; and the only means of commencing it is by the infliction of a little physical pain. It is not the pain, but the disgrace, of corporal punishment, that makes it in later years a poison to the soul; and this is not felt at all, at the early age I refer to, if the penalty is properly administered. Immediately after it, the child will have a kiss all ready for the parent; not the slightest sign of a ruffled temper will appear; and the tears will not have dried upon the tender cheek, before a smile will restore its sunshine to the little face. Let the parent only refrain from harsh words, tones, and looks, and, I deliberately assert as the result of my own experience, it is the truest kindness to the little one to adopt the method I have very imperfectly sketched.

But let me mention another and equally important part of the wise management of children. Firmness of will is not enough, wisdom is not enough, uniformity of treatment is not enough, consistency in always prohibiting or always permitting the same things is not enough, scrupulous adherence to a promise or a warning is not enough. Unless the parent overflows with affection for his little charge, and, what is more, makes him feel this all the time, I believe failure is inevitable. The young child needs to dwell perpetually in the sunshine of parental love; and it must be honest sunshine, ever radiant,—not candle-light struggling through a bushel-basket. If this sunshine never fails him, there will be no sting in the occasional corrections. The evil of a little physical pain is nothing, if the moral evils which too often accompany it and make its poison are absent. Uniform gentleness and kindness and tenderness, combined with a firm will and uniform method of treatment, cannot but ensure the best possible results. Your child should count on the fulfilment of your word, as you count on the operation of a natural law; and if you accompany your word with a kindly manner, it will never occur to him to be angry or vexed, even at a prohibition. Let him live in an atmosphere that develops his affections,—an atmosphere genial and healthy and favorable to all the manifestations of childish delight and glee. Be his playmate, at least occasionally,—show sympathy with his pursuits and sports, and do not be too "dignified" to share them,—take time to cultivate that relationship of confidence and love which can only be established in early childhood, and which, if neglected, you will long for with bitterest regret by and by. Where this is fostered, collision between your will and his will never need take place. You, the outer conscience and reason of your child, will be regarded by him as his best friend; and in this deep, deathless attachment lies the best safeguard you can give him against the manifold temptations that await him in after years.

SOME CONSIDERATIONS FOR PROTESTANT CONTROVERSIALISTS.

[From the New York Nation.]

The controversy about the Bible in the schools is rapidly spreading. In this State it promises to furnish, before very long, one of the most exciting political issues we have ever had, owing to the unscrupulousness displayed by the Catholics in obtaining from the Albany Legislature large votes of money—amounting in the present year to half a million of dollars—for the support of their schools. Their success in this sort of operation, too, not unnaturally renders them less disposed than ever to aid their Protestant neighbors in the discovery of a modus vivendi on the school question. They do not care whether Bible-reading in the public schools is abandoned, and, indeed, show some signs of being as much opposed to it as the High Protestant party, who consider the Bible-reading one of the most important parts of the school curriculum. As long as the Bible is read at the opening of the school exercises, and is read for the reasons assigned by Judge Storer in the recent decision of the Superior Court in Cincinnati, and by some Protestant clergy, the priests have an argument in favor of separate Catholic schools such as nothing else could furnish them. All the good which, according to the Protestant view, a Catholic child gets by listening to the Scriptures is, according to the Catholic view, so much poison; and, the more eager Protestants show themselves for its administration, the more frantic are Catholics bound to become in escaping from it. The reason, too, is obvious—it is drawn from the very constitution of the Catholic Church. She is, on the Catholic theory, the sole teacher of truth. Nothing which reaches the soul through any other channel, however respectable, is instruction in righteousness. She knows nothing of morals apart from dogma. She recognizes no man as good who is not a good Catholic. The Bible is a good book in the hands of a priest, expounding it in the manner directed by the church; in the hands of a layman, and, above all, of a heretic layman, it is nothing but a snare and stumbling-block.

There are some Protestants, we are sorry to say, into whose heads it seems impossible to hammer a proper comprehension of the Catholic position on this subject, and who, nevertheless, as might be expected, insist on taking a heated and active part in the pending controversy, and never open their lips without making a settlement of it more difficult and more remote. They talk of the Bible as if it occupied the same position in Catholic that it occupies in Protestant theology, and as if the differences between the two churches were simply differences of interpretation—the fact being that the Catholics do not, and never have acknowledged it as a final authority, or as the sole basis of the claims of their church to the respect and obedience of Christendom. All they draw from it is corroborative evidence as to the correctness of the church's own account of its origin and history. For instance, Christ's well-known declaration to Peter, so often cited in support of the supremacy of the Roman See, they treat simply as a corroboration of what has "always, everywhere, and by all" been received and acknowledged as Catholic truth, or, in other words, of ecclesiastical tradition. It is this distinction which gives an air of positive self-stultification to a large number of the arguments in favor of compulsory Bible-reading in the schools, which one hears both from the platform and the bench and the press. Nobody has a right to attack a position, or, at all events, nobody can attack it with success, without understanding it. It is melancholy to listen, as one has nowadays sometimes, to a long string of reasons for not yielding to the Catholic view, every one of which helps to confirm the Catholic in his view—the Catholic being the only person who needs to be convinced, or who is giving any trouble.

The very first thing to be done by Protestants before engaging in the warfare which is now apparently before them, is to strengthen the one weak point in their own case, and that is the removal from the State education of the one feature which prevents it being really and truly secular education simply. It must be remembered that it is not enough that Protestants should acknowledge that the common-school education is simply secular; Catholics must acknowledge it; and Catholics cannot be expected to acknowledge it, on the Protestant's own showing, as long as Bible-reading forms part of it. The very tenacity with which Protestants cling to it they justify on the ground that it is religious instruction, and, of course, religious instruction of a Protestant complexion; without it, Judge Storer says the children would be "left without a God in the world;" or, in other words, without a religious creed. The whole system of school instruction should be such that no sect can say that it contains anything likely to help to spread the tenets of any other sect. It will, doubtless, still be said that schools in which no religion is taught are "godless schools," but this we cannot help; for the "godlessness" of schools, all sects have a ready remedy by teaching religion at home, or by clerical instrumentality out of school hours. If a system of this kind does not satisfy all, nothing will. No nearer approach to a satisfactory system of State education can ever, in the existing condition of the human mind, be made; and when we have got it into working order, we have the consolation of knowing that it cannot be assailed by any argument which does not touch its very existence; that, in short, there is no pretence or deception about it.

The second thing Protestants have to do, if they mean to bring this controversy to a reasonable and satisfactory settlement within the lifetime of the present generation, is to avoid talking of and treating Catholics as necessarily enemies of free government, and their religion as incompatible with true allegiance to the State in which they live. One hears a good deal of this just now from the pulpit as well as from the platform, and it is both misleading and inexpedient. Nothing can be more absurd, for instance, as well as unfair, than Mr. Hephworth's performance in citing the Pope's Encyclical and the appended Syllabus by way of proving that Catholics are not likely to be good citizens, or are likely to bear divided allegiance, or, in case of a conflict of authority, to side with the Pope rather than with the American Government. All that the Encyclical proves, in the eyes of the best observers, is what the proceedings at the Ecumenical Council are proving every day, that the Pope is a very simple-minded and somewhat fanatical old monk, in the hands of very bad advisers, composed, in the main, of Roman Jesuits. The anxiety the most enlightened Catholics feel about his course is due not to their fear that he will reduce the Catholic world to slavery, but to their fear that he will alienate the Catholic world from religion itself. Nothing can be more preposterous than the assumption that any government is afraid that the Syllabus will weaken its authority, though many Catholic governments do fear that it may complicate their relations with the Catholic clergy, already made very troublesome by the process of secularization through which even the most bigoted Catholic States are passing before our eyes. In no countries is the Papal authority so weak at this moment as in Catholic countries—countries which the Pope has had for ages at his feet. If the Syllabus be a laughing-stock in France and Austria and Bavaria, and even in Spain, and the greatest Catholic theologians of the European continent make light of Papal pretensions, it is a little too bad to have it used as a red rag in American pulpits to rouse the Protestant bull into fury. The Catholic laity have never in any country, or in any age, accepted the ecclesiastical measure either of the province of the church or of the dues of the State, and they are not likely to make a beginning in the United States. But there is one striking example in history—perhaps the most awful of all the lessons history has to offer—of the folly of treating Catholics as if they did believe all the worst and wildest doctrines that could be dug out by controversialists from the ponderous tomes of Catholic theologians and canonists, and that is Ireland. Ireland is what she is to-day because Protestant England has persisted for two centuries in legislating for her on the hypothesis that everything the Pope said, Irish Catholics believed, and that any order he chose to issue they would surely execute. We all see the result; pleasant and successful, is it not?

We do not believe that a true and satisfactory reconciliation of the Catholic Church, as its doctors define it, with modern society will ever be effected. This reconciliation is a dream in which many great Catholics of recent times, from Lammenais to Montalembert and Father Hyacinthe, have sought refuge from distressing internal doubts and conflicts; but one has only to read even a moderate statement of the church's claim, and take even an imperfect view of the condition of modern States, to feel that a dream it must for ever remain. The relations of the Catholic clergy to the State must always be, as they are now, marked by hostility and aggressiveness on the one side, and suspicion on the other; but this furnishes no excuse for attempts to drive the Catholic laity into their arms, by pretending to regard them as being in all things the humble and submissive sheep the priests would like to have them. The way the Catholic Church gets along in modern society is by letting the laymen manage politics pretty much as they please; and the only true and statesmanlike course for American Protestants to adopt in dealing with the Catholic laymen is to treat them as men like ourselves, permeated like us by the modern spirit, treading the solid ground of utility in dealing with secular affairs, ready to argue and open to conviction, and not as a parcel of devotees, led by the hand by the monks, fed on legends, and requiring to be followed to the polls by a spiritual director.

We say this on the supposition that no Protestant gentleman has as yet discovered any short and speedy method of getting rid of the Catholics, and that we have to live with and make the best of about 8,000,000 of them, who, if not educated or attached to the Government somehow, are pretty certain to furnish a considerable supply of robbers and murderers, and a disturbing element in our politics of no mean power. But, if anybody has hit on any plan of rooting them out before the next Presidential election, of course we are willing to see it tried, provided it is not too inhuman or treacherous, or does not involve the slaughter of young children. These can, of course, be saved, and brought up in the common schools as indomitable Protestants.

A reverend Father, speaking in the Ecumenical Council on a certain topic, and urging the adoption of "gentle measures," confirmed his views by quoting the popular axiom,—"Melle capuntur muscæ"—flies are caught in honey." "Very true," a French bishop remarked, "sed ut occidentur—but in order that they may be killed."

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"The rationalists of to-day need the thoughts of to-day. Lord Herbert of Chesham, Spinoza, Diderot, D'Holbach were great thinkers, but they lived too long ago. I find that really radical men don't seem to be much interested in THE INDEX, after all. They don't find arguments addressed to them, but to Christians, and nothing but piety and goodness. We can't feed on piety when in doubt about a future life. You will find plenty of strong thinkers, if you will only begin on the philosophy of the future that is to supersede Christianity. Delay is dangerous. If THE INDEX becomes a merely 'moral paper' devoted to goodness, you may write its epitaph soon. 'Whom the Gods love die young,' or 'It was too good for this world.' I did not mean to have been and gone and done it, but the thing is said and it is so. I believe that it is safe to tell you disagreeable truths."

—"Dear Sir: Enclosed please find two dollars for which please send me that worth of INDEX No. 7 for distribution among our Unitarian friends and others. I have read your INDEX from the first number, and am more and more pleased with its dispassionate tone, and its evident clearness and fixedness of purpose. Yours, I think, is the first open declaration that you stand outside of the organization called Christian, and I gather from something you have said that you are surprised at the large number of persons who have already manifested sympathy with your cause. You will be more surprised still that so large a body of independent thinkers exist even in sectarian New England, and that they have held their peace so long."

—"In this city some 25 copies are taken by mail, and some 25 copies sold at the News Room of ——— & ———, and these news dealers desire me to ask you to increase their order to thirty copies, and I hope in a short time to be able to get a hundred subscribers to THE INDEX in this city."

—"THE INDEX furnishes my mind with that reading which it has long craved. We have many Free-thinkers in this place, and I shall work for the circulation of your and other kindred papers. The time has come for spiritual freedom to be discussed, and your boldness suits me."

—"I consider THE INDEX the best paper I ever took, and I have taken a good many. Your paper is full of matter emanating from principle and not policy. Truth is of more importance to you, it seems, than popularity."

—"Enclosed is one dollar to pay for a few specimen copies of THE INDEX. I feel so much interested in your paper that I should be glad to see it sown broadcast over the land. If I were able, I would subscribe liberally for distribution, but I am not."

Poetry.

THE SEA-GULL OF COHASSET.

Rough with scars of windy wars,
Broad and jubilant and free,
White with sails as heaven with stars,
Heaves the many-glittering sea.

How the lion breakers rage—
How they roar among the rocks—
How they leap against their cage—
How they toss their foamy locks!

Ha! 'tis but the ocean's sport;
Dumb his stormy thunders sleep.
Who the giant's wrath would court,
Who would battle with the deep?

'Neath that writhing web of waves,
Thick with many a knotted snare,
Glowing deep in weedy caves,
Death, the spider, hides his lair.

Thou that o'er the mad unrest
Hoverest long on pinions rash,
Wilt thou trust that guileful breast?
Shoreward let thy white wings flash!

Ah, poor trifter, thou art lost;
Idle warnings, idly spent!
There thou floatest, billow-tost,
With the froth for monument.

What! again dost cut the air?
Tempt again the treacherous blue?
Look—unscathed those pinions fair
Dip, and soar, and dip anew.

Shame, my soul, that falterest here
Shuddering at life's billowy sea!
God is vaster than thy fear;
Plunge—the waves are safe for thee.

Plunge—the fresh breeze sings no dirge;
Plunge—the timid 'tis that dies;
Yet, when gasping in the surge,
Soar awhile to breathe the skies.

The Index.

APRIL 16, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

We call the attention of our readers to the advertisements of liberal papers in our advertising columns. There are so many of them, that we could not do them justice without devoting our entire editorial page to the pleasant work of pointing out their excellencies. We shall have to extend this work somewhat, and content ourselves at present with a word of general appreciation (none the less sincere because general) of them all. From time to time hereafter we shall doubtless find something to say in detail. Meanwhile we wish success to these and all other journals which are devoted to the advance of liberal ideas and sentiments, or the promotion of human progress in any direction. So far as we can speak from personal inspection, we believe that these papers are doing well the work they aim to do; and we think that all are needed to express the many-sided nature of man.

Correspondents and contributors will greatly oblige us by being brief. Several communications, otherwise excellent, have been already excluded from our columns by their excessive length. We have no room to print long articles; but we are very glad to receive short and pithy ones. Regarded as projectiles, a bullet does more execution than a pillow.

THE PROPOSED FUSION.

Mr. Tilton, editor of the Independent, recently sent us a circular, proposing a fusion of some sort between the National Woman Suffrage Association and the American Woman Suffrage Association, and requesting signatures from all in favor of the movement. To this circular we cheerfully put our name. We are not of those who consent to a compromise where principle is concerned; neither are we of those who join parties with no better nucleus than persons. If these two Associations represent two principles, we have failed, after diligent inquiry, to discover the fact. Under the meal of reconciliation, therefore, we suspect the presence of no compromise-cat. If we had not been positively assured to the contrary by some who ought to know, we should have said that a difference of opinion formerly existed relative to the Fifteenth Amendment. As to this, we believed in uncompromisingly demanding suffrage for all men and all women, both black and white,—in postponing the just claims of nobody to the equally just claims of somebody else,—and in rejoicing heartily over the recognition by law of any just claims whatever. We were for sacrificing neither negro suffrage to woman suffrage, nor woman suffrage to negro suffrage; we were for demanding both, and accepting that first which we could get first; we thoroughly disapproved any and every attempt to seek the victory of one through the defeat of the other, believing that it was neither the negro's hour nor yet woman's hour, but then and always God's hour for justice to all humanity.

But whether there was or was not a conflict of principles between these two Associations formerly, there can be none now. The Fifteenth Amendment is adopted, and we rejoice in it. Negro suffrage has come first,—then woman suffrage must come next. Bury every dead issue, and work for issues that are still alive. Let us speak a word of friendliest warning to those who are called "leaders" in the woman movement. No one is a "leader" in it,—the people are led by ideas of which the most gifted are but servants and followers. Whoever for personal reasons opposes the measures which are best for accomplishing the common end in view, will secure no following. Let Andrew Johnson be proof of this. Union is better than disunion among the friends of reform. Totally unconnected with either Association, but yet a friend to both, we wish to see machinery simplified and strength concentrated,—how, we do not care, provided it be honestly and honorably done. If the prominent workers in both Associations shall show enough magnanimity to sacrifice all personal antipathies or ambitions for the common cause, the great heart of the people will honor them both with increased admiration and love; but if they persist in keeping asunder those whom the love of human rights hath joined together, let them make sure that their reasons will bear the test of daylight. If there are causes for forbidding the banns, let the world know them; if not, let the marriage proceed!

Since writing the above, the result of the proposed Conference at the Fifth Avenue Hotel has been made known. Nothing definite in the direction of union seems to have been accomplished. What is wanted is an organization which shall be regarded as national by universal consent. It is plain that neither of the two existing organizations is so regarded, as a fact; nor do we see how matters will be bettered by putting a third into the field, so long as the existing organizations maintain themselves each with an exclusive claim. Three fragments are worse than two. We deprecate further division, at any rate. Instead of making haste to start a new association, it will be infinitely better to discuss thoroughly the reasons, or alleged reasons, against consolidation. If there is no fundamental difference either in principles, objects, or methods between the two present organizations, they ought to unite for the sake of the common good. WHY NOT?

We do not care to go into any discussion of the past. We feel little interest in partizan criminations or recriminations. The success of the cause of Woman Suffrage will be indefinitely postponed, if its avowed friends can not heal this breach and work together in harmony. Mistakes have been made,—we do not deny that; but let them pass. We move the previous question. Unity must be had. It will be had before long. A contest without ideas will never interest the American people. Is the idea of "delegation" at the bottom of the controversy? The only important point to be secured is, that one Association shall be recognized as in fact representative of the entire movement; and then, whether delegated or not, it will unite the scattered forces of reform. We are prepared to join such an Association as this; but we propose to enter into no internecine warfare. We wish well, heartily well, to all the prominent actors in both Associations; and we shall feel deeply chagrined and disappointed, if we find ourselves unable to co-operate with one, without thereby being set down as an enemy to the other. We are determined to co-operate with both or neither; and in this we speak the sentiment of multitudes. Thousands will stand aloof, perplexed and apathetic, just so long as the friends of woman are playing the comedy of the Kilkenny cats. Let us all rise to the dignity of our cause, forget the past, ignore all local or personal or partizan jealousies, and join hands in good earnest for the full realization of the American idea. While a single wrong remains unrighted, let us defer the luxury of petty feuds. Better disband both Associations, unite in a new call to the country, and gather a convention in form and in fact and in popular estimation representative of the whole movement, than suffer microscopic grievances to paralyze and distract. The organizations are worth nothing except as tools. The tools may be theoretically perfect; but if they won't work, throw them away, and get better!

We are sorry that Rev. Mr. Vickers, the able champion of an unsectarian school system against Bible bigotry, has been defeated as a member of the Board of Education in Cincinnati. The blows he deals have been too weighty not to make the enemy wince; and they have sought revenge at the polls. But we suspect that his guns will not easily be spiked; and when the time comes for a cannonade, we advise the obstructives to slink behind their Hagans-and-Storer sand-bags, and listen for the report with cotton-wool in their ears.

Mr. Herndon's promised article on President Lincoln's philosophy has not yet been received; but we hope soon to lay it before our readers.

The soul's ideal is a glimpse of God.

"IN WHOM WE LIVE, AND MOVE, AND HAVE OUR BEING."

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir:—Will you permit one of the "all" who believe in the above formula, to respond to Bro. Willard Twitchell's query, as to "any relationship between God and man on such a theory?"

1. The terms "homogeneous" and "heterogeneous" do not appear to be involved in the main question, since both are equally consistent with distinctness of being.

2. Let two analogous facts illustrate the possibility of the truth designed to be expressed in the formula.

An animal literally "lives, moves and has his being" in the air that surrounds him and fills him, and upon which all his vital functions constantly depend. Withdraw the air, and disintegration, death, annihilation of the "animal" ensues, with as much certainty as any effect ceases when its cause ceases. And yet will any one claim that air and animal life are identical? or deny individuality of either, because one depends so intimately upon the other?

3. By friction on the end of a match you produce what is called a flame. Now this flame "lives and moves and has its being" in Oxygen, or more accurately in the union of Oxygen with some of the elements composing the match. Withdraw the Oxygen, and the flame is instantly annihilated. Yet the Oxygen and the flame are not identical. Now if all the conditions upon which the continuance of animal life and the flame depend, were constant and unending, both would "live and move and have their being" forever in those conditions. And the "relationship" between the phenomena and the conditional causes would be quite distinct, and not difficult of apprehension. And the individuality of the phenomena would be none the less for their being recognized as mere attributive and dependent entities. Suppose then that our Souls, being in and of themselves just what our consciousness says they are, are still only attributive of and entirely dependent upon the great Infinite Soul of the Universe, would not the formula still apply to them, even while we predicate distinct personal individuality of both the finite and the Infinite Soul? Substantive being is no more distinct, personal or individual, than attributive being. And God's spiritual being, although the very quintessence of all attributes, is infinitely substantive, while all material entities are attributive and dependent.

With sincere thanks for the weekly blessing of THE INDEX, and deep-felt sympathy with the holy cause you are promoting, I am

Yours for Freedom and Truth,
J. B. BRIGHAM.

THE LIFE BEYOND.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 29, 1870.

EDITOR INDEX:—In a thoughtful letter from her English home, published in a late INDEX, Frances Power Cobbe speaks of a wide and earnest questioning touching the Immortal Life, as a marked feature of our day. Continents cannot limit or oceans divide human thoughts and hopes and aspirations; now it is the reaching out and up in one direction, now in another, making true that later Scripture of Tennyson:—

"Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

Closely linked with the question that presses on us all, "What can we do here and now?" is another, "What are we, and what is our destiny?" As we best solve the last, we can best, in practical life, answer the first; and, on the other side, there is deepest philosophy as well as tenderest entreaty, in that word of the Testament, "Do the works, and ye shall know of the doctrine whether it be true or not."

The day is passing, never to return, when books, and creeds and priests can give answer of authority to overawe the soul; and the day is coming, most blessed since the world began, when we begin to see and feel that the more complete and noble our ideal of man's powers and possibilities here and hereafter, the grander human achievement, the higher human excellence, and the wiser all reforms.

The world is weary of abstract theory and dogma, unsustained either by facts of the senses or truths of the soul, and often bluntly defiant of both, and therefore science is justly inexorable, and religion seeks truth and not authority.

But what of this questioning of the Life Beyond? Is not the very questioning proof thereof?

As justice and freedom, by their wiser appliance to life, build the strong foundations of our best civilization, and as their existence in the soul and growth therefrom for ages prove their verity, so does the lasting existence and growth of this idea of immortality put its verity beyond dispute. Yet it may be said that each truth of the soul has its facts, patent to the material and external sense as complement and confirmation; as for instance, that the safety and comfort to the body that justice and freedom bring, are such confirmation. I grant this, for soul is behind the senses, and subtle forces mould and govern all substances.

There must be, then, fact and phenomena telling of the Life Beyond to the senses. It is not possible that such life, so long asked for and hoped for and believed in, is not real. Infinite Wisdom and Love do not thus mock the soul, but give all it asks and more than it can imagine.

Where are the facts, and why have they not been made open as the day to all? As men and nations are still half blind to the reality of Justice or the safety of Freedom, can we marvel at blindness to facts, all along the ages, touching Immortality?

Only in the light of the thoughts and experiences of to-day, can we take the strange dreams and mystic warnings and startling apparitions whereof the record comes to us out of the realm of miracle and superstition, and see them as proofs of wondrous spiritual powers in our human nature, and as messages and visitations from beyond the grave.

I once sat by the bedside of a sick girl in a western city, while her physician magnetized her to ward off a brain fever. With her eyes closed in quiet sleep, she told calmly and simply of the then arrangement of furniture and occupation of persons in a house hundreds of miles East, correctly, as we soon learned. It was a clairvoyant or spiritual sight, active when the material eye was closed, and suggested a spiritual organization within, compared to which the wonders of the five senses are dull and poor indeed.

At different times and places, with different persons, sometimes total strangers, I have had tests tangible to the senses, satisfactory to reason and judgment, and sweetly pleasant to every tender sympathy, of the presence of friends and loved ones whose mortal remains have mouldered with their kindred dust for years. Facts have been told me which I thought mistakes, but found accurate, and my own thoughts have been read as though I wore a window over my heart.

Such experiences have been shared by a "cloud of witnesses," and the most wonderful and convincing of these things have never been told to the world. Many of them are guarded by the sanctity of the love and friendship living beyond the grave, and revealed to those here.

I but suggest the momentous importance and interest of this great field of thought and fact and spiritual laws. Our researches therein will not only give us light from the Life Beyond, but will teach us of those subtle powers and influences for good or evil, for health or sickness of body or soul, which ever come and go from man to man the world over, of the benefits of which we can be receptive, and against the ills of which we can be positive and strong.

It is not enough for "free religion" to break the bonds of authority. It must be, and aims to be, constructive as well, and for its work of helping to build up a truer life it must have more perfect knowledge and truer ideal of this nature of ours, human yet divine, touching the material and perishable on one side, and yet closely allied by its most vital and interior and creative elements, with the spiritual, the infinite, and the immortal.

With this suggestion allow a word of friendly criticism. I do not object to classic learning and thorough knowledge of the Past. I would recognize the value of that variety of taste and culture which goes to make up our varied knowledge, and it is well in religious matters that there should be ripe and thoughtful students of old systems and sacred books; but do we not lose much by looking at the Present too little?

It may be said that clairvoyance and spiritualism tax patience and offend taste sometimes by crudeness, but it is equally true that they feed the ripest thought, thrill the tenderest sympathies, and gratify the most cultured and fastidious taste in their higher phases. I know scholarly and liberal men, who turn from them with a shade of disgust to their wordy old chronicles, wade through weary pages of musty speculation or cumbrous folly, to get a single rich thought, and accept it as ample pay for their toil.

While the hopes of men turn to the Future, why should so large a share of study and thought be given to the Past, that the living wonders of the Present are well nigh unknown and of course unappreciated?

The latest science, the best intuition, the finest clairvoyance, the most convincing fact, and the sweetest and wisest word purporting to come from those "not lost but gone before," must be compared and tested. Thus shall be established a knowledge of human powers and an abiding confidence in Immortality, based on facts which confirm the soul's desires, and a wisdom and harmony of life on earth such as, in the olden time,

"Priests and prophets waited for,
And sought, but never found."

Allow me to thank you for making THE INDEX so catholic in spirit and frank in statement, and to wish you abundant success.

Truly yours,
G. B. STEBBINS.

THE RADICAL CAUCUS.

Boston, March 17, 1870.

Editor of The Index:

DEAR SIR,—I notice the letter of Rev. Wm. Sharman in your issue of March 12, and also your editorial note saying that you would "be glad, as the case now stands, to receive a statement of the true reasons for the position taken by the radicals" at the radical caucus of the N. Y. Convention of Unitarians in October, 1868. I was present, and a most interested observer, at the little impromptu meeting in question; and I am glad of an opportunity to give you the information desired, and, at the same time, to express what has ever since been burning in my heart,—an indignant sense of the contemptible and temporizing attitude of the radicals on that occasion. After examining your letter in the Radical for February, 1869,

I do not know precisely what you may mean by saying that the radicals voted "not to meddle with the preamble lest they should imperil their positions." If you mean that they were afraid of losing their pulpits and being set adrift without any "visible means of support," I agree with Mr. Sharman that no such motive was explicitly stated in the caucus, nor even, to my knowledge, so much as hinted; and the character and record of many of the men there gathered, makes such a supposition improper and uncharitable. But if by "positions" you mean the ecclesiastical position in the Conference which the radicals were striving to bring about, the liberal propositions they were aiming to maintain, then your remark is strictly true, the fact being that it was decided by almost unanimous consent not to demand all that we thought desirable lest we should thereby miss obtaining anything. And as all the gentlemen there were presumed to be collected concerning matters of principle, this seemed to me then, and seems to me now, that deliberate sacrifice of "principle for principle's sake" which is called justifying the means by the end. I endeavored to point this out to the caucus. I tried to show, as well as I could in a few hurried extempore remarks, that if, by any device of new articles to the Constitution or by any ingenuity of statement, the Conference could be led to adopt in their integrity great principles to which it had declared itself fundamentally opposed, this would not be conversion, but deception, or at least a mere misunderstanding; that (as the event justified me in saying) the attempt would fail, as it deserved to; and that, even if it succeeded, such a success could be of no real, and especially no lasting, value, while the manner of it would convert it into a positive moral loss and bring deserved contempt upon a noble cause. I, therefore, if I remember aright, advised a direct onset under the old issue,—no doctrinal preamble of any kind. I believe, however, that I found no brother-in-arms among the radicals at that time. I was defeated, in the kindest but most decisive manner, by Rev. Robert Collyer, by a sally which was exceedingly illustrative of the temper of the meeting. "Brother Blake," said he, "when I was a little boy and wouldn't eat my piece of bread, my mother spread molasses on it, and then I eat it." The melancholy result of this policy need not be detailed. The Conference proved to be no child, and soon discovered the important bread under the molasses; nay, it found a cunning way to separate the two and get the molasses without the bread. Rev. Messrs. E. E. Hale and J. F. Clarke were induced to play the good grandma (this by special vote of the caucus, if I remember rightly) and coax the refractory "hopeful," but some elder playmates (Drs. Osgood and Lothrop) who "knew a thing or two," gave the wink in time, and the astute urchin broke away from grandma.

It was decided in the caucus, or in the committee appointed by it to draw up the new "article" to be offered to the Conference (of which committee also I was a member), that none save a certain three or four gentlemen, of well-known conservatism or of very conciliatory radicalism, should appear in support of the measure; and thus it was attempted further to take the Conference off its guard by keeping out of sight and out of all apparent connection with the matter the men who were, in reality, the most of all identified both with the general movement and with that particular occasion of it.

It was in vain. The cause which was so ingloriously fought went ingloriously down. I do not mean to say that nothing was gained. On the contrary, the agitation and discussion were gains in themselves, for it had been industriously circulated for months previously that this troublesome matter should be tabooed altogether in the Conference in order that the denomination might peacefully consider how to grow rich. It is my belief, also, that the Conference as a whole showed a decided superiority, mentally and morally, to that of Syracuse two years before. The tone was decidedly more healthy. But it is not the less true that the radicals sustained a defeat both technical and practical; and it is also true that they richly deserved the defeat which they sustained. They attempted to procure the adoption of a most far-reaching and weighty measure by a method intended to cloak, or at least keep in the background, its full scope and significance. Some members of the radical caucus freely expressed their opinion that the measure, thus engineered, would go through triumphantly, perhaps without opposition. The humiliating result showed how little their unfaithfulness to principle had fitted them to be judges of men. I contend that a high morality required that the issue should be made as plain as possible and the whole significance of the question brought out, by every means that could help the understanding of a popular and untrained assembly. Then victory, if attained, would have been conversion, for which any one might well have dropped a tear of devout gratitude; defeat, if suffered, would have left the principle like a day fair and pure throughout, and covered with its supreme glories just when it fades into night.

I was born and bred a Unitarian, and I cannot cut off my heart from them. I find myself clinging with a strange affection to the church to which my mother led me and in which my beloved minister, now living, taught me my first intelligent principles of religion. But if I cannot cut off my heart from them, I have cut myself off from them and from all dogmatic names or parties of whatever kind or significance. It is the dogmatism, the credo, that I object to. Am I theologically a Christian? No; because, being a simple theist, I do not believe the historical Christian theology, nor any mitigated form of it taught to-day. But if I were a Christian in belief, I would not be a Christian in party, nor consent to the statement of my own dearest views in a creed to be signed by any one else.

Therefore, if I believed every word of the Unitarian preamble, I should still be only in part a Unitarian, differing on the most fundamental point of all, namely, the rightfulness of making the authoritative statement. This is the most fundamental point, because the importance of a principle that influences the pursuit of truth is greater than that of the rejection or reception of all other beliefs put together. I find myself mentally and morally better situated apart from the Unitarians; and I am glad to escape also from the neighborhood of that obeisance to the chief seats in the synagogues which seems to be expected among them. If I do not now care less than ever about the ecclesiastics who lord it over the denomination, it is because I never cared anything about them at all. But I must say here, in justice, that, although I speak of Unitarians collectively and as represented by the Conference, there are very many of them who deny the rightfulness of such a description of them. They say that they are not represented by the Conference; that they cannot be represented by any Conference; that the Conference states just the views of its own majority, and no more; that, so far from accepting these views, they believe the Conference has turned traitor to both the logic and the traditions of Unitarianism; that they are greatly disgusted with it, and indignant beyond expression at the insolence of ecclesiastical pretension and dogmatism which has flourished under its shelter. Now, I sympathize largely in this protest, because I know how long it takes to make large popular bodies, untrained in mind and occupied with business affairs, understand the full bearing of the points in dispute. Much of their action may be explained by their wish to be let alone in quiet, and their belief that the points at issue are empty ecclesiastical quarrels interfering with what alone their training and circumstances fit them to understand and partake in, namely, practical (external) work. I think there is an injustice in fixing the odium of the Conference, without qualification, on Unitarians collectively; and yet I must say that, if there was much decided disgust with the Syracuse Conference, it ought to have manifested itself vigorously at New York; and if another Conference perseveres in the same direction, Unitarians cannot complain of being judged by their only national manifestation of themselves; or, at least, they will be chargeable with moral indifference as to the attitude of a church which yet they persist in clinging to. That Unitarianism, considered in its present position, is an attempt to mingle incongruities, and that all such apparent mixtures are merely slow separations of the incongruous principles, is illustrated in this case by the departure of the liberals to independence, on the one hand, and such mortifying denouements as Dr. Osgood's coquetting with Episcopacy, on the other.

My separation from the Unitarian position, as represented by the Conference, is final and ultimate, a matter of principle. My separation from the Unitarians themselves is mainly a consequence of my present circumstances. I can imagine situations in which I might be required to consider whether my duties to others would not oblige me to forego the mental and moral advantages of my separation, and enter again into the (for me) effete and disagreeable contest. For I do not agree with your positions, Mr. Editor: your scruples are too fine for me. You seem to me as much ridden by your conscience as most people are by their creeds; or rather, to express it better, your conscience adds too much concern about external or apparent consistency to its concern (the nobility of which in you I should not be the last to recognize) about internal rectitude. I would as lief be a minister in a Mohammedan mosque, or preach in a Chinese temple with an idol over my head, so long as I might in freedom speak what I had in freedom thought. Liberty is a personal matter; I should not compromise mine by representing myself individually in a place or by the side of forms in which others were representing themselves collectively.

I beg pardon for the length of this letter, and subscribe myself sincerely your friend,

J. VILA BLAKE.

["Internal rectitude" which does not lead to "external consistency," i. e. conformity of conduct to deliberately adopted principles, is simply purity of intention unaccompanied with purity of action,—a pitiable spectacle. We are quite willing to be thought morbidly conscientious, if that means a fixed purpose of making the outer life harmonious with the inner life, even in little things. Looked at in this light, we are quite sure that Mr. Blake would heartily agree with us, for no one more desires to attain this harmony than he. If he were invited to don the garb of a Buddhist priest and officiate as such in a Chinese joss-house, we suspect he would not be quite content to preach New England rationalism, even in perfect liberty, to those who still thought it necessary to insist on the paraphernalia of idolatry. His keen sense of æsthetic propriety, apart from all moral considerations, would make him feel offended at the conformity required. The morally becoming is a part of our ideal. And we declined to advocate Free Religion as a Christian minister in a Christian church, because such conformity would be morally unbecoming. Was our scruple "too fine"?—Ed.]

A debating society at Lyons has been for some time engaged in the discussion of the question: "If you had to have a 'bile,' where would you have it?" and its members have finally decided, "on another fellow."

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Mrs. Caroline M. Severance, West Newton, Mass.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The third annual meeting and general convention of the Free Religious Association will be held in Boston on the 26th and 27th of May. The Committee of Arrangements are hard at work preparing for the meeting, and mean, if possible, to make it of greater interest than either of the previous meetings. According to the Constitution, a session for the annual business of the Association will be held on Thursday, the 26th. On Friday, the 27th, a general convention, with three sessions, will be held in Tremont Temple. The plan of this Convention is to be somewhat different from that of the last two years. The Committee think it desirable that the discussions should be held more closely to some specific points, and will try to secure this result. They do not think it worth while to continue the plan on which it has been attempted to conduct the morning session of the Convention the last two years,—that is, of making it representative of various sects and shades of theological opinion. It was very difficult last year to find any speaker who would appear as the representative of any phase of Orthodox Christianity. Several persons of different Evangelical sects were invited, and even urged to use the opportunity of our platform to state the convictions which were dear to them, but for one and another reason all declined. Rev. Mr. Jones, who gallantly defended the Orthodox view of Christianity, was a volunteer, to whom the Committee most gladly gave the place which had been offered in vain to others. This year the Committee will not take any special pains to invite Orthodox speakers merely because they are Orthodox. If any persons of Orthodox belief, Calvinist, Catholic, Episcopalian, or of any other sect, wish to add their word to the proposed discussions of the Convention, the opportunity will be most cordially given. The breadth and freedom of the platform are not to be abridged, though the plan of the meeting be somewhat changed.

But it is evident that there are many people throughout the country who want to know more definitely than they now know, what are the aims and principles of the Free Religious Association. And the Committee have decided to use the morning session of the Convention for specifically meeting this want. An address will be made by the President, followed by speakers expressly selected for the purpose, to the end of explaining both the theoretical and practical position of the Association and of the free religious movement.

In the afternoon session it is proposed to have a carefully prepared Essay on the question now agitating the American people in several parts of the country,—the Relation of Religion to our Public Schools,—the Essay to be followed by a free discussion on the subject for the remainder of the session.

The evening session will be used for bringing out more clearly than has yet been done, that important feature of the Association whereby it represents the universal elements of all religions and the progressive tendencies of religions towards a common ground of unity. An Essay on the Sympathy of Religions will be read, and be followed by selected speakers on specific points of the general subject.

Such is the general plan of the meetings. Further information with regard to essayists, speakers, and other details, will be given hereafter.

LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS.

The inquiry has been made whether local organizations, of which there are several in the country, formed on the general principle of the Free Religious Association, can be represented by delegates in the conventions of the latter body. To this inquiry we reply that the Free Religious Association which we here represent, and whose annual meeting is held in Boston, is an organization of individuals in their individual capacity alone. No delegate system is therefore admissible in the conventions of the Association. No credentials are read or asked for from any person who attends. There is no official connection between any local society and the general Association. Nor has the Association done anything, or proposed to do anything, directly towards forming and sustaining local organizations. It is greatly interested in these organizations. It doubtless gives an impulse, indirectly, towards their formation. It represents the general movement of which they are a part. And it belongs to the duties of its officers to keep themselves informed of these local movements; and the officers do most cordially invite correspondence and co-operation with the members of these local societies. But it is more in harmony with the principles involved in the free religious movement,—nay, more, a necessary consequence of those principles,—that this co-operation and auxiliaryship should be utterly free; that there should be no relation of subordination even in the slightest form, established between the local free religious societies and the national Association, and no membership recognized in either save that of individual free men and free women, responsible only for their own opinions and characters. At the same time, while this is doubtless the genius of the free religious movement, it is none the less but rather all the more desirable, that persons interested in local movements in behalf of free religion should attend, and take part in, the annual meeting of the general Association. And when they come, it is specially desired, for the sake of acquaintance and comparison of views, and for establishing that good fellowship which the Association represents, that they should make themselves known to its officers. They will be most cordially welcomed to all the privileges and opportunities of the Convention, and received into membership, not by virtue of any credentials they may carry in their pockets, but by virtue of that sympathy which they carry in their hearts with the objects of the Association. The article of the Constitution which defines membership in the Association covers the points here touched upon, and is as follows:

"Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations. Any person desiring to co-operate with the Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings; but an annual contribution of one dollar shall be necessary to give a title to vote,—provided, also, that those thus entitled may at any time confer the privilege of voting upon the whole assembly, on questions not pertaining to the management of business."

In the official report of the meeting of the Executive Committee of the American Unitarian Association for March, we read that "The Committee on Publications reported that a volume had been prepared for publication by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, to be entitled 'Steps in Belief, or Rational Christianity maintained against Atheism, Free Religion, and Romanism.' It was voted to request the author to allow it to be issued by this Association [the A. U. A.] and an appropriation was made for the purpose."

NOTICE.—The Reports, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869, (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS," (50 cts.) and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER, (10 cts.) can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEAVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

A GREAT SINNER.—An old negro, named Pete, was very much troubled about his sins. Perceiving him one day with a very downcast look, his master asked him the cause. "O massa, I'm such a great sinner." "But Pete," said the master, "you are foolish to take it so much to heart. You never see me troubled about my sins." "I know the reason, massa," said Pete; "when you go out duck-shooting, and you kill one duck, and wound another, don't you run after the wounded duck?" "Yes, Pete." And the master wondered what was coming next. "Well, massa, dat is de way with you and me; de debil has got you sure; but he am not sure of me, and chases dis cittle all the time."—Liberal Christian.

A night or two since, a gentleman residing on Congress street found his house in a state of extreme excitement on returning from his office, and breathlessly inquired the cause: "Why," said the wife, who was rubbing sweet oil on a burn on the baby's back, "the lamp has exploded." "Indeed," inquired the husband in anxious tones, "did the lamp explode?" "Yes, and—" "Did it waste much of the kerosene?" he cried, rushing by the wife to see if any of the fluid had been left in the stump of the lamp.—Detroit Free Press.

A boy made application of his first instructions on the sanctity of the Sabbath by objecting to the apothecaries' shop, which he saw open on that day. "But," he was told, "the druggists must keep open on Sunday so that the sick can get medicine." "Why, do people get sick on Sunday?" "Yes, just as on any other day." "Well, good people don't die on Sunday, do they?" "Certainly." "How can that be? Does Heaven keep open on Sunday?" It is needless to say that all further grave conversation on the subject was impossible.—Seaside Oracle.

There are many cool things said and done in Chicago at this inclement season of the year, but the coolest is the announcement, by the exhibitors of the Cardiff Giant, that it "has been lying in the earth for thousands of years, and completely verifies the veracity of Holy Writ." We were aware there had been a great deal of lying done in the earth for several thousands of years; but the statement that Holy Writ is verified by it is very cool.—Chicago Liberal.

The father of Dorabella recently found that little girl's chubby hands full of the blossoms of a beautiful tea rose on which he had bestowed great care: "My dear," he said, "didn't I tell you not to pick one of those flowers without leave?" "Yes, papa," said Dorabella, "but all these had leaves."

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR.

To the Friends of Free Thought, Free Speech,
and a Free Press:

The Boston Investigator.

VOLUME XL.

Truth, Perseverance, Union, Justice, the Means; Happiness, the End; Hear all Sides, then Decide.

The Fortieth Volume of the BOSTON INVESTIGATOR will commence on the 4th of May, 1870, and, as heretofore, it will be devoted to the development and promotion of Universal Mental Liberty. To the maintenance of this great principle, without which we cannot possess and extend that genuine and untrammelled Free Inquiry which is the direct road to Truth, the INVESTIGATOR will continue, as formerly, to lend its undivided and constant support. The field it occupies in the domain of thought and action, though deemed a dangerous one by its opponents, is yet to us a realm which contains all the facts of Nature and Reason; and under the inspiring influence of this true and healthful Philosophy, we have all the incentive we need to go forward with our publication. We are thoroughly satisfied with the Liberal or Infidel principles we maintain, believing that they lead to Truth, and promote in every rational and practical way the best interests of Humanity in this world. We deal with facts, not fiction—with earth, not heaven; and wish to substitute for the vagaries of eternity and faith the substantial realities of reason and knowledge, and of every demonstrated or conceivable improvement which appertains to time and sense.

Assisted as we shall be through the coming year by an able corps of contributors, we are confident we can make the Fortieth Volume of the INVESTIGATOR acceptable to the Liberal public, and therefore we solicit their continued aid and support. We again ask our old friends who have stood by us so long, and cheered us in our arduous task by their kind patronage, to stand by us through the coming volume; and should any new friends be disposed to enrol their names on our list of subscribers, we think we can furnish them a paper which will prove in all respects satisfactory. At least, this will be our continual study and highest ambition.

THE RADICAL

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

A QUAKER'S LETTER TO A PRESBYTERIAN.

BY R. S. D.

During our late interview, when we conversed on religious subjects, thee spoke rather reproachfully of the Radicals, applying to them the epithets of "broad-gauge Christians," "rationalists," and "latitudinarians." Sometimes thee dropped the word "infidel," which was very ungenerous: for thee very well knows that this term, although a mad-dog cry in the religious world, is very unmeaning,—the Mohammedans calling all Christians infidel because they don't believe in Mohammed—the Christians calling the Jews infidel because they don't believe in Jesus of Nazareth,—and the Catholics calling Jews, Mohammedans, and Protestants all infidel, because they do not believe in the Pope. As I once heard one of thy preachers say, when parrying the charge that the abolitionists were infidel, "it depends altogether on what a man is asked to believe, whether he is an infidel or not."

If I were interrogated by an ignorant person who wished to be informed as to what the term "radicalism" in religion meant, I would answer that it was the truest Protestantism,—the strictest orthodoxy (defining that word as right-thinking)—and the closest adherence to Christianity pure and simple, going, as the term shows, through the surface to the root of the subject, and rejecting everything extraneous and everything superstitious. Thee will not take offence when I say that in my judgment the class of religionists with which thee is connected, and which complacently arrogate to themselves exclusively the word orthodox, are loose thinkers, latitudinarians in their views, believing dogmas by the score on the mere ground of Authority.

The Radicals are strict constructionists. They give a reason why they accept some propositions and reject others; and in religion call no man Master. The grand question is,—what is Christianity, as defined in the primitive writings that treat on the subject? To solve this question as honest men who love the truth, we must throw authority and credulity both to the winds, and obey Paul's injunction to "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good." The Radicals believe with Luther that every man born is invested by his Creator with the inalienable right of private judgment, and that he is endowed also with the means of private judgment. To give the right but not the means of safely enjoying and exercising it, would be as cruel as the ancient lawyer, who wrote his statutes in such small characters, and elevated them so high, that people who were to be judged by them, could not read them. Reason, which judges of truth in all its departments, and conscience which judges of what is right and what is wrong, are the true attributes which make men God-like; and which constitute the standard of judgment to which Paul and Jesus both appealed in their religious teachings.

An intelligent Mohammedan or Hindu, when his mind is sufficiently aroused by a Christian Missionary to doubt the infallibility of the Koran, or the Shaster, can judge of the superior claims of Christianity only as we do, by examining and cross-examining the witnesses, and bringing the severest scrutiny to bear upon the records of the three religions—reason and conscience being the sole judges in the case.

Before I came to the West, I resided near a Presbyterian Theological Seminary; and having a fondness for religious investigation, I often attended the lectures and examinations, when my duties as a medical practitioner would allow. It was amazing to see how, in that institution, where scores of young men had come to prepare themselves to expound and defend the Presbyterian views of Christianity, the reading, lectures, and examinations were all one-sided. I noticed that the authenticity and credulity of the more than half hundred distinct documents composing the Bible was a foregone conclusion,—a conceded point,—with the students the moment they joined the institution. Coming perhaps from a "revival of religion," which was common in those days, their religion was all emotional, and they studied the "evidences," not as a man of science, investigating a question simply to know the truth regardless of consequences, but to make out a case at all events.

I especially remember going into the hall one day to hear a young man, now a leading minister of thy persuasion in one of the eastern cities, read an essay on the Deistical Controversy. He set up a grim-looking man of straw, called it by the terrible name of "infidel," put garbled statements and weak reasoning into its mouth, and then, amidst a crowd of applauding spectators composed of professor and students, made his attack upon it and brought it to the ground! I often thought, in witnessing these theological gymnastics, if a live "infidel" could have come in among them, what a scatterment he would have made!

Now who would be satisfied with the verdict of a jury, where the witnesses, in an important case of life and death were all examined ex parte, the counsel for the Commonwealth asking leading questions, the counsel for the defence asking none, no cross-questioning of the witnesses, and no sifting of the testimony by the rules of evidence? Look at the trial of John Surratt, charged with the murder of Abraham Lincoln. It took the court forty days, at an expense to the Government of tens of thousands of dollars, to examine the witnesses before the question of the prisoner's guilt could be submitted to the jury. Yet all this time trouble and expense were incurred out of regard to the life of a single man! But what is the life of a man when compared to the momentous question—whether God has revealed his will to the children of men by writers who were infallibly inspired, and whose works now compose the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments? Did thee ever know in any of thy theological schools of an honest cross-questioning of the witnesses in this case, such as is practised in the German Universities? Is not everything taken for granted?

I think most firmly that all truth is divine, and tends only to that which is good,—that all truth both in the department of Science and of Religion is harmonious, and that the best service ever rendered to Christianity has been the critical examination of the claims of the Bible, in the light of which we may find out what real Christianity is, and distinguish it from the excrescences that have fastened themselves upon it like misletoe, and hindered its natural growth. Why should we fear subjecting the Bible to the most rigid examinations? Truth, like pure gold, is not afraid of the crucible. The white heat of such a trial could not damage its true character, but would only burn off the dross and alloy that have been mixed up with it for so many generations, and exhibit the pure metal in all its lustre and value.

In my opinion the Radicals are nearer the truth of Christianity than their opponents, and they have far more worthy conceptions of God, and Jesus and his mission, and of the Scriptures, than the so-called orthodox. Look at some of their ideas:—

1. They reject the Jewish notions of the Sabbath, and adhere to the clearly taught doctrine of Jesus, and of Paul, and of all the Reformers of the sixteenth century, that to a good man all days are alike holy.

2. They reject the popular doctrine of the resurrection, namely, that the identical body which dies is the body which survives death; but hold on the contrary that, while the earthly body of a man dies, becomes disintegrated and goes back to its original elements, the spiritual being, embodying his personality and individuality, lives forever.

3. While believing in the doctrine of inevitable retribution for all who violate law, they nevertheless reject the notion of eternal hell-fire, as purely pagan in its origin, as dishonoring to God our Heavenly Father, and making his children who believe it slavish, grovelling, and revengeful in their lives. They regard this terrible dogma as the mother heresy which has given birth to the twin ideas that have ridden the world like a nightmare,—first, an infallible church as the only ark of salvation from the wrath to come; secondly, an ordained priesthood with the keys at their girdle to keep the door.

4. The Radicals reject all creeds and confessions of faith as totally unauthorized by Christ and his Apostles, as setting up a claim of sectarian infallibility, and enforcing it when it has the power with fire and sword.

5. They have also peculiar views of the character of Jesus, and of his mission,—views which, the more I study them, the more I am convinced they are correct, and destined to be received by all intelligent and good people in time soon to come.

6. They reject the popular doctrine, which thy church holds, of the plenary inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and of all that hangs to that tenet.

While it would be pleasant, if I had the time and thee had the patience, to touch at length on all these points, I invite thy attention in this letter to one only, and that is the last mentioned—the rejection of the idea of Bible infallibility.

Nearly all the churches of Christendom teach in their creeds, and their people believe as a fundamental truth, that the sixty-six books or tracts, forming the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, are "the word of God," the men who wrote them having been infallibly inspired by the Holy Spirit to do so; and that these books are the divinely appointed standard of faith and practice. To these books the Catholics add the Apocryphal writings of the Old Testament, while the Protestants reject the Apocryphal writings both of the Old and the New.

Now I submit to thee, if the Eternal God made mouth-pieces, amanuenses, of different men for the purpose of revealing to the human family a religion for their belief and practice, then there must be perfect concord between the speakers, or writers, in regard to facts and doctrines. If it can be proved that any one writer has mistaken or misrepresented facts, or that any two of them teach doctrines that oppose each other, or that are obviously not true, then the claim to infallibility must be given up, and these writings must go into the same category with other works of great, good, but fallible men, to be interpreted by the laws of criticism and to be judged by reason and conscience. I appeal to thee whether this is not fair? Then, that I may not occupy too large a field and overburden thee with argument, I shall confine myself to the New Testament writings; for what I shall prove true of them, is emphatically so of the Old Testament, that they are not plenary and infallibly inspired.

It ought to be remarked, however, as preliminary, that the claim of plenary inspiration is no where set forth in the New Testament writings themselves. The broad-gauge, orthodox people, in their loose way, have most unwarrantably imputed this assumption to these writings, just as the Pope imputes to Peter prerogatives which Peter never claimed for himself. The only passage in the New Testament that seems to teach the doctrine, is the language of Paul:—"All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable," &c., which refers to the Old Testament writings, as the New were not then in existence. My knowledge of the Greek is not as accurate as thine, but I appeal to thee whether any thing more can be proved from this text than that "all divinely inspired Scripture is also profitable," &c., making the profitableness of the Scripture the test of its inspiration. The idea that the Bible is, or ever claimed to be, infallibly inspired, is absolutely without countenance either from reason or Scripture. On the contrary, there are proofs upon proofs that there are errors and mistakes of great magnitude in that Book. I shall mention but one.

In reading the New Testament on the subject of the second coming of Christ, has thee not observed that nearly all the writers held and taught not only that Jesus would re-appear after his death, but that the event would take place in that generation? The depth of the conviction, and earnestness of the expectation, modified the whole of the ethical part of the New Testament. Hence Paul advised the people not to marry: slaves were exhorted to be satisfied with their bondage: the Christians were urged to consider themselves pilgrims and strangers on the earth, having no continuing city, and therefore were advised to be careful for nothing: a degree of asceticism and disregard of the world and of all human vocations was enjoined on the people by all the Apostles which does not at all suit the genius of Christianity as a permanent religion adapted to the slow progress of civilization, but which would be entirely proper, if, as was universally expected, the Lord Jesus would in their day make his appearance in the clouds of heaven, suddenly as a thief in the night, to wrap the world in flames, consuming his enemies, exempting his friends from the necessity of tasting death, and setting up a kingdom for his followers on the earth.

There are many things innocent in themselves and entirely proper to be enjoyed in one set of circumstances, which would be altogether inappropriate in another set of circumstances. A good hearty laugh is medicinal, and in keeping at a dinner table among friends; but who would think of indulging it at a funeral? So I find that in business, in amusements, in studies, this expectation of the second coming of Christ, when the heavens should be rolled together as a scroll, and the elements melt with fervent heat, produced a disastrous effect. For who would lay out a plan of study, or build a house, or marry a wife, or enter upon a business, or indulge in anything like amusement, if, at the cock-crowing, or in the morning, the trumpet would sound, the graves would open and let out their tenants, and Jesus Christ, surrounded by the Angels, would make his appearance in the heavens, and all the living saints upon the earth would rise and meet him in the air?

Now that the New Testament is pervaded by this doctrine or expectation, that Jesus, after his crucifixion, would immediately return during the generation of the Apostles, is proved from the following passages which I hope thee will attentively read:—

Matthew—10: 23, 1 Tim—6: 14.
16: 27, 28, Titus—2: 13.
24: 30, 36, Heb—10: 25.
James—5: 7, 8, 9.
Mark—13: 26, 27, 30, 31. 1 Pet—1: 5.
Luke—21: 27, 28, 32, 36. 4: 7.
John—21: 22, 23. 2 Pet—3: 10, 12, 13, 14.
1 Cor—7: 29, 31. 1 John—2: 18 comp. with 11: 26. 2 Thess. 2: 1, 8.
15: 52. Rev—1: 1, 3.
Philippians—4: 5. 22: 10, 12, 20.
1 Thess—5: 2, 23.
4: 14, 17.

Here then is proof cumulative and overwhelming, that so-called "inspired" writers, the "infallible" mouthpieces and amanuenses of the All-wise God, did assure their contemporaries that, after his crucifixion and ascension to heaven, Jesus would in the life-time of that generation return to the earth, surrounded by Angels, to destroy all things by fire, and to set up his kingdom. Now 1800 years have rolled by, and the event has not taken place yet!

I appeal to thy intelligence and candor whether all these writers were not entirely mistaken in their belief and teachings on this subject? And if mistaken on so awfully important a point as this, might we not expect that they would be mistaken on other points of less importance?

What becomes then of the doctrine of thy Confession of Faith that all the Scriptures are infallibly inspired, and form the rule of faith and practice? And how excessively ignorant, or exceedingly knaveish, my friend, must those preachers be, who, after eighteen centuries have brought their evidence that the New Testament writers were mistaken on this point and not inspired, still impose on the credulity of the people, and in some instances, like that of Dr. Cumming of London, make fortunes out of that credulity!

I am now prepared to offer a remark which thee could not appreciate before, namely, that Jesus himself, according to the New Testament writers, shared with the Apostles this expectation and this disappointment, as appears from the 24th chapter of Matthew, where, after a panoramic description of the second coming, he says:—"This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." Again, Matt. 16: 27:—"For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his father with his angels. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." And from Paul's account of the institution of the Supper, in 1 Cor. 11th chapter, where Christ is represented as saying:—"For as oft as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do share the Lord's death till he come."

I ought to observe on this head, before dismissing it, that "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper," as thee calls it, which is of such interest and importance in thy theological system, was "instituted" by Jesus, according to the testimony of Paul, to be observed only for a few years at farthest—"till I come." Yet the church has been observing it for 1800 years, little dreaming, apparently, that the fact contains within itself the strongest evidence, either that Jesus was mistaken, or that Paul was not infallibly inspired. For Paul says in 1st Thess. 4: 15, that the announcement he made of the end of the world in his own lifetime was in accordance with "the word of the Lord."

Now this dilemma has two horns, upon one of which thee must inevitably be impaled with the doctrine of plenary inspiration. If thee believes Matthew and Paul, then Jesus was inevitably mistaken, and uttered predictions that were never fulfilled. He could not therefore be God manifest in the flesh, but is proved to be a fallible man. If thee believes, on the contrary, that Matthew and Paul were mistaken, then what becomes of thy doctrine of infallible inspiration? Verily a man's esophagus must be of a very broad-gauge to admit of his swallowing so great an absurdity.

My veneration for the character of Jesus compels me to believe that as Paul, Matthew, Peter and other New Testament writers, were entirely mistaken as to the second coming, the event never yet having taken place Paul and Matthew were not authorized to put such words into the lips of Jesus as I have quoted. I prefer to believe that they were mistaken rather than he, especially as I know that Matthew, with the best intentions probably, put things into the lips and life of Christ which he never could have said or done: as for instance his allusion to the assassination of Zacharias the son of Barachias,—an event that occurred more than thirty years after the death of Christ, and so could not have been spoken of by him in the past tense. See Matt. 23: 35.

Now, my friend, do not commit the error that thousands of other men have committed,—of drawing too strong an inference from this established fact of the fallibility of the New Testament writers. Do not conclude that therefore the Christian religion is a delusion and the Scriptures worthless. It is only thy superstitions that have got their foundations knocked down under them by my argument. The Bible is a means to an end and not the end itself. With all its imperfections, (and candor compels me to say they are very numerous), it is the best of all books; and from among its leaves issues forth a fountain of living waters to quench the thirst of human souls. Thee knows that the books composing the present Bible were a compilation made out of a vast number of books purporting to be sacred, and that the compilers exercised their judgment in receiving some as canonical, and in rejecting others as Apocryphal. We have the same right to sit in judgment on their work. With these records in our hands, the human reason and the human conscience form the divinely appointed alembic which enables us to separate the incongruous materials and distil the truth which is so delicious to the taste.

When I resided in the east, I often heard among people of thy persuasion very severe language used against the German "Neologists," as they were called. I have since made myself acquainted with the character and services of this class of men, and hesitate not to say that their bold and honest criticism has laid the whole Christian world under the greatest obligations to them. They have brought their vast learning and ability to the examination of the claim of the Bible, or rather the claim foisted upon the Bible by the church, that it is, in all its chapters and verses, an infallible revelation from God. They have examined these writings, Canonical and Apocryphal, impartially, as they would any other documents, in the light of history, and by the rules of criticism, such as are observed in courts of law, comparing passage with passage: and they have proved beyond all question, not only that the claim of infallible inspiration is entirely groundless, but there are mistakes in chronology, in genealogy, in astronomy, in matters of fact, and in matters of doctrine. On this account all men who love the truth and believe it to be divine, and follow it upward to its source, feel grateful to these great scholars for assisting them in getting rid of their degrading superstitions, and in building their religious opinions on a solid foundation. For are we not always safe in believing what is true? Can God possibly be honored by our believing that which is manifestly false? Is his credit among men so poor that the preachers must conceal, equivocate, and lie as they do? If our reason and conscience were not given to us to find out and judge these matters which concern our religious feelings and hopes, for what were they given, I pray thee?

Some complain that the American Radicals, following in the footsteps of the German critics, go too deep, driving the remorseless plough-share through our tenderest prejudices and most cherished opinions. But I tell thee they are throwing up a soil that has never before seen the sun, and from which the next generation will reap a golden harvest of both truth and righteousness. They are emancipating men's minds from the bondage of fear and superstition, and scattering the light everywhere: and although they now receive the curses of wily church leaders who love the flock for the sake of the fleece, the day will come when they will be honored for their courage and their love of truth, by emancipated thousands.

Now, my friend, if thee is the man I take thee to be, thee will not imitate the strategy of the ostrich, which on his apprehension of danger thrusts his head into the sand, as if ignorance of harm were the guaranty of safety. After what I have said, thee cannot continue to move on in the old ruts of thought, without suspicion that thy opinions are not well founded. Thee fully appreciates Luther's great doctrine of the right and safety of private judgment, as maintained against the claims of the Catholic church. Exercise this right against all human creeds and confessions. Make thyself free from the anti-scriptural, unwarrantable tenet of the infallible inspiration of the New Testament, and, my word for it, thee will read these writings with an interest never felt before.

"I HAVE ALL THE RIGHTS I WANT."

[By T. W. Higginson, in the Woman's Journal.]

When Dr. Johnson had published his English Dictionary, and was asked by a lady how he chanced to make a certain mistake that she pointed out, he answered, "Ignorance, madame, pure ignorance." I always feel disposed to make the same comment on the assertion of any woman that she has all the rights she wants. For every woman is, or may be, or might have been, a mother. And when she comes to know that even now, almost all over the Union, a married mother has no legal right to her child, I should think her tongue would cleave to her mouth before she would utter those foolish words again.

All the things I ever heard or read against slavery did not fix in my soul such a hostility to it as a single scene in a Missouri slave-market some fourteen years ago. As I sat there, a purchaser came in to buy a little girl to wait on his wife. Three little sisters were brought in, from eight to twelve years old; they were mulattoes, with sweet, gentle manners; they had evidently been taken good care of, and their pink calico frocks were clean and whole. The gentleman chose one of them, and then asked her, good naturedly enough, if she did not wish to go with him? She burst into tears, and said, "I would rather stay with my mother." But her tears were as powerless, of course, as so many salt drops from the ocean.

That was all. But all the horrors of Uncle Tom's Cabin—the stories told me by fugitives slaves—the scarred backs I afterwards saw by dozens among colored recruits, did not impress me as did that hour in the jail. The whole probable life of that poor, wronged, motherless, shrinking child passed before me in fancy. It seemed to me that a man must be utterly lost to all manly instincts who would not give his life to overthrow such a system. It seemed to me that the woman who could tolerate, much less defend it, could not herself be true, could not be pure, or must be fearfully and grossly ignorant.

You acquiesce, fair lady. You say it was horrible indeed, but, thank God, it is past. Past? Is it so? Past, if you please, as to the bar of slavery, but as to the legal position of woman, still a fearful reality. It is not two months since a scene took place in a Boston court-room before Chief Justice Chapman which was worse, in this respect, than that scene in St. Louis, inasmuch as the mother was present when the child was taken away, and the wrong was sanctioned by the highest judicial officer of the State. Two little girls, who had been taken away from their mother by their guardian (their father being dead), had taken refuge with her against his wishes, and he brought them into court under a writ of habeas corpus, and the court awarded them to him as against their mother. "The little ones were very much affected (says the Boston Herald), by the result of the decision which separated them from their mother, and force was required to remove them from the court-room. The distress of the mother was also very evident." (See Woman's Journal, Feb. 12.)

There must have been some special reason, you say, for such a seeming outrage; she was a bad woman. No; she was "a lady of the highest respectability." No charge was made against her. But, being left a widow, she had married again, and for that, and that only, so far as appears, the court took from her the guardianship of her own children, bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh—the children for whom she had borne the deepest physical agony of womanhood—and awarded them to somebody else.

You say, "But her second husband might have misused the children?" Might? So the guardian might, and that where they had no mother to protect them. But had the father been left a widower, he might have made a half-dozen successive marriages, have brought stepmother after stepmother to control these children, and no court could have interfered. The father is recognized before the law as the natural guardian of the children. The mother, even though she be left a widow, is not. The consequence is a series of outrages of which only a few scattered instances come before the public—just as in slavery, out of a hundred little girls sold away from their parents, only one case might ever be mentioned in any newspaper.

The possibility of a single such occurrence as that mentioned in this report shows that there is still a fundamental wrong in the legal position of woman. And the fact that the most of women do not know it only deepens the wrong—as Dr. Channing said of the contentment of the Southern slaves. The mass of men, even of lawyers, pass by such things, as they formerly passed by the facts of slavery. The Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of a New England State, a man through whose hands the State legislation of years had passed, told me that he was ashamed to own how blind he had been to the legal wrongs of women, till he heard them irresistibly stated (as he said) in an argument before the Legislature by Lucy Stone.

There is no lasting remedy for these wrongs except to give woman the political power to protect herself. There never yet existed a race, nor a class, nor a sex which was noble enough to be trusted with political power over another sex, or class, or race. It is for self-defence that woman needs the ballot. And in view of a single such occurrence as I have given, I charge that woman who professes to have "all the rights she wants" either with a want of all feeling of motherhood, or with "ignorance, madame, pure ignorance."

WAS MR. LINCOLN A SKEPTIC?

[From the Morning Star.]

A long letter has just been published in THE INDEX,—the new paper edited by Mr. Abbot in the interest of "Free Religion,"—which purports to give a true account of Mr. Lincoln's religious opinions, and to discredit the statements that have represented the martyred President as a real believer in Christ. The letter is written by Mr. W. H. Herndon, for many years Mr. Lincoln's law partner, and he claims, as it is natural that he should, to have known Mr. Lincoln well from 1834 till the time of his death. He denies the truthfulness of Mr. Holland's representation of Mr. Lincoln's views, and virtually accuses Mr. Holland and Mr. Bateman,—who furnished Mr. Holland with the most important material bearing upon that point,—of collusion, misrepresentation and garbling of testimony.

Mr. Herndon's statements are surprising. He says that Mr. Lincoln read Volney's "Ruins" and some of Thomas Paine's works, and assimilated them into his own being. Volney and Paine became a part of Mr. Lincoln from 1834 to the end of his life." He adds that Mr. L. wrote a small book against Christianity, attacking the idea that Jesus was the Christ, and meant to publish it; but that a friend got hold of it and burned it. "He boldly avowed himself an infidel."

Mr. Herndon goes on to say: "He did not believe in a special creation; . . . he did not believe that the Bible was a special revelation from God; . . . he did not believe in miracles; . . . he did not believe that Jesus was the Christ; . . . when he left this city (Springfield) for Washington, I know he had undergone no change in his religious opinions. He held many of the Christian ideas in abhorrence, and among them there was this one, namely, that God would forgive the sinner for a violation of his laws. . . . He was a Theist, as we now understand that word." Mr. Herndon tells us that he knows the whole story which Mr. Holland tells,—apparently on the authority of Mr. Bateman,—touching Mr. Lincoln's avowal of interest in Christianity and profound faith in the Bible, to be "untrue in fact and spirit;" and he adds that, though he is not now at liberty to give all the evidence in his possession, he has notes of it, and "the world will sometime know who is truthful and who otherwise."

This is surely a strange state of things. That Mr. Lincoln's experience as President did much to deepen his sense of God's presence, to nurture a prayerful spirit, to vitalize his religious convictions and open to him the meaning and ministry of Christ's sympathy, so that his faith was more a power, and his devoutness more a habit during the last years of his life than ever before, is what is generally believed; but that he was an open disciple of Volney and Paine, and was shocked at the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, is what Mr. Herndon must fortify with positive and irrefragable testimony before the public will accept his statement. He seems anxious to clear Mr. Lincoln from the appearance of being a hypocrite. But if this statement were to be unqualifiedly accepted, we fear that Mr. Lincoln's eminent straightforwardness and profound sincerity would suffer a serious discount in the estimation of the American people. The testimony to the Christian faith and interest of Mr. Lincoln has come up through many witnesses and in many forms; it must be unequivocal evidence that makes it null and void.

Undoubtedly there is an excessive and mischievous tendency to quote and press into notice the sayings and concessions of men holding eminent stations, when they utter a word favorable to Christian doctrine. Their honest and unforced testimony may be used on proper occasions; but if Christianity be divine, it is not in a condition to need absolutely the prop of their consenting speech to keep it from falling into peril, and they owe it a thousand times more for its grace than it can ever owe them for their confession. If Mr. Lincoln was really a Christian, a denial of that fact is an attempt to take away the crown from his manhood, and to use his great name to hide the true Messiah's autograph from the eyes that need to behold it; if he was not, it is for Christian fidelity to say, calmly, firmly, and openly, though with appreciation and sadness, "One thing thou lackest." The Great Teacher's authority extended even over his keen intellect, and the call and the promise went with their full emphasis up to his high station and his anxious heart,—"Come unto me, . . . and I will give you rest."

COURT FOOLS.

[By Louise E. Furniss, in the Revolution.]

The Court was in turmoil! The King, the Queen, the Lord High Fiddlestick, the very Bishops, in their gowns and lawn sleeves, were all down on their knees, searching for it. And yet one could hardly blame the king. Who would not have thrown it into the fire? The wisest man in the kingdom was just dead. He had lived a century and a half; and he bequeathed the King the result, what you might call the sum total of his researches—written on a scrap of paper, possibly five inches long. Fancy! The King had expected nine volumes at least, and throwing it in a rage on the coals, the draft had drawn it up the chimney before it had time to burn.

But no sooner was it gone than his majesty began to wonder what the wisest man could have said. The mere he thought of it, the more curious he grew. So, as I say, the whole Court was in commotion, and there might have been seen the spectacle of ladies in velvet trains, judges in powdered wigs, all on their knees, groping and searching together; and, alas! in vain, for the best of all reasons.

The Court-fool had found it, and reasoned like a wiser man on the subject.

"If it be worth so much to a crowned king, what is it not worth to a poor fool like me?" So he put it in his pocket. Not the first time that the product of a wise man's life has gone to fill a fool's pocket.

On this much-lamented paper was written a single sentence—thus: "Say that you are what you desire to be, and the world will believe you." The fool read it, and pondered.

"What is it," he asked himself, "that I desire to be? A prince, of course, and to marry the princess! If I say that I am one, the world will believe me, or else what is the use of being the wisest man? If I fail, I shall only be what I am already—a fool! therefore, I am a prince! and I will go marry the princess!"

Now the princess of whom the fool had spoken was, as all princesses must be, the most beautiful and hard-hearted young woman of the period. The gates of her palace were mobbed by suitors, and as many as five or six hung themselves in despair, each day, because the princess was determined to marry no one but her superior. When the fool heard that, he pondered again.

"The princess is a wise woman, and I am a fool. She is determined to find her superior. Very good, I will be her superior."

Accordingly, when desired to wait upon the princess, in her hall of audience, he seated himself instead, saying haughtily:

"I am not certain yet that I desire to see the princess at all. The woman whom I marry must be beautiful, wise, humble, modest, witty, truthful, amiable, graceful, and madly in love with me."

Then he crossed his legs and looked up at the ceiling with such an air of indifference that the princess sent to demand who he was, concluding that he must be some great person who dared to be so uncivil, and required so many virtues and accomplishments.

"Tell her," replied the fool, "that it is of no consequence what I am or have been. A great many things are permitted a man, that would be intolerable in a woman."

When the princess heard that, she was at once convinced that she had found her superior, and they were married forthwith.

The Court-fool was now the husband of a princess, and received such honors as are paid to kings; yet he was not altogether on roses. The princess was sharp-witted, and he was constantly in danger of being found out, had it not been for the wisest man's receipt. When he uttered some folly, and the princess exclaimed "my dear!" he returned loftily, "if you had been wiser, you would have understood me better." If she was inclined to meddle in state affairs, "which is the wiser," he asked ironically, "you or I?" And as there was always danger lest she should see and hear too much, he constantly informed her that, if she wished to preserve his admiration, she must know as little as possible about out-of-door matters, and keep herself in a sort of seclusion, so that he could always think of her as something aloof and apart from every-day people and the rabble.

So a number of years passed happily for the fool, but not so happily for the princess, who hardly dared draw a full breath, lest she should do it like a common person, and so lose some of that admiration so hardly kept and so easily lost; and at last, she said to her husband:

"I am heartily tired of the monotony and seclusion of my life. As well be a picture on the walls at once. If you are a prince, I am a princess. I see no reason why I should not know something of what is going on outside, and when you sign the state papers, why I should not set my name there also. They concern me, as well as you."

The fool was troubled at once.

"You ought not, because it is not proper," he said. "I never meddle with your curl papers. Leave my acts and statutes alone."

"But why is it not proper?" urged the princess.

"Why, because no princess ever does such things."

"Time, then, that one commenced."

The fool was frightened, and relapsed into his folly.

"Then," said he, "as soon as you have once set your name to a state paper, you will rule instead of me. You will take my crown and robes, administer justice, and make laws, and I shall be only Court-fool, set to rock the cradle, to sew on buttons, to make paste, to stitch up seams."

When the princess heard that, she was much perplexed, and happening to meet her nurse, she told her what her husband had just been saying. The nurse burst into a violent fit of laughter. The princess drew herself up.

"My dear," said the nurse, "pray do not be offended. But does your royal highness consider your husband superior to yourself?"

"Consider! I know that he is," cried the princess.

"Certainly! Of course! but how did your royal highness discover the fact?"

"Why, he told me so," answered the princess, hesitatingly and surprised.

"Exactly! and he tells you now, that if you set your name to certain papers, that he will become Court-fool! Then, depend upon it, my dear, that he knows himself to be that already! and that any man who declares that he will lose his manliness, resign his privileges, exchange duties, sneak about in kitchens and nurseries, and turn fool, if his wife signs a paper, or has an opinion on state affairs, is a fool already; only he has not yet been found out."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Will you please send me the following numbers of your truly valuable paper, which I read with an ever increasing interest each week? To the searcher after Truth it seems to me inestimable, and I am anxious to send specimen numbers to a few friends, who I think will enjoy reading them, and I hope will become subscribers. Dr. J. F. Clarke, of Boston, attempted to reply to your lecture on Jesus and Socrates last Sunday evening, in this city [Lowell]. Of the merits of his performance I cannot trust myself to speak, until the indignation aroused by his coupling your name with that of Judas Iscariot has in some measure subsided. Suffice it to say, in my humble opinion, he utterly failed to appreciate your motive and spirit, as well as the scope of your ideas."

"My heart and my mind would have sent this long ago, but my purse has been the provoking lag-gard. I hoped to have sent you other subscriptions besides my own; but the rich Radicals are too undevoted, and the poor Radicals among my flock are too poor, to as yet respond to my asking. It does sometimes seem as if the Devil was richer and more generous than God. But who cares? I like the purpose and spirit of THE INDEX very much. I might criticise some of its intellectual and mechanical features, if I had time and opportunity."

"I regard your prospects of success with great interest, because of the noble stand you take in an appeal from the crude, incongruous melange of ideas generalized under the term Christianity, to a higher plane of religious culture. Your prospectus I read with great pleasure, and was led by it to expect much of your essay, and I am happy to say the first number came quite up to my expectations. If you will send me one or two copies each of Nos. 1 and 2, I will try and reciprocate the favor. God speed you in your work."

"THE INDEX fires some heavy guns and will do damage to the old ship Conservatism. Shall do all I can in getting subscribers, for I think it high time that orthodoxy with all its hypocritical forms was laid as low as its standard of moral honesty and purity."

"You must not judge of my pleasure in THE INDEX by the time that has elapsed since I received it. It is truly more refreshing to the spirit than anything I have seen for years. It finds me almost entirely responsive to the great principles of which it treats, and lifts me into a strong, pure atmosphere of thought and feeling. I have sent it to some of my neighbors, who receive it with enthusiasm. No doubt there is much fallow ground ready for the good seed. Spiritualism has broken the bonds of very many minds, and thus prepared the way for the great human church. So many minds that would not dare to reason, are driven into truth by superstition. The superstition will pass away with the novelty, but the eternal truth will remain. Last Sunday I sent the first three Nos. to an intelligent, hard-working man, who was so elated by the grandeur of the thought they contained, that he kept his wife awake half the night—questionable philanthropy—discussing mighty truths so forcibly awakened in his soul. I intend that my New Year's gift shall carry light to all who live within reach of its rays. I wish I had a dozen copies of it."

"Whatever is true, pure, and holy; whatever is elevating, ennobling, and divine, is to be found in Free and Rational Religion as 'wheat without chaff,' as 'gold without dross.' Thirty years ago, while a zealous devotee and a pulpit advocate of an orthodox sect, I saw the truth so mixed with error that I decided to throw the whole away and begin to learn the A, B, C, of truth, as the surest and quickest way of rescuing my mind from the cloud of darkness with which it had become enshrouded by a false and so-called Christian education. From that day on, I have believed nothing except as it commended itself to my understanding as true. And great has been my reward. Let the Banner of Free Religion be unfurled all over our land, and millions will flock to its standard and follow it as a guiding star, shining bright above the dark clouds of all authoritative religion."

"You see what the Liberal Christian in the liberality of its soul says of you. How any man in his senses should imagine that that region is 'sunless,' where we are pre-eminently under the rays and quickening warmth of the sun of the universe, the light and heat of the central Truth, Beauty and Excellence of all, is past comprehension. It shows clearly enough that he has never seen anything either in sun or Christ. Well, we need not fear. I shall be glad if, as I doubt not you will, you handle your theme affirmatively as well as negatively, showing how rich and uplifting, how warm and vitalizing shall be these truths when once recognized,—what large life and blessing shall flow from them, as well as how cramping and killing are the poor idolatries of book and person which prevail all around us."

"I have no doubt you must be bored with expressions of good, and ill-will, but I desire, for myself, to thank you for giving form and expression to many ideas of religion which I was vainly conscious of possessing, but which my Puritan ancestry and Liberal Christian training (I mean the church, not the paper) prevented me from following out to their legitimate results. There are many, I know, who have outgrown Christianity, but cling to it on the supposition that it is the last religious stronghold, to abandon which, is to be left in a religionless desert. To such I think your paper will be a Godsend."

"With the proper effort, no doubt 1000 subscribers could be obtained in Chicago. There are thousands all over the land hungering for just what THE INDEX is ready to furnish in a most acceptable manner. I really wish I could spare the time to do something for you in this hurly-burly, harum-scarum conglomeration of all the extremes ever dreamt of in the philosophy of the wildest city builders who ever lived. But I can't get all the time I really need for sleep and rest, so you must take the will for the deed."

IN A LADY'S ALBUM.

Thy pages lie unwrit and fair,
Fair as thine own sweet face;

Thus blank to thee life's pages seem;
Yet, as old Time speeds lighter,
May happiness be all their theme,
And Love be still the inditer.

The Index.

APRIL 23, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

In addition to our usual amount of matter, we publish this morning a SUPPLEMENT containing the New York Tribune's report of our lecture on "Socrates and Jesus in the History of Religion," together with some spicy articles on the same from the secular and religious press. The only effectual correction of their various misrepresentations would be to print the lecture entire, which we cannot do at present; while the plentiful lack of good temper evinced will correct itself in the mind of unprejudiced readers. The article from the Christian Radical seems to us very fair and manly in tone,—which, we are sorry to say, is more than we are ready to affirm of the rest. A report of Dr. Clarke's counterblast, written by one who heard it as first blown in Boston, will be found among our "Communications," and may be compared with the Lowell Courier's report of the same performance as repeated in Lowell. Mr. Collyer, in the same department of THE INDEX, brings his Scotch terrier into the field; but our canine assailant barks up the wrong tree, while his master's gun goes off at the breech.

In order not to give our readers a surfeit of our own cookery, we print on our first two pages, instead of the usual essay, a communication which would otherwise be too long for publication in our columns, but which, though not quite so radical in all points as we could wish, is excellently adapted to accomplish its purpose of staggering an Old School Presbyterian. We don't see how he can do anything but stagger.

It is necessary to repeat that we cannot take any notice of anonymous communications. Two or three have been sent to us recently which we should willingly print, if we knew from whom they came. The names of correspondents will be withheld, if desired; but we must know the authorship of whatever we publish.

Last Saturday evening Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton delivered her very interesting lecture on "Kate and Petruchio," at Hunker's Parlors, in this city. The following evening she gave an extemporaneous address—"Open the Door"—in the Independent church. The building was well filled with a very attentive audience. We were much impressed with her earnest eloquence in her plea for the enfranchisement of woman, and nearly all her sentiments found an inward echo as she spoke. Mrs. Stanton is a veteran and honored worker in a great and just cause.

"WAY, TRUTH AND LIFE."

Mr. Chadwick's little sketch of Nahor Augustus Staples, just published by William V. Spencer in Boston, is a model of biographical writing. Its delicate sympathy with the life it portrays, and its loving appreciation of all that was beautiful in Mr. Staples, have their solid basis in a fidelity of treatment that makes the sketch something better than a mere eulogy. Nothing could be more exquisite than the Preface and Dedication. Noble thoughts glow in all the pages. We are thrilled by such a sentence as this:—"The best way of finding out whether a reform is timely is to see whether it will go. The failure will be timely at any rate." The biography is more interesting to us than the sermons, though there are passages of great power in them. Mr. Staples was a growing man, and had not reached his maturity when he died. Fine and high sentiment, rather than profound thinking, strikes us as his chief peculiarity. There was an increasing manliness in his life. A few years later, he would have been chafing at the restraints of the pulpit. He would have learned to hate the vantage-ground it gives, and would have resolutely met his fellow-men on a level. The last shreds of ecclesiasticism would have fallen away from such a spirit as his in due time. What we most like in him is a certain directness and sincerity of dealing, born of instinctive faith in Nature. But we see more and more reason to believe that a distinctively theological education, even when conducted on the rather liberal principles of Unitarianism, chains the honestest soul with prejudices which must be snapped asunder before it can come back to Nature's stern simplicity. The chief interest of the little biography before us turns on this gradual self-emancipation of a true man. But the cost of such a struggle for freedom is pathetically great. Few souls are affluent enough to meet it; the majority are poverty-stricken, and grow fitted to their yoke. There is no work more worthy to awaken a magnificent enthusiasm, than that of standing as interpreter between the age and its own half-conscious aspirations. None can comprehend the vast demands, the unspoken sacrifices, or the unspeakable compensations of such a work, who has not given himself up to it body and soul. But the preparation for it is poorly made in the traditional routine of the seminaries and divinity schools. All this must be first unlearned, before the inexorable conditions of the task are met. Young ministers are brought up with "great expectations,"—filled with the conceit that they shall inherit spiritual wealth from the past. But we enter penniless into life, and must dig every dollar by which we live out of the very bowels of the earth. We must crush the quartz, and sift the sand,—or go paupers into our graves. It is the hard battles of our own thought, the wrestlings with our own sternest experiences, the absolutely truthful dealing with life as it comes, that alone can give the right to speak. All the scholastic lore of the colleges is worthless, until smelted in the furnace of the private soul. What idiocy to seek to enrich ourselves with borrowed money! That is the highway to bankruptcy. The career of this young minister, who

"By the wayside fell and perished, Weary with the march of life," would be stale and unprofitable enough, were it not that he flung aside his theological outfit, and was not ashamed to become a common laborer in the mines of truth. This is the lesson that he taught, because this is the lesson that he learned. And he is wise, whether called to speak or listen, who learns it also. We give what we earn,—no more. Thus, with an ever-varying text, Nature preaches to all alike the eternal lesson of self-help.

DR. CLARKE'S REPLY.

If we were to answer Dr. Clarke's reply to our Horticultural Hall lecture, we should fall into the same mistake into which he has fallen,—that of trusting a mere newspaper report. We never said, for instance, (as the Lowell Courier represents), that the untrustworthiness of the gospels was "generally admitted;" or that Rousseau is disqualified for comparing Socrates and Jesus "because he is not a Christian." These pleasant little absurdities are "reportorial" embellishments of our lecture. But they are all the better as a target; and we are grateful to the reporters for giving Dr. Clarke something to shoot at.

One point, however, is noticeable.

Referring to the woman's pouring the ointment on the head of Jesus (apparently to signify her faith in him as the anointed King or Christ), Dr. Clarke is reported as saying:—"He accepts her homage, not for his own glorification, but for the sake of the kind heart that prompted it—to make her glad and happy."

In his great poem (Purgatorio, XXI, 130-133), Dante represents himself and Virgil, his ghostly guide, as meeting the spirit of Statius, who, when he learned that he spoke to the most venerated poet of Rome, would have fallen at his feet to embrace them, had not Virgil restrained him, saying:—"Brother, do it not! Thou art a shade, and beholdest a shade." It was a great blunder in Dante to make the Mantuan bard so exceedingly savage to the poor ghost, and it is a strange infatuation which has made mankind for five hundred years mistake his unpardonable harshness for a dignified and beautiful modesty. If Dr. Clarke had written the Divina Commedia, how he would have changed all this!

The book of Acts (XIV, 8-18) has a story that Paul and Barnabas performed a miracle at Lystra; and when the populace attempted to offer sacrifices to them, believing them to be gods in disguise, Paul and Barnabas refused in horror to accept the idolatrous worship. What hard-hearted apostles! How much more considerate of the sensibilities of the crowd it would have been to wear their honors meekly, and humor the innocent delusion!

The book of Revelation (XIX, 9, 10) represents John as conversing with an angel, and as about to fall at his feet to worship him; but the angel checks the impulsive act of the seer, saying that he is his fellow-servant, and bidding him worship God. What a cruel angel! How this surly rebuff must have hurt John's feelings!

If retiring modesty, unwillingness to accept excessive homage, and a reverence for others which causes a blush at the sight of their humiliating self-prostration, are indeed beautiful in these representations of Virgil and Paul and the angel, would they have been any less beautiful in Jesus? Reverse the story of the spikenard,—picture Jesus as gently restraining the delirious adulation of his friend, and directing her worship whither it belonged. Who would not discern the loftier spirit?

Christianity worships its own dreams.

LETTER FROM COL. HIGGINSON.

NEWPORT, R. I., March 16, 1870.

DEAR FRIEND,—I wish to tell you with what pleasure I habitually read THE INDEX—looking forward to the time when with more capital and co-operation you can enlarge it, and make it more wholly worthy of its great principles, and your own truthful and manly spirit. The fact that the monthly Radical has been sustained so long, and has proved so much abler and more satisfactory than any of us could have expected, shows that in time a weekly newspaper, based on similar ideas, can also be sustained.

Most of all I enjoyed your "Fifty Affirmations," which seemed to me the most important statement of religious truth since Luther. Especially the statement of the relation of Christianity to Free Religion was the embodiment of what I have always thought, but never had the skill to put into words so well. The only thing which did not quite satisfy me in the whole series was the first affirmation. The definition of religion did not quite fill my ear or my heart—though I should find it hard to make a better one.

I enjoyed very much, also, our friend Frothingham's article in your last number, in which he seems to disclaim for himself and those who work with him all further allegiance with the Unitarian body. It has seemed to me for years that you and he and others were wasting effort in the attempt to bring that organization on the platform of Free Religion. Unitarianism was born a sect and will die a sect, as much as Universalism or Methodism, and it is now many years since I have ceased to take any more interest, either in redeeming or in attacking it, than if it were one of those. I remember that in coming out of Frothingham's Sunday services two months ago, my eye fell in dismay on the placard "Third Unitarian Society" at the entrance. It seemed incredible that so strong and commanding a mind as his should be willing to bear about with it even the name of this "ghost-of-improved Socinianism," as Carlyle called it. I used to feel the same about you, and must even now frankly confess that I pass by with a slight sense of weariness any passage in THE INDEX that refers to the petty and tiresome debate of the "New York and Syracuse Conventions." It always seemed to me that Theodore Parker weakened his position very much by holding to the Unitarian organization, especially after Emerson had shown how much stronger a man could become by standing alone.

You will say, does not the same reasoning apply to the name "Christian" as to the name "Unitarian"? I think it does, and so evidently did Emerson, for he equally dropped them both. I do not think I should ever wish to belong to any organization that called itself distinctively "Christian." I have held ever since I grew to manhood that this word, unless used in its vaguest historical sense, implied a personal allegiance amounting to absolute deference, such as I could feel for no human being; and it seems inconsistent for those who believe in the simple humanity of Jesus to assume such a name at all. Yet such persons are placed by sectarianism in this singular position. If they dare to call themselves Christians, they are denounced as hypocrites and bade to surrender the name. If they surrender it, they are then denounced as blasphemers, and are declared to be a great deal worse than before. I am glad to see that Lyman Abbott, in the last Independent, has the firmness to see this singular inconsistency, and the courage to do us justice.

I have thought, sometimes, that perhaps you magnified this special point of a name, and that it was better to go on our way, as Emerson has always done, and neither claim nor shun the name of "Christian." But the criticisms which your course has called forth show me that your point is well taken. Your protest is not merely a necessity of your own nature, but it will bring to a crisis the thoughts and convictions of many other minds. It is well for all of us that so important a duty has fallen into the hands of one like yourself, not likely to turn out (as have so many religious reformers) either a sensualist or a sky-rocket.

Most cordially yours,

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINS JR.

[We think that we shall not violate the confidence of our generous friend by appending the following extract from a subsequent note, dated April 10:—"I want to thank you very much for your essay on the 'Essence of Religion' in THE INDEX. It seems to me the most original, thoughtful, and weighty thing you have ever done, and is a very strong plea for the first of your 'Affirmations,'—the only one about which I demurred."—Ed.]

EXPLANATION WANTED.

To the Editor of The Index:—

In the number of your journal bearing the date of April 9th, you say, referring to Mr. Towne's letter, "Mr. Towne fails to perceive that Christianity is a great system of faith and life, having certain fundamental and essential beliefs. Orthodox believers understand this,—radicals like Mr. Towne, Mr. Wasson, Mr. Phillips, Mrs. Howe and others, slur over it." This abrupt statement is unintelligible to me. What does it mean, pray? In what respect do I "slur over" the very obvious facts you mention? On what grounds do you base the accusation? I think myself entitled to an explicit answer. Your assertion should either be sustained or withdrawn.

DAVID A. WASSON.

West Medford, April 12, 1870.

[We meant no "accusation" of any sort, and regret if our phrase seemed to imply any. We intended to say that the persons named fail to recognize the fact that a belief in the "Christian Confession" is essential to Christianity, and that no one is properly a Christian who cannot make this confession. This we think we stated, with absolute clearness in the note to which Mr. Wasson refers. The reasons for this position will be found in the series of discourses printed in the first seven numbers of THE INDEX, which we infer Mr. Wasson has not read. If we understand his recent Horticultural Hall lecture, he believes that Christianity is something independent of the Christian Confession that "Jesus is the Christ." He seems to take the ground that Paul's idea of "the Christ" was wholly disconnected from the historic Jesus,—than which no statement could be more arbitrary, or more irreconcilable with the New Testament. Whoever can read the book of Acts or the Pauline Epistles without seeing that Paul identified "the Christ" with the historic Jesus, and that this was the great burden of his preaching, certainly seems to us to "slur over"—to pass by without recognition—the fundamental idea of Christianity as an historical religion. If Mr. Wasson agrees with us in this opinion, we must confess that we do not understand the reports of his recent lecture, and do not understand what his position is. We shall be very glad to print his own statement of it in his own words; for it is very likely that the reports do not express his thought either with accuracy or fulness. But in any case, we disclaim most emphatically any intention of "accusing" Mr. Wasson of anything under heaven. He has our most unqualified respect.—Ed.]

A QUOTATION FROM CARLYLE.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—I want you to print in THE INDEX the appended paragraph from Carlyle's Essay on Voltaire, and, if you please, to make a note on it. I think the old man is right, and that, as far as you differ from him in your late discourse on Socrates, you are wrong. What do you think?

Fraternally yours,

ROBERT COLLIER.

"The Christian Doctrine we often hear likened to the Greek Philosophy, and found on all hands some measurable way superior to it; but this seems a mistake. The Christian doctrine, that Doctrine of Humility, in all senses God-like and the parent of all God-like virtues, is not superior or inferior or equal to any doctrine of Socrates or Thales, being of a totally different nature—differing from these as a perfect Ideal Poem does from a correct computation in Arithmetic. He who compares it with such standards may lament that, beyond the mere letter, the purport of this divine Humility has never been disclosed to him,—that the loftiest feeling hitherto vouchsafed to mankind is as yet hidden from his eyes."

Voltaire: Volume II, Essays. Boston. 1860.

[We did not compare Greek Philosophy with any Christian doctrine. We compared Socrates and Jesus as religious missionaries and men. The citation above given is interesting, but has no point in this connection. If there was one mistake more than another that we sought to correct in the popular judgment of Socrates, it was the ignorant and superficial assertion that he was "only a philosopher." It would be as just to call Jesus "only a caterer," because he is said to have furnished a free lunch to the multitudes.—Ed.]

COMING TO THE RESCUE.

The Rev. James Freeman Clarke has twice now, in presence of his own people, reviewed Mr. Abbot's Horticultural Hall discourse with the avowed purpose of showing, not where he agreed, but where he differed with him, in his comparative estimate of Jesus and Socrates. His task was to point out the important errors, and to examine some of the remarkable statements of this young man.

Taking the discourse, as reported in the Commonwealth, Dr. Clarke proceeded in his review to discuss it point by point. In the outset, he complained that Mr. Abbot had challenged the most eminent thinkers and critics of modern Europe as unworthy or unfit persons to sit as jurors in the case. If such men as Milton, Locke, Newton, Bacon, Leibnitz, and Descartes were to be excluded from a hearing in the cause on the ground that they were Christians, then Mr. Abbot would have to go outside of Christendom to impanel a jury. But was not the loving appreciation of Jesus and Socrates by such men, whether Christians or not, worth as much as the opinion of any man who occupied the position of mere indifference? You would not ask a man his opinion of Shakespeare if he cared nothing about the poet or his works, but would rather go to the lover of Shakespeare who had made those works his life-long study. In regard to Rousseau, whom Mr. Abbot ruled out because he was a sentimentalist, Dr. Clarke affirmed that no man of his time was a more acute and penetrating critic than Rousseau, and besides his impartiality in this instance, he had made a thorough study of the question. In his private correspondence, which was here quoted to the point, Rousseau had drawn this very parallel between Jesus and Socrates, and had summed up their respective merits in a masterly manner. It is altogether probable that, writing to a friend after the sincerity of his heart, in a letter not intended for publication, Rousseau had expressed his real feelings and opinions in the matter, and had not sacrificed the truth to his love of display, or as Mr. Abbot said, "immolated Jesus upon the altar of rhetoric." But the private opinion of Rousseau accorded very nearly with the one openly expressed in his writings, and that was to the disadvantage of Socrates. Dr. Clarke next considered the statement of Mr. Abbot—at which he expressed much surprise—that the "lack of trustworthy information" about the Life of Jesus in the Gospels, was "generally admitted." But it was "generally admitted" by all Christians, that we had as full and accurate and reliable testimony, that of eye-and-ear witnesses, in the case of Jesus, as of any other man; and it was only denied by a small circle of critics who reject the supernatural in Christianity, who cry out upon the dogmatism and the bigotry of Christian sects, yet claim for themselves an almost Papal infallibility of assertion, and belong to the school of "sacerdotal criticism." Besides if there was any "lack of trustworthy information" about Jesus, then Mr. Abbot's discourse came logically to an end at this point,—it was useless to pursue the parallel further. Mr. Clarke therefore did not "see" the magnanimity of Mr. Abbot in consenting to treat the Gospel testimony as of value.

But, n'importe. The relation of Jesus to the Pharisees, and that of Socrates to the Sophists was considered next in order. Mr. Abbot had said:—"His (Jesus') impatience with their (the Pharisees') conservatism led him into the common fault of radicals, bitterness and injustice to individuals; and his contempt for their principles passed over into indiscriminate abuse of their persons." Dr. Clarke asked for the name of those Pharisees who were personally abused by Jesus? He invariably spoke of them as a class, and as representing certain feelings and ideas in the Jewish State, which were in deep-seated opposition to the feelings and ideas of Jesus. Dr. Clarke did not know from the Gospels of an instance where Jesus abused any Pharisee personally, while he did know of some instances of personal kindness received and shown by them. But Jesus in his intercourse with the Pharisees never compromised his principles, in the least, while, but for the express testimony of Xenophon and Plato to the contrary, it would be hard to distinguish Socrates from the Sophists on many occasions. Not only did he use sophistical arguments with the Sophists, but when these arguments conducted him to conclusions opposed both to reason and morality, he refused in one instance, certainly, (vide Grote) to retract either the conclusion or the logic which led to it. [The writer does not understand that Dr. Clarke or Mr. Grote made Socrates responsible for this error in his teaching, but that it was cited as an instance of the abuse to which the method was liable, the end being not so much the manifestation of truth as an intellectual gymnastic, or a barren victory over an opponent.] It must be remembered that Socrates did not profess to be a teacher of the truth, though he "burnt over the ground" for those who were to succeed him. His knowledge, he said, was not superior to that of other men, but he did not commit the vulgar error of supposing ignorance to be knowledge—he only knew that he did not know.

While this was a merit in Socrates, and of great service in unmasking ignorance and pretension, still it was a negative merit, as to a teacher of truth. And therefore it was as natural to the Socratic method of inquiry to produce doubt in the minds of its followers, as it was natural to the teaching of Jesus to produce conviction. Neither was Jesus' method of teaching altogether formal and dogmatic, as Mr. Abbot charged, but even closely resembling the Socratic, partaking, as that did, of the freedom of conversation among friends, and proceeding by way of question and answer. This was shown in the replies which Jesus gave to people who came to him with questions, and who went away self-convicted by his answers, not given in a dogmatic tone of,—"It is so," because it is so." Not seldom he pursued the Greek or Yankee way of answering one question by asking another. Jesus showed reason and philosophy in his teaching as well as Socrates; as was said of another, he made metaphysics human, and translated philosophy into the language of the common people. His native speech was the vernacular of heaven, but, teaching on the earth, there was a due proportion of earthly metaphor to suit it to the Oriental taste and imagination. The idea that in his teaching he maintained the distinction of esoteric and exoteric, or that he locked up from the common people any knowledge or "mysteries," which he reserved for his "royal court of disciples," is unfounded and unsupported by testimony. Knowledge did not serve him or his disciples as a kept mistress, but was freely given in marriage with faith to whosoever showed himself fit or worthy to enter into such heavenly marriage. There was no duplicity in the life of Jesus, as implied in this charge of Mr. Abbot, but there was such a thing as the throwing of pearls before swine. Jesus, like a wise man and teacher as he was, had a perfect right to judge, and was in any case the only fit person to judge whether it was best to expose the highest spiritual truth to the sensual understandings of men. It was well-known, of course, that Jesus "spoke to the multitude in parables," but that did not indicate "distrust of the common people," since the "common people heard him gladly." The reason for so speaking has been already given,—in no other way could he begin to be understood. Had he spoken like a scholar, or like Mr. Abbot, then he might have been heard by scholars, but he would have been neglected by the common people. But speaking in their own language, he was heard by them, and "heard gladly." It was the same instinct of deep reason in man, which impelled the wise men of Greece to put their philosophy in a popular and intelligible form, in apologies and fables, where "more was meant than met the eye." It taught Abraham Lincoln also to couch his wisdom in quaint forms of speech, in happy "turns" of words and things, which went into men's minds and memories to stay there. This clinch in the mind which Jesus had, and Socrates had not, to any extent, corresponds to the character of the two men, and to their respective styles of teaching, as fitted in the one case to produce doubt, and in the other, conviction. Socrates' function in the world of ideas was to stimulate thought, to provoke discussion and investigation, to point the road of inquiry, to trace out paths, to hint at fresh discoveries and to find new solutions of the old vexed problems. But this eternal beating of the bush, this perpetual seeking supposed another and a different attitude towards the truth from that which Jesus habitually maintained, and was conscious of. To him truth was a possession and an eternal present. The man who sees and knows of a certainty that whereof he speaks, will adopt a very different tone in speaking from him who cautiously seeks and explores, as if feeling his way in the dark. The latter may have faith, but of a different kind from the former,—it will be the faith of doubt. And "There is more faith in honest doubt, Believe me, than in half the creeds."

This faith Socrates had.

"The faith, the courage bold to dwell
On doubts which drive the coward back,
And through the wordy snares to track
Suggestion to her inmost cell."

As a courageous doubter and seeker for the truth, and always faithful to the light he had, Socrates is an example, and the best of his kind. But the kind is of an order of intelligence below that which sees the truth and is one with it. Such declarations as "I am the way, the truth, and the life," and "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," may have led Mr. Abbot to charge Jesus with being egotistic and dogmatical. But whether he was so or not, depends upon the degree of insight to which he had attained, and on his place or position in the spiritual world. Was his place above or below Socrates? Socrates did not call himself a teacher of the truth, did not claim the truth as a possession, while on the most interesting and perplexing problem of human life and destiny, he had the courage to say that he did not know. And he was heard to lament that the gods had not sent some one to give mankind assurance of those things which he held as doubtful or uncertain. In conclusion Dr. Clarke said he believed that, if Socrates had lived to see Christ's day, he would have been among the first of his disciples.

OBSERVER.

MY DEFINITION OF RELIGION.

Religion is an effort of man to perfect himself in his moral nature. To live justly, soberly, honestly, purely. To be kind and gentle to those who need kindness and gentleness. To stand up for the oppressed and down-trodden. To be humane, philanthropic, open to conviction regarding new truth and duty. It has nothing to do with a belief in God, punishment, rewards, or a future life. If your definition of religion is correct, then the effort of man to perfect himself in mathematics, in gymnastics, in music, in any art good or bad, is religion; which, from the common use of the word, is hardly true. Let us have a full expression from your readers on this subject. If they will all be as brief as they can be, there will be room in THE INDEX for them.

Truly,

THOMAS BROWN.

CHRISTIAN VENOM.

BY T. A. BLAND.

I observe that the plain, truthful statement of Mr. Herndon in regard to the religious views of Abraham Lincoln is calling down upon his head as bitter maledictions as those hurled at Thomas Paine for the honest statement of his convictions. Protestant Christians claim that persecution for opinion's sake is peculiar to Catholicism, and they regard it as slander to accuse them of possessing the same spirit. No unprejudiced observer, however, can fail to see that Protestant Christianity has inherited this quality from her mother in an eminent degree. The Evening News, a newly fledged independent paper of Indianapolis, is edited and managed by the son of a Methodist clergyman, assisted by the former Prayer-Meeting reporter of the Daily Journal, speaks of Mr. Herndon's article in the following elegant, dignified, and Christian style. He distinctly says that "Herndon ought to be lynched for the common good."

That is, the Christian sentiment of this age and country demands that, for the crime of telling a truth which prevents the church from glorifying itself by falsely claiming that great and good man as a Christian, he shall be tortured, whipped, perhaps hung. This, of course, is not "persecution"! We give the editorial from the News in full:—

"If there is any one thing that can temporarily tarnish the fame of the immortal Lincoln as a man of great ability, it is the fact that he entered into partnership with a crack-brained hyena, named W. H. Herndon. This can be set down as the great error of Lincoln's life, and it is now being paid for by the American people. 'The late law partner of Abraham Lincoln' who has disgusted everybody with his talk about the Ann Rutledge affair, and solemn gas about Lincoln's 'sad heart and grief-covered visage,' ought to be lynched for the common good. Barring that, a lunatic asylum or home for the feeble minded should have the benefit of his presence immediately. Herndon has just written an article for a spiritual or infidel paper, in which he attempts to prove that Lincoln was an avowed skeptic; that he was a deist, a half theist, half atheist, half Universalist, half Unitarian, and again that he was 'fractionally an infidel, pantheist, theist, and atheist.' This 'miscellaneous conglomeration of putrefactions and maledictions' proves that Herndon knows no more what he is talking about now, than he did of other matters connected with Mr. Lincoln."

Miscellaneous.

A PRAYER AGAINST CHOLERA OR OTHER SICKNESS.

[The following curious document was printed at the office of the Toledo Blade, and distributed in this city about a year ago in the form of a circular. It is evidently the work of some pious Catholic, probably a priest.—Ed.]

It was revealed to an amiable priest at Rome, that whoever should repeat this with devotion would escape the cholera:—

O! Jesus, divine Redeemer, be merciful to us and the entire world. Amen. O! Almighty God, O! holy God, O! immortal God, have pity on us and the entire world. Amen. Grant us pardon and mercy, O! my Jesus; and during these days of present danger, pour down your most precious blood upon us. O! eternal Father, have mercy on us, through the sacred blood of Jesus Christ, your only Son, have mercy on us, we beseech thee. Amen. Amen. Amen.

The following prayer was found in the grave of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the year 804, and sent from the Pope to the Emperor Charles, as he was going to battle, for safety. They who shall repeat it every day, or hear it repeated, or keep it about them, shall never die a sudden death nor be drowned in water, nor shall they fall into the hands of their enemies in battle, nor shall poison take any effect on them: and it being read over, any woman in labor shall be delivered in safety and be a glad mother; and when the child is born, lay this on his or her side, and he or she shall not be troubled with any misfortune; and if you see any one in fits, lay it on his or her side, and he or she shall arise and thank God; and they who shall repeat it in any house shall be blessed of the Lord; and he that will laugh at it will suffer. Believe this for certain: it is as true as if the Holy Evangelists had written it. They who keep it about them shall not fear lightning or thunder; and they who keep it and repeat it every day shall have three days' warning before death:—

THE PRAYER.

O! adorable Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, dying on the gallows-tree for our lives; O! holy cross of Christ, ward off from me all sharp repeating words; O! holy cross of Christ, ward off from me all things that are evil; O! holy cross of Christ, protect me from my enemies; O! holy cross of Christ, protect me in the right way of happiness; O! holy cross of Christ, ward off from me all dangerous deaths and give me life always. O! crucified Jesus of Nazareth, have mercy on me, now and forever. Amen.

In honor of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in honor of his sacred passion, and in honor of his holy resurrection and God-like ascension, to which he liked to bring me to the right way to heaven: true as Jesus Christ was born on Christmas day in a stable; true as Jesus Christ was crucified on Good Friday; true as the three wise Kings brought their offerings to Jesus on the thirteenth day; true as he ascended into Heaven; so the honor of Jesus will keep me from my enemies, visible and invisible, now and forever. Amen.

O! Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me; Mary and Joseph pray for me, through Nicodemus and Joseph, who took our Lord down from the cross and buried him. O! Lord Jesus Christ, through thy sufferings on the cross, (for truly your soul was parting out of this sinful world,) give me grace that I may carry my cross patiently, with dread and fear, when I suffer, and without complaining; and that through thy sufferings I may escape all danger, now and forever. Amen.

ADDITIONAL TESTIMONY.

[From the Boston Herald.]

WASHINGTON, April 8.

The recent publication of a letter by W. H. Herndon, of Springfield, Illinois, assuming in the main that the religious views attributed to the late President Lincoln by most of his biographers are untrue, and declaring that he leaned to the belief of an infidel, has attracted great attention here among the personal friends of Mr. Lincoln. The fact that Mr. Herndon was for many years a partner of Mr. Lincoln, and is a gentleman of great probity and high character, entitles his statements to candid consideration. What is a little remarkable in this letter is the declaration made by Mr. Herndon that as long ago as 1835 Mr. Lincoln wrote a book in support of infidelity, which his friends discovered and destroyed, fearing that it would utterly ruin all his prospects for life. In further support of the assumption, it is declared that in none of Mr. Lincoln's messages or official documents is there any recognition of the Divine authority; but this will not hold good, for in his first emancipation proclamation he explicitly appealed to Divine Providence for justification of the course he had taken, and in one of his speeches at the close of the war he made reference to the favor of Almighty God to the people who had triumphed in battle. Mr. Stanton, the late Secretary, and Mr. Defrees, the Ex-Public Printer, who were among the most intimate of the friends of Mr. Lincoln, both have declared that he was a devotional man, and used to spend a portion of the early morning in religious exercises, reading the Bible, and in praying for guidance from on high for the welfare of the country. He was an attendant of church, though not a constant one, and while not perhaps a Christian in the strictest sense of the term, was what might be called a Liberal in his religious views, something of a Free-thinker, but not an infidel. Col. Lamon, who succeeded Mr. Herndon, as Mr. Lincoln's law-partner, is now engaged in writing his Recollections of the late President, and he regrets the marked infidelity of his old associate. There are those, it is claimed, and among them a minister in Illinois, who could sustain Mr. Herndon, were they disposed to make their facts public. They state that the country is not prepared to discuss the matter dispassionately, and that whatever might be said against Mr. Lincoln's religion would be caught up with avidity and made even a political question, though he is dead. They, therefore, do not propose to be drawn into any controversy, and only go so far as to state, personally, that there is a great deal of misrepresentation in the high-strung stories in many of the biographies of Mr. Lincoln regarding his personal and religious life. Colonel Lamon's new book may revive the controversy when it appears.

CHRISTIANITY.

[By Warren Chase, in the Banner of Light.]

THE INDEX, a new independent paper published at Toledo, Ohio, says:—"The Christian name, whatever else it may include, necessarily includes faith in Jesus as the Christ of God. Any other use of the name is abuse of it. Under some interpretation or other, the Christian confession is the boundary line of Christianity." It further says:—"The corner-stone of Free Religion is faith in human nature." These we consider the true boundary lines of the two systems, and we cannot see how Spiritualism can be included in the former or excluded from the latter. To us Free Religion is natural and rational, and the only true mode of perfecting the human character and attaining its highest development. The same paper says:—"Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself." We have no objection to this definition, although it does not quite seem to reach to the root of the mental element in human character. We believe religion to be natural and universal, and to only need cultivating and unfolding to bring man into religious harmony, which we believe would be harmony within and without, or with man and God, or with Nature and himself, and hence complete. In such condition man would need no saviour, and to reach it he only needs teachers and guides, but not atonements and sacrifices.

DELUSIONS OF GIRLHOOD.

I used to believe in girl-friendship. That ended when Arabella Triplet told mutual friends that I was years and years her senior, knowing what a dreadful fib she told.

I used to suffer pangs of agony because of woes of beggars. Since then I have seen one unstrap his wooden leg in an area and run off gaily on two legs of his own. Another threw a loaf of bread in the gutter, and I saw a third, who had all day been yelling, "Please assist the blind," carefully examining his collection of ten cent stamps by the light of a friendly apple-woman's candle.

I used to believe in faithful servants. Since then I have hired girls from the intelligence offices and lost all my pocket handkerchiefs but one.

I used to believe in beauty. Since then I have seen a bewitching belle take off half of her hair, all of her teeth, the best of her complexion, two pounds of cotton batting and a corset.—Fanny Fern.

The man who does a good act, stimulated only by the hope of reward, would do a bad act to achieve the same end. The great error made by many of the teachers of religion at this day, is that on the one hand they frighten men from sin by the fear of hell, and on the other tempt them to do good by portraying glowing pictures of heaven's reward. Religion thus unwittingly is made a line of paying policy.—Seaside Oracle.

The great painter, Kaulbach, has been compelled by anonymous letters to desist from the further public exhibition of his new painting, representing the inquisitor, Arbués, condemning heretics to death. This is the same Arbués who was declared a saint a few years ago. The destruction of Kaulbach's painting was threatened by those in sympathy with the spirit of the sentencing judge.—Nachricht aus Deutschland und der Schweiz.

HORTICULTURAL HALL DISCOURSES IN BOSTON.

This series of Sunday afternoon discourses, twelve in number, by persons whom the Independent called the "Twelve Apostles of Heresy," was closed last Sunday by Wendell Phillips. The title given to the lecturers by the writer in the Independent is more sensational than true. Some of the speakers, certainly, would not plead guilty to any greater heresy than attaches to the present position of the Independent. Wendell Phillips claims to be Orthodox in his theology, though we doubt whether his Orthodoxy would be acceptable at Princeton or even at Andover. And Mrs. Howe and Mr. W. H. Channing have a "good standing" among the Unitarians. The course of lectures, in fact, has been given by persons of considerable divergence in religious opinions, though all of them are interested in religious reform. The Free Religious Association had nothing to do with inaugurating this series of discourses, nor that of last year; yet they have come in the line of that movement which it represents. The two discourses which treated most directly certain important principles involved in the organization of the Free Religious Association were Mr. Higginson's and Mr. Channing's; the former on "The Sympathy of Religions," and the latter on "The Church of Universal Unity." We make some extracts here from the reports of these in the Boston Commonwealth.

Mr. Higginson is reported to have spoken in part as follows:—

"There is a sympathy in religions. I have worshipped in an evangelical church when thousands rose to their feet at the motion of one hand. I have worshipped in a Roman Catholic church when the lifting of one finger broke the motionless multitude into twinkling motion till the magic sign was made, and all was still once more. But I never for an instant have supposed that that concentrated moment of devotion was more holy or more beautiful than when at sunset the low murmur, 'Oh, the gem in the lotus! oh, the gem in the lotus!' goes across the vast populations of Thibet. There are as many worshipping Buddhists in the world as there are worshipping Christians. Every year brings new knowledge of the religions of the world, and every step in knowledge brings out some new point of sympathy between them. There is but one religion under many forms. This essential creed is the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man—disguised by corruptions, symbolized by mythologies, ennobled by virtues, degraded by inconsistency, yet still the same.

To say that different races worship different Gods is like saying that they are warmed by different suns. The names differ, but the sun is the same, and so with God. As there is but one source of light and warmth, so there is but one source of religion. In this all nations testify alike. Read Buddha and you have Buddhism; read Mahomet and you have Mahometanism; read Christ and you have Christianity. Each of these has absolute religion—love to God and man. We find everywhere the same leading features; the same great doctrines. Buddha embarrassed his teachers when a child by his understanding and his answers. He was tempted in the wilderness when older; he went with his apostles to redeem the world; he abolished caste and cruelty, and taught forgiveness; he received among his followers outcasts; and only said, 'My law is the law of mercy to all.' Slain by enemies he descended into hell; rising thence, undying, still lives to make intercession for us. So says the tradition. These are the recognized properties of religious emolument. The beautiful garments belong not to the individual, but to the race. There must always be some one who is best and wisest. I believe that all religion is natural, and all religion revealed.

One thing that falsifies history and debilitates the soul is exclusiveness. Any form of religion is endangered when we bring it to the test of facts, for none on earth can dare that test. Let us not be misled by any hasty vanity. The reign of heaven on earth will not be called the kingdom of Christ, nor of Buddha, but it will be called the Commonwealth of Men. I do not wish to belong to any religion, but to the religion. It must not include less than the piety of the world. Give us a vaster shrine than we have; something than Catholicism more catholic; not the church of Rome, but of God."

From the report of Mr. Channing's lecture we take the following paragraphs:

"Mr. Channing, in his opening sentences, touched upon the character of the preceding lectures, one by one, and announced that his word should be a pure, clear tone of serene and triumphant hope—a word of universal unity. Discoursing then of the geographical unity of the race, he brought forward the completed work of Burlingame and his embassy—composed of representatives of China, the oldest, and America, the youngest, of states, and including in its number citizens of several other countries—as a proof and symbol of the fact that for the first time in human history, for the first time since this globe rolled in sunshine, has it ever presented itself as possible to the imagination of man that the aspirations of mankind should be made one around the planet; a conception perfectly new and utterly unprecedented, opening the entire future, as yet unexplored, of a united humanity. Through all nations now, for the first time, as from one heart and from one brain, can pulsate a universal life. All the different types of men, different representatives of the divine ideal, speaking different tongues with a variety of traditions, are thus centred and convergent, that they may accomplish together one united destiny.

The speaker drew a glowing picture of all the different nations trembling with the great expectation of this unity, characterizing America as the chosen of mankind, the youngest portion of the human family, standing actually as a mediator on the western shore between the oldest Asia and the newest Europe, the bond among all nations, the peacemakers, if we follow our providential destiny, among the nations, destined under God to be the herald of universal unity. And from his pictured ideal of progress toward harmony among the nations he drew the conclusion that only an infinite mind could inspire and comprehend it, and that it is God that is moving in the nations of mankind; that a higher presence is here, beautiful, glorious, that we cannot but worship. It is God among the nations, a father meeting his great family of children, coming now together.

This was not merely a poet's dream. It was a conception which moves and had ever moved the nations. China has it in her religion. The Buddhist, the Brahmin, the Mussulman, all have it. In the creed of each of these sects or peoples this is one of the foremost. Yet we cannot build the universal church on any of these. Nor is practical Christianity broad enough to serve as a foundation for the structure. What Christian brotherhood can we offer to the Buddhist, to the Brahmin, or to the Mahometan? None at all. We confess our unworthiness. Not in our practical life as Christians, but in the spirit of Christianity, is the hope and the principle of the united church.

The speaker saw in the world no credible creed, only a growing one, a developing theology. This creed is everywhere promised, but as yet nowhere realized. It is the love of God for man and of man for man. All religions recognize one God, the Father. Even peoples which we call heathen bow before this common deity. This is the God of the universal church; the infinite One is also the infinitely many, the infinitely social. Next, the true doctrine of the Son is not that he is an isolated superior, but the brother of the race. He teaches a fraternal religion. His work was to be one with God and man. In all religions this fraternal feature is recognized, either in a distinct personality as in the Christ, or as combined in the character of the Father. The Holy Spirit also has a place in every religion. In the universal church it is the impartial spirit of God's love, the all-pardoning, all-redeeming grace of the Father. It is the spirit of universal unity. Mediation, providence, inspiration, are present in this religion as principles of its organic life.

The true way to approach this unity was not by setting aside differences, but by comparing them; not to merge or blend them, but to know how they stand related to one another. According to this great movement of Providence the method is always to observe what the scientific intellect has so clearly recognized, graduated development. That word is in the whole mind of the age; we have to apply it to religion. Neither by a narrow, vague eclecticism can we approach this problem, but by learning what is in the heart of humanity, and how, under the influence of God speaking in the heart of humanity, the great expectation of universal unity is to be realized."

NO STATE RELIGION.

[From the Cincinnati Commoner.]

If the Roman Catholic priesthood are determined to destroy the common schools by a division of the school fund among schools under religious control, can the friends of the American school system successfully oppose them by taking the ground that, inasmuch as the Catholics want their share of the school money to support schools under their control, and in which their religion is taught, we, the Protestants, will take possession of the school money for schools which we control? Do we not, by this, justify their demand, and concede to them the merit of fairness, inasmuch as they ask only their share of the school money, while we take all? Will the instinct of justice in the American people be able to resist the constant pleading of this spectacle of injustice? The issue made by the Protestants is for the religious control of all the schools against the Catholics, who ask the control of their share of the schools. This fight is on both sides for the destruction of the common schools. The only way to rescue them is to secularize them, so that all, religious and irreligious, shall be placed on an equality, leaving the teaching and ceremonies of religion to the family and the church.

FAITH IN MIRACLES.

In Zanesville, Ohio, there are many colored persons who live by barbering and other light work. They are for the most part an orderly and quiet people, many of them religious, having a church of their own and an ebony minister, of all which they are justly proud. One cold evening in the time of a great revival in the church, this ebony expounder was delivering a powerful appeal on "faith," the groans and sobs of his hearers giving token of his effect upon their irrepressible natures. The tears stood upon his dark cheeks, his voice quivered like distant thunder, while he emphasized his words by vigorous blows upon the table. In the midst of all this, the stove, agitated by his jarring blows, rolled over the floor. Brother Lewis, the high man of the church, had located himself near the comforter of shins. He stood irresolute, when the voice of his minister came to him, laden with faith, "Pick up the stove, Brudder Lewis—pick up the stove—de Lord won't let it burn you!" Brother Lewis's mind was filled up with miracles of faith he had heard that evening, so he yielded to the hot stove, but dropped it instantly, and turning his reproachful eyes to the disciple of faith replied, "De debble he won't!"—Investigator.

A lady made her husband a present of a silver drinking-cup, with an angel at the bottom. And when she filled it for him, he used to drink it to the bottom; and she asked him why he drank every drop. "Because, Ducky," he said, "I long to see the dear little angel at the bottom." Upon which she had the angel taken out, and a devil engraved at the bottom. He drank all the same; and she again asked him the reason. "Why," he replied, "because I won't leave the old devil a drop."

THE INDEX.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"It is a handsome quarto sheet, well filled with the leading ideas, as enunciated in Horticultural Hall and elsewhere, of those who gave religion pre-eminence to Christianity."—Boston Commonwealth.

"It bears the marks of vigorous and careful editing."—Christian Register, Boston.

"The editor, Mr. F. E. Abbot, promises in addition 'short and shotted' articles by able co-operators of his—Mr. O. B. Frothingham for one, and Mr. W. J. Potter for another, who both will fill regularly a certain space . . . We do not know where the friends of what we may call religious rationalism would be likely to find an editor better able to express their views and opinions."—New York Nation.

"That he is one of the most original and independent thinkers of our country cannot be denied. We see no reason to doubt that in his present position he is thoroughly honest, and thinks himself a champion of the truth. We believe there is no stain upon his character, and that he sincerely desires to benefit his fellow men. It is difficult, we know, for many who have been trained in the Orthodox fold, and never had a doubt of the doctrines taught them in childhood, to understand how a man can be honest and at the same time believe there is something higher and better than Christianity. Nevertheless, we believe such error to be perfectly compatible with the purest motives and the highest moral aims."—New York Independent.

"Mr. Abbot's fifty affirmative propositions, published in THE INDEX, are not surpassed, either in boldness or in truth, by the famous theses of Luther."—Col. T. W. Higginson at the Boston Radical Club, reported in Anti-Slavery Standard.

"It will be able, beyond question, and bold to the extremest utterance."—Warrington, in Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

"It is only just to say that THE INDEX promises to be fair, thoughtful, and able. It is impossible not to respect a frank and intense moral earnestness; and a Christian should be the last to complain of thorough fidelity to conviction, wherever that is found."—Morning Star, Dover, N. H. (Free-will Baptist.)

"Mr. Abbot is a clear and forcible writer, and an independent and fearless thinker. Those who agree with his views of religion and morals will recognize in him an able defender."—Toledo Blade.

"THE INDEX is the freest and most radical religious paper in America. Those who sympathize with the free religious movement now sweeping over this country, will find THE INDEX a most interesting paper."—Northwestern Farmer, Indianapolis, Ind.

"When we state that its editor is Francis E. Abbot, persons familiar with current American literature will understand that it is conducted with ability, scholarship, the most admirable courtesy, and the widest catholicity of spirit. We give orthodox fair warning that it must prepare to make a brave and vigorous warfare against the new enemy, and to send him in utter rout and discomfiture from the field."—Evening Post, Chicago, Ill.

"A new and beautiful journal published at Toledo, Ohio.—THE INDEX is the advocate of Free Religion; it is most ably edited, and we should like to see it in every family in the land. Success to THE INDEX."—La Fourche (La.) Republican.

THE BOSTON HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES—COMPARISON OF JESUS AND SOCRATES BY F. E. ABBOT.

[From the New York Tribune of Feb. 28.]

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—The sixth lecture in the Horticultural Hall Course was delivered this afternoon by Francis E. Abbot of Toledo, formerly of Dover, New Hampshire, who carries the radical idea so far as to entirely renounce the Christian name. After expressing the opinion that the proper conditions for a thoroughly just comparison of Jesus and Socrates never before existed, the speaker criticised those of Dr. Priestley and Jean Jacques Rousseau, both of which he thought inappreciative and unjust. The former sacrifices Socrates at the shrine of theology; the latter, emancipated from supernaturalism, yet a slave to sentimentality, immolates him on the altar of rhetoric. The one coolly cuts his throat with the butcher-knife of a dogma; the other gracefully pierces his heart with the rapier-point of an antithesis. Every Christian, being by the very fact of his Christianity pledged beforehand to render a certain verdict, is disqualified to sit as a juror in the case. The first requisite for a just decision on the respective merits and demerits of these two men is freedom from discipleship to either. A just comparison between the two loftiest characters in point of moral grandeur that humanity has yet produced, will present more clearly than any abstract statement can the conflict of ideas and institutions which is upon us. Hitherto Christianity has had for competitors only various special and historical religions, limited in fellowship and inferior to itself in spiritual purity and power. To-day it must meet the universal religion of humanity, boundless in fellowship, independent of history, equal to itself in spiritual purity and power, superior to itself in freedom, expansiveness and truth. Christianity holds up the character and spirit of its founder as the absolute and fixed ideal of humanity in all ages. Free Religion can have no historic ideal man, since it entirely discards the notion of any fixed ideal for all mankind. The only ideal which the race can have must be the combination of the highest possibilities of human attainment in all directions; and the ideal of each private soul varies in the case of each individual, and is dependent on its individual capacities. Free Religion holds up Socrates, not at all as the model for imitation, whether perfect or imperfect, but as perhaps the grandest known instance of certain virtues which belong to humanity in its highest development. Each of the two characters is superior to the other in certain points; neither is perfect in all points. In considering the sources of our knowledge with regard to them, the speaker referred to the lack of direct and thoroughly trustworthy information with regard to the life of Jesus. Neither of them left anything in writing; but while the four Gospels, which furnish all the knowledge of the life of Jesus which we have, are permeated with a mythical element, and the allusions to him and his teachings by cotemporary non-Christian writers are scanty and obscure, concerning Socrates we have accounts which are comparatively full and trustworthy.

But, in order to compare the gospel character of Jesus, which is held up by Christianity as its acknowledged ideal, with that of Socrates, which might fitly stand as in some very important respects the best individual exponent of Free Religion, the speaker treated of them as if the testimony were of equal value, and proceeded to point out some striking coincidences in their characters and careers. Both were graduates of the workshop—the one the son of a carpenter, the other a sculptor—and both received the elements of what was regarded as a decent education. They belonged to that sturdy middle class in society which has given to mankind almost all their greatest benefactors, and they both respected labor and reprobated idleness. Both also conceived a higher idea of their own special work than that of practising the mechanical arts to which they were bred, and accepting with equal cheerfulness the privations before them. They sacrificed the ordinary ambitions and common luxuries of mankind in order to devote themselves to universal ends. Neither did they make any distinction among those whom they sought to benefit. Each in his own peculiar way, they equally "went about doing good." Socrates no less than Jesus was pre-eminently a moral reformer, and aimed at the highest spiritual welfare of his fellow men. Both stood aloof from politics, and for the same reason; to have carried their principles into politics would have insured them speedy death. Again, both cherished a deep and settled prejudice against an influential class in the communities in which they lived—Socrates against the sophists, who received pay for their instructions, and many of whom were excellent men, and Jesus against the Pharisees, who were probably quite as good as any other class among the Jews, and were pre-eminently the national party of the Hebrew people. The natural and justifiable impatience of Jesus of their conservatism led him into the common fault of radicals—bitterness and injustice to individuals; his contempt for their principles passed over into indiscriminating abuse of their persons.

Another striking point of resemblance was the profound, all-controlling faith which both of these great men cherished in the fact of their own divine mission. If Jesus believed himself called by his Father to the great and unparalleled task of establishing on earth the Kingdom of Heaven, no less was Socrates convinced that he was sent by the gods to the Athenians, to labor for their good. With all the differences between them (and these were great), we recognize in each the same incorruptible allegiance to the best and highest in his own soul, which equalizes all who possess it, and establishes that absolute democracy of pure religion which abolishes forever all spiritual distinction of higher or lower. From the hands of their own countrymen, whom they had done their utmost to benefit and bless, they met their doom; but with the same magnanimous and beautiful spirit they died with words of kindness on their lips. Jesus prayed God to forgive his murderers; Socrates forgave his murderers himself.

The speaker next noted differences between them. Jesus spoke to the multitude in parables, and reserved their explanation for the inner circle of his disciples. Like Pythagoras and others, he maintained that baleful distinction of exoteric and esoteric, which has its origin everywhere and always in distrust of the common people. But Socrates kept no secrets in religion—had no mysteries too sacred for all except the initiated—formed no little royal court of apostles to receive announcements too high for the common ear. In claiming to be the Messiah, or King of Humanity, Jesus depended for the success of his mission on the public recognition of his claim by mankind. He could be in no true sense the king of those who should refuse to acknowledge their allegiance. We cannot but connect the fact of his outward failure with his despair upon the cross, "My God! My God! why hast thou forsaken me?" Words more full of pathos never fell from human lips, for they are the confession of irretrievable failure, wrung from the depths of his soul. But Socrates depended on himself alone, and therefore could not fail. He sought no confession from others of any personal claim of his; it was his duty to instruct the world in the high wisdom of humility and the knowledge of its own ignorance, but it was not his duty that the world should be instructed.

The predominant aims of Jesus and Socrates, and the methods which these aims required, were then contrasted. The conception of Jesus, that power was his by divine appointment and right, was wholly free from all that could with propriety be called selfish in any bad sense of the word; but it was, nevertheless, intensely egoistic, and pervaded his whole consciousness. His entire method of instruction is that of dogma. He does not appeal to the reason of man, but to his receptive faculties. The speaker intended no reproach whatever to Jesus by saying that the "verily, verily, I" is the key note of his whole religion. The Church came honestly by its peculiarity in tone and air of dogma, and its most marked characteristic, "salvation by belief." But with Socrates the case was the reverse. The Divine mission which he believed to have been assigned to him was, in the highest and noblest sense of the word, that of education. Free development of the human mind was the ideal end followed by Socrates with such untiring and unselfish zeal. More truly than any other human being he has earned the title of the Great Educator of the Human Race. He was the father of modern civilization as truly as of ancient philosophy, for his method was and is the only one that can develop the human mind. The speaker lastly compared the conception of Socrates with his actual method pursued in fulfilling it, finding therein the same correspondence as in the case of Jesus. He related the incident of Jesus's reception of the poor woman who poured a box of costly spikenard upon his head, and the parallel story of the friend of Socrates who brought him a fine-woven tunic and mantle, praying him to put it on, that his body might be fitly arrayed after death; and Socrates refused it. The anecdotes illustrated the very striking difference in their characters. With the egoism inseparable from the Messianic consciousness, Jesus accepts without a particle of hesitation the costly offering of the woman as his rightful due, and promises the woman the reward of everlasting fame. It is more important that the body of the Christ be richly anointed for his burial than that human tears be dried and human hearts be bound up. The more beautiful the woman's impulse, the more beautiful would it have been in Jesus to have tenderly restrained it and refused a homage which one human being should never pay to another. We turn with relief to the manlier Socrates, gently repelling an equally loving, but equally foolish, tribute, and preserving the dignity of his own self respect without wounding the heart of his friend. In the supreme virtue of reverence for universal spiritual freedom and the rights of humanity, the speaker counted Socrates superior to Jesus, and Free Religion superior to Christianity. Yet he would accord to each superiority in his own sphere. Each occupies a partial standpoint, and the future must combine them both. The true culture of humanity must be integral, inclusive both of Socrates and Jesus, the intellectual and the spiritual. Socrates stands for the larger liberty, Jesus for the larger love; and these must yet be joined forever in one. This can be done by Free Religion alone.

COMPARISONS.

[Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, in the Woman's Journal, March 12.]

All of us have, sometimes, an opportunity of finding out why comparisons are said to be odious. A more useful and important mental exercise than that of comparison does not exist. We only get on in science, art and morals by comparing one authority with another, facts with laws, and individual attainment with some standard high enough to become a common one. Why, then, do people constantly wound us by jarring against each other two candidates for the public favor or reverence? Why do we dread nothing more than that the first person we meet shall shriek into our ears, with praises of his favorite, disparagement of our own?

The reason seems to me something like this. Suppose that we have several objects of value which a friend takes out and assort for us. We shall not feel uneasy if his nice hand shall range these objects side by side, and say: "This is so and this is other. My taste prefers this one, but you may enjoy them all, and so may I." But if he shall sweep off from the shelf those which he does not fancy, leaving only the object of his choice unbroken, we shall scarcely thank him for so costly a vindication of his taste.

Much of popular criticism takes this direction, painful, for the moment, those whose sympathies and affections it disturbs. But the fear of this is misplaced. True divinities cannot be broken like false idols. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." Those who deprecate immortal beauties, imperishable joys, have no real power over them, or over those who feel them. Comparison in this form is irreligious, and gives no other instruction than that of showing something that should be avoided. This prelude hides the remembrance of a comparison at once recent and painful. We allude to Mr. Abbot's parallel between Socrates and Jesus,—one which a week has given us time to meditate. A treatment of this kind, one would suppose, would be as unwelcome to the friends of one as to the followers of the other. Why should criticism place in opposition two personages whose relations, could they have met on earth, must have been those of the deepest mutual honor and goodwill? The doctrines of these two are nearly and intimately related. Platonism contains a more subtle prophecy of Christianity than that of Judaism. The life-long efforts of devout hearts, and the nécessité of a sudden attainment, stand in a profound and Providential relation to each other. In the ordinary routine of experiment and discovery is found the same succession of long periods of endeavor, crowned by some unexpected moment of success. Who but Socrates could have been Socrates? Those deep musings, those subtle abstractions, those homely illustrations, have made their mark upon all thought, have become an absolute foundation for philosophy, concerning which we may take Christ's words: "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid." Not the less has the magic of certain words,—"My father, my brother, my neighbor," accompanied by certain acts of filial, fraternal and neighborly devotion—suggested to mankind at large a new basis of consideration and of action upon which our noblest and furthest-reaching reforms have room to build themselves, uncrowded by any sharp corner or narrow limit. The anguish of Jesus upon the cross was not so great as the anguish which the world would suffer to-day, if this consummate ideal of beauty, power and wisdom could be slain before the eyes of its intellect. Womanhood, robbed of its dearest achievement, would stand again a debtor in the eyes of the centuries. The world would say to it: "If thou hast not brought forth this divine human, thou hast it yet to bear," which, indeed, would be, in some sense, a good lesson, since as a fruit of society it is yet to be born. But this was scarcely the teaching of Mr. Abbot's negations. The lesson we derived from them was this: "Let us now go out and bring some true Christianity in the world. Let us dare to believe as Christ believed, to love as he loved, to work as he worked; and let us not dare to do otherwise, since the ease and remissness of our lives causes our divine Master to be slandered and misunderstood."

We have dealt with the spirit, not with the details, of Mr. Abbot's discourse. But one of the latter must not escape our notice. The following of Christ was spoken of by him as an act of slavish imitation. Surely, it was not so inculcated by the Master. Every great teacher in art has his school, but he does not command his pupils to copy his pictures. He teaches his method, and instructs them to add to it whatever their individual power and experience can furnish. What else is the meaning of the five talents added to the other five? In like manner Christ assures us of the absolute truth of certain principles, but leaves us to build upon them all that life can call for and experience supply.

One word more, our last, shall be about the kingship on whose assertion by Christ Mr. Abbot lays such unfriendly emphasis. The other things that we know of Christ are not such as to compel us to construe this feature of his personality in the poorest and most superficial sense that can be given to it. In the days of the New Testament, "king" did not mean what it does to-day. The popular heart of that period desired the fact of such a supreme representation as earnestly as it rejects its symbol to-day. "My kingdom is not of this world" is a sufficient vindication of the sense in which Christ used the word. But his last use of it was in an aspect so grand that it makes apology impertinent. "Art thou a king?" says the representative of Cæsar, clothed with pomp and authority, to the prisoner who, scourged and spit upon, is about to suffer a felon's death. And the prisoner, conscious of the true essence of majesty, replies: "I am."

Might not He who died in ignominy, eighteen hundred years ago, for what the world holds dearest to-day, might He not, receiving the martyr's crown, assert the unconquerable greatness of his soul? Who might, if He might not, say to the dark age that persecuted Him, and to the happier æons which have recognized His beneficent office: "I am a king."

SOCRATES COMPARED WITH JESUS.

[From the Boston Universalist.]

Mr. Francis E. Abbot was formerly a Unitarian minister, and pastor of the church in Dover, N. H. He became a Rationalist, and finally, as should be expected of a man very moderately candid, an avowed infidel. Then he did himself the honor of abandoning the ministry. At present he is what is called a Free Religionist, which implies, if we may judge from his productions and those of his associates, a total freedom from all religion.

Recently Mr. Abbot delivered a Lecture before the Free Religionists of this city on "Jesus and Socrates in the History of Religion," which we find briefly reported in the Boston Journal. Curiously enough, Mr. Abbot seems to flatter himself that he is the first, if not the only man "in the procession of the ages," as Mr. Potter would say, who is qualified "for a perfectly fair and just comparison of these two great men." The first requisite for a just decision on their relative merits, he tells us, "is entire freedom from discipleship to either;" and this enviable position is held by no one but Mr. Abbot and the little knot of Free Religionists by whom he finds himself surrounded. "Every Christian," he tells us, "being by the very fact of his Christianity, pledged to render a certain verdict, is disqualified to sit as juror in the case." It follows, of course, and with singular clearness, that Mr. Abbot and his free-thinking friends are the only people in the world qualified to judge at all impartially in such a matter, while all Christians, and all disciples of Socrates—if such persons exist—are summarily ruled out of court.

We wish it had occurred to this ex-Reverend gentleman to say a few words, which the occasion seemed to require, showing how peculiarly, how admirably fitted a renegade Christian must of necessity be, to act as an impartial judge of the Master he once professed to serve and then renounced and abandoned. He might have exhibited and illustrated the obvious fact that the loving and beloved John's opinion of Christ must, from the very necessities of the case, be unworthy of a moment's consideration, while that of Judas Iscariot is entitled to the most implicit confidence. Such a statement as this, though undoubtedly implied in what Mr. Abbot has already said, would have given emphasis as well as perspicuity to his thought, and prepared his audience to hear with greater zest the lecture that followed.

Mr. Abbot finds in Socrates and Jesus many "similarities" and a few "points of difference." He has to regret "the lack of trustworthy information in regard to the life of Jesus in the Gospels, which," he says, "are permeated by a mythical element," and mourns over the "total absence of any other testimony." Of Socrates his information is not only complete but entirely trustworthy. Indeed, as we shall see, he knows much more of Socrates than it is to his purpose to mention.

Of "the similarities in character and career" of Socrates and Jesus, Mr. Abbot says:—"Both were graduates of the workshop, received a decent education, belonged to the sturdy middle class of society, and respected labor. Both conceived the idea that they were called to a higher and special work, and sacrificed the ambitions and luxuries of mankind in order to devote themselves to universal ends. Neither made any distinction among those whom they sought to benefit. Both stood aloof from politics, and each cherished a settled prejudice against an influential class in the community in which they lived, Socrates against the Sophists, who were frequently excellent men, and Jesus against the Pharisees, who were no worse than other classes of the Jews. . . . Another striking point of resemblance was the profound, all-controlling faith which both cherished in the fact of their own divine mission. And both, too, met their doom at the hands of their countrymen, whom they had done their utmost to benefit and bless; but with the same magnanimous and beautiful spirit, they died with words of kindness on their lips."

Now, under these striking "similarities," Mr. Abbot certainly is not ignorant of differences so important as to make a comparison between Socrates and Jesus practically futile, if not absurd. Socrates was a remarkable man, a philosopher, shrewd and penetrating, enjoying the best opportunities for acquiring an education and distinguishing himself, while Jesus was a divinely commissioned personage, with no opportunities at all for human learning, and without a single advantage except what was given him from above. Observe the following particulars:—

1. Socrates was born and brought up in Athens, then the centre of the highest civilization, and of all the learning the world possessed. He was first trained to sculpture, one of the fine arts, and subsequently turned his attention to philosophy.

Jesus was brought up in Nazareth of Galilee, an obscure village, whose inhabitants were corrupt in their morals, and boorish and stupid even to a proverb. It was without learning, books, or schools of philosophy, and Jesus was trained to carpentry.

2. Socrates enjoyed, even in his youth, those advantages for mental culture and social refinement which were common to every citizen of Athens. His business as sculptor necessarily brought him in contact with people of wealth, position and taste. He early made the acquaintance of Crito, a man of affluence, who raised him from the shop, and became his life-long friend and patron. Alcibiades was one of his pupils, and Euripides, the poet, an intimate companion. For nearly half a century there was not an eminent man in any sphere of life in Athens whom Socrates did not know, and with whom he had not opportunities of conversing. He was familiar with books, was intimately acquainted with all the sciences then known, as well as all the schools of philosophy that had gone before him, whether physical, intellectual, or moral. He not only knew all the great men of his day, but had taken opportunities to make the acquaintance of those celebrated courtiers, Aspasia, Theodora, and the Mantinean Diotima, who were at once the ornament and disgrace of Athens. To one of them he was indebted for lessons in rhetoric, another he invited to become his pupil, and from the third he might have learned the sublime art of divination.

Mr. Abbot can perhaps tell us what opportunities for learning Jesus enjoyed. It is not probable he ever entered a school outside of Nazareth, if indeed beyond his mother's cottage. It would be strange if he ever saw a philosopher or a man of even Jewish learning, above the reader of the synagogue of his own village. And as to books, it does not appear that he had ever read one except the Old Testament.

3. Then let it be observed that Socrates enjoyed a long life. He was more than seventy years old when he died. For nearly fifty years he had been a philosopher, and for a considerable part of his time had held an honored place among that galaxy of great men who then reflected glory upon Greece.

Jesus, on the contrary, was a carpenter up to the age of thirty. Then he began to preach, and with his disciples travelled almost continually from village to village and city to city, over the narrow territory of his countrymen, till the day of his death, probably two or three years afterwards. In other words, Socrates lived to be over seventy years old, while Jesus lived to be only thirty-two or thirty-three.

4. Finally, Socrates died of poison, within his prison walls, surrounded by his pupils and friends; while Christ perished on the cross between two thieves, and under every indignity it was possible for his enemies to inflict.

The reader can see at a glance what Mr. Abbot's striking "similarities" in the circumstances and fortunes of Socrates and Jesus, are worth. Must not our Free Religionists be rather badly pushed, when they are driven to such desperate shifts? And is it not a little remarkable that an active infidel must almost of necessity be practically dishonest? In any other cause Mr. Abbot would see at once that Socrates and Jesus do not belong to the same category, and that they occupy entirely different positions in history.

But let us look for an instant at the result of these two lives—of Jesus with his two or three years in Galilee and Judea, and Socrates with his half-century in Athens.

Of what Jesus has accomplished it is hardly necessary to speak. Mr. Abbot himself cannot fail to see it. Here is a wide and constantly widening Christendom, with a new religion, better laws and a higher civilization, nations converted from degrading idolatries, old barbarisms passed or passing away, and a fresher and more beautiful life. And yet the work of Jesus is not half done, his Gospel not half understood, and there is a future before him full of promise and hope.

But where are the fruits of Socrates' life? Let Mr. Abbot point them out. Where is there a single nation or state, a city or town on the face of the earth, that professes faith in Socrates as a teacher of religion? Where was there ever one?

The truth is, and we suppose Mr. Abbot not ignorant of the fact, that Socrates never claimed to be an author, or even a teacher, of religion. He was a philosopher—nothing more. He had no new doctrines in religion to inculcate, and so far as he can be said to have touched on religion at all, it was the old paganism prevalent in Athens in his time. Xenophon says expressly, "He introduced nothing new beyond others, who, acknowledging the reality of divination, make use of omens, and voices, and objects presented on the way, and sacrifices." He prayed to "the gods" before he drank the fatal cup, and afterwards, when the poison had nearly done its work, he said, "Crito, we owe a cock to Æsculapius; pay it, I beseech of you, and neglect it not." These were the last words he uttered.

Our Free Religionists talk much of their "advanced thought," while it appears that their movement is wholly retrograde. Mr. Frothingham worships at the altar reared by the Athenians, eighteen hundred years ago, To the unknown God. And Mr. Abbot "holds up Socrates," with his reverence for the Delphic Oracle, and his beautiful sacrifice to Æsculapius, as one of the noblest instances of Free Religion to be found in all the pages of history!

HUNTINGTON HALL—DR. CLARKE'S REPLY TO MR. ABBOT.

[From the Lowell Daily Courier, April 4.]

Rev. James Freeman Clarke, of Boston, spoke last evening at Huntington Hall in answer to Francis E. Abbot's "Comparison of Jesus and Socrates in the history of religion." The weather was unfortunately very stormy, but nevertheless a large audience assembled, nearly filling the floor of the hall, and Mr. Clarke's arguments were listened to with close attention.

The introductory exercises consisted of prayer, reading of Scripture, and singing by the choir of the Unitarian Church, assisted by S. W. Stevens, who presided at the piano. After brief introductory remarks, Mr. Clarke took up in their order the several points of Mr. Abbot's lecture, taking a report of it as delivered recently in Boston. Said the speaker, in substance:—

Mr. Abbot affirms that a Christian, from the very fact of his being a Christian, is disqualified for pronouncing an opinion upon the life of Christ. On the contrary, the very best man to speak of Jesus must be the one who knows and loves him best; and it might as well be said that a geologist was unable to give a fair opinion upon geology, or a chemist in chemistry. Mr. Abbot says, again, that "it is generally admitted" that we have no trustworthy information in regard to the life of Christ. Generally admitted! No such thing is admitted at all, except by a small number of modern critics, for neither Protestants nor Romanists will agree to anything of the sort. The fact is, we have much more knowledge of Jesus than of Socrates: for our history of the latter is wholly derived from the works of two of his disciples,—Xenophon and Plato; whereas we have a complete record by several different writers of the life of Christ. Let us examine the opinions of Rousseau. But Mr. Abbot declares him disqualified from giving an opinion in the matter because he is not a Christian! But he was the first man to institute a comparison between Jesus and Socrates, which he does in a letter published in his private correspondence. (Here a considerable extract was read from the letter referred to, in which, though discrediting the supernatural part of the gospel narrative, Rousseau shows his belief in the historical, by asserting and arguing to prove the infinite superiority of Jesus Christ as a man.) Again Mr. Abbot says that the Saviour was personal in his accusations and reproaches, and prejudiced against a class. The Bible shows this to have been not the case. He denounced error, not the individual.

It is not to be denied, said the speaker, that Socrates was a very remarkable man. He would not undervalue him or his teachings. He agreed with one who remarks that "Socrates was a Christian before Christ came." If he had lived in Christ's day he would probably have been found among his earliest disciples. (Here quotations were introduced by Mr. Clarke from Grote's work on Plato; showing Socrates to have been often wrong, weak in argument, and far from infallible at best.) Jesus (continued the speaker) had more respect for human nature. He believed in the capacity of the lowest to comprehend the highest truths, as shown in his conversation with the woman of Samaria. Socrates labored to convince men of their ignorance; Jesus to teach them the truth,—a far nobler task. The teachings and life of Christ have lifted mankind up to God, and to realize Him as a Father. Christ has overcome death and the grave; so that death to the Christian, instead of the mysterious and shadowy and fearful thing that it was to the ancients, is but the welcome transition to a better and eternal life.

But, again, Mr. Abbot says "Jesus was dogmatic," and this is one of his principal charges. Jesus does not appeal to the reason, as does Socrates. There has been dogmatism in the church, but it was not learned from Christ, and to disprove this assertion we have only to refer again to the record of his life. His way of teaching about prayer, and the Sabbath; his answer by parable to the question "Who is my neighbor?" his reply to the accusation of companying with publicans and sinners; and his response to the query "Why do thy disciples fast not?"—all go to show his way of appealing straight to the conscience and the understanding, and his habit of going to nature for illustrations to enforce his words. Another matter over which Mr. Abbot and Judas have alike stumbled, is the case of the woman who anointed the feet of Jesus. They agree that he should not have allowed it. But it shows how completely Jesus understood human nature; he accepts her homage, not for his own glorification, but for the sake of the kind heart that prompted it—to make her glad and happy. Strange that this should have been overlooked.

"Jesus depended on success," affirms Mr. Abbot; "and to the consciousness of failure is due his agony of spirit on the cross." But how could this be, when he himself so frequently foretold the end! so often warned his disciples of what must come! His agony was not for himself, but for others. His last conversation with his disciples showed that he was far from considering his life a failure.

The speaker brought his remarks to a close by considering and comparing the results of these two lives. For one individual who knows anything of Socrates, there are a thousand who receive daily comfort and strength from Christ.

What enlightens the world, and advances civilization; the teachings of Socrates, or Jesus? and why is it, that only with the spread of Christianity we find progress? Before we substitute Socrates for Jesus Christ, let us first know if from his life and teachings have emanated results like these.

The services closed with prayer and the benediction by Mr. Clarke. It was announced that Rev. J. G. Adams, of the 2d Universalist church, would preach next Sunday evening in the Hall. Subject:—"The religious aspects of the times."

ABBOT'S LECTURE—FREEMAN CLARKE'S REPLY—THE "WATCHMAN AND REFLECTOR."

[From the Christian Radical, Pittsburgh, Pa., March 31.]

Not long ago Mr. Abbot, of THE INDEX, discoursed of "Christ and Socrates," in Horticultural Hall, Boston, in a way quite derogatory to the Son of God. He seemed to see, at least he said he saw, much more of manly excellence and virtue in Socrates than in Christ. And so he may. But if he honestly uttered his convictions, which we doubt not, we have only to say his conclusion indicates defective vision, proves that his eyes want the range and power to see the "true Light" or look up into the noon and summer of Christ's infinite glory. Much depends upon the capacity of the inward eye in order to correct judgments of the essential things. Wm. Wirt's blind Virginia preacher saw Christ and Socrates in a radically different light when he exclaimed in the fervor of his great soul, "Socrates died like a philosopher, but Jesus Christ died like a God."

In this comparison which Emerson, Johnson, Abbot and their brethren are instituting now between Christ on the one hand, and Boodh, Confucius, and Socrates on the other, the eyes, as we have just remarked, have much to do. There are night birds whose eyes see more in the moon than they do in the sun. The sun is too original and luminous for them. They prefer the second-hand things to the primal and original things. They believe in creeds. So there are men who doubt between Christ and Boodh, and between Christ and creed. They are all men of vision that cannot apprehend the true glory nor look inward upon the primal things. The night bird's eye does not change the eternal differences that subsist between the sun and moon. And so the man who sees more in Boodh, Confucius, Socrates, or creed, than in Jesus Christ, demonstrates nothing at all against the one nor in favor of the other, but simply proves that he has eyes that are not able to see the real original Light, nor penetrate the depth and beauty of divine character.

But we intended to say something else when we sat down to write this article. And we still will say it. James Freeman Clarke, a distinguished Unitarian preacher, known well to many of our readers, not long after the delivery of Mr. Abbot's sermon, undertook to reply to it. At least it was given out as a reply, though it turned out to be rather an apology for it. For Mr. Clarke to grapple Mr. Abbot in any sharp and persistent conflict is re-acting the farce of McClellan's war with the slave-power. McClellan's faith and Lee's were too kindred to produce antagonism. So Mr. Clarke's faith in its root lies too near Mr. Abbot's to create severe and uncompromising war.

But Mr. Clarke replied, at any rate, and in his reply was good enough to tell Mr. Abbot that Christ was at least considerably superior to Socrates. This, we judge, was intended as a compliment to Christ, for which surely he will be obliged to Mr. Freeman Clarke. But it seems after all his effort Mr. C. was unable to make the difference between them original and eternal. Christ was only the more and better man of the two. The difference was simply in degree. And so as between Messrs. Abbot and Clarke the debate stands thus: Clarke says, Jesus is my man; Abbot says, Socrates is my man. And with so sublime an issue we will not dare to meddle.

At this point a third party enters the ring. It is no less a personage than the editor of the Watchman and Reflector. That Mr. Clarke should venture to call the conclusions of Mr. Abbot's sermon in question at all, seems to have been a source of real pleasure to him. And yet we wonder that so clear-headed a man should have expected Mr. Clarke seriously to confront Mr. Abbot. And sure enough the dreadful fact soon comes; for, as he reads along, he suddenly finds Mr. Clarke indulging in surprise that "so good a man as Abbot" should exalt Socrates and disparage Christ. And then his surprise is uttered in turn: "That one who believes Christianity to be a supernatural system, authenticated by miracles, and Jesus a messenger sent from God, as Mr. Clarke professes to do, should apply such an exalted epithet to an avowed rejecter of Christianity and calumniator of Christ, is passing strange." Just so. But when the even, beautiful and correct life of many of the "infidels" is set over in contrast against the life of many that bear the name of Jesus, it puts a doubtful face on matters. "Pretty is that pretty does." The Savior's test is too often in favor of the infidels. So that looking at the question in an outward and practical way, Mr. Clarke's testimony to Abbot's goodness is not so reprehensible after all.

At any rate the editor of the Watchman turns his guns on Clarke, and takes him to sharp account because he makes no broader defence of Jesus Christ. But why "tackle" the man for something he cannot help, for something his inward thought necessitates? As a man thinketh, so is he. Virtually and essentially Christ is no more to Clarke than to Abbot. No man is more than his faith, and cannot say more than he believes, is not wider than his creed, and is toned and measured by it. The man who has a Christ that is held in limits is not the one to send out to institute a controversy with Mr. Abbot. It was not McClellan's fault that he made no war with rebels, it was our folly to expect it.

And now we suggest that the editor of the Watchman and Reflector take Mr. Abbot in hand, and by dint of high argument offset and overthrow his heresies. This needs to be done, and now. And there is no use quarrelling with Clarke for not doing it. We are sure the editor can do it. And to do it will be good for him and Abbot. Let it not be attempted, however, in the old style and spirit of orthodoxy, but let there be such rational inquiry into the great Christ and such rational demonstration of him as will exclude all possibility of rational objection. Jesus Christ waits for such argument to be made.

[The Christian Register prints the following extracts, under the heading—"Spirit of the Press."]

We presume that the Watchman and Reflector would admit that some good theologians have been very bad men, but it denies that a bad theologian can be a good man, and censures James Freeman Clarke for sparing Mr. Abbot's character when assailing his creed:—

Rev. James Freeman Clarke, of the Church of the Disciples, a Unitarian body, recently undertook to reply to Mr. Abbot's discourse in Horticultural Hall on Christ and Socrates, in which the latter was placed far above the former. In the paper which he read in his own chapel, he took up Mr. Abbot's positions seriatim, and some of them he refuted very satisfactorily, showing himself to be a diligent and respectful student of the Bible. We were, however, somewhat surprised at his calling Mr. Abbot "so good a man." That one who believes Christianity to be a supernatural system, authenticated by miracles, and Jesus Christ to be a messenger sent from God, as Mr. Clarke professes to do, should apply such an exalted epithet to an avowed rejecter of Christianity and calumniator of Christ, is passing strange. What higher praise could he accord to a Christian believer? And if one may be "so good" who despises God's messenger, where the special need of accepting Him? If a man is really "good," God the Righteous will certainly not look upon and treat him as bad. He is as well off, whether he believe or deny. But Mr. Clarke knows that Jesus Christ required that men should believe in Him, and that He made such faith the condition or medium of God's accepting them. This cannot be eliminated from the Scriptures. "He that believeth not shall be condemned," if not mere verbiage, certainly means that an unbeliever cannot be acceptable to God. How then can he be "so good a man"? But the remark of Mr. C. is only one of the signs of that spurious Christianity named Unitarianism, which obliterates the broad and radical distinctions in character so marked in the Word of God, and which has found its logical result in such men as Mr. Abbot. This gentleman, for he has thrown off the "Reverend," openly rejects Christianity; Mr. Clarke virtually, unconsciously, we doubt not, rejects it also; for what does Christianity amount to, if the man who accepts it and the man who spurns it may be alike "good"? Christianity is a superfluity and impertinence. It has no indispensable mission. For by goodness of character much more is meant than mere external virtue and amiability. Mr. Abbot is, we presume, a man of virtuous impulse and habits, who would scorn to do what the world calls wicked and dishonorable; but the standard of the world and the standard of Christianity are infinitely wide apart. "That which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God." Thousands will be condemned as sinful and guilty in the sight of God who were accounted "good" in the sight of men. Mr. Clarke seems to have ignored this distinction, and so to have disregarded the Christian doctrine that Christ is the source of all real goodness; the vine from which proceeds all spiritual life to the branches.

The Christian Era in its normal state is a rather dull sheet, but wrath seems to sharpen its faculties. It reminds us of Luther, who said that he could preach better and pray better when he was angry:—

In the cars last week we were the recipients, with other passengers, of the tracts of the Unitarian publishing house. This is quite a move in the aggressive way of the "liberal" body, and deserves notice. Our tract made Peter a consistent follower of the liberal school, a probable lecturer in the infidel course with which Boston is now afflicted. After Abbot's blasphemous harangue, we thought what a pity that some old Greek, some Atkinsonian professor of Skepticism alias Technology, had not informed the "liberal" Peter that one Socrates dead was a vastly superior man to Jesus living! The apostle was a Unitarian about fifteen minutes in his life, if it took so long between the first denial of his Lord and the going out to weep bitterly.

The Watchman and Reflector suggests a new subject for Mr. Abbot:—

Let Mr. Abbot take for his next subject, The Superiority of Judas to Jesus. He will find the former's thoughtfulness of the poor, on the occasion of the spikenard, quite to his purpose, so beautifully contrasting with the latter's selfish disregard of human tears and broken hearts.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR.

To the Friends of Free Thought, Free Speech,
and a Free Press:

The Boston Investigator.

VOLUME XL.

Truth, Perseverance, Union, Justice, the Means; Happiness, the End; Hear all Sides, then Decide.

The Fortieth Volume of the BOSTON INVESTIGATOR will commence on the 4th of May, 1870, and, as heretofore, it will be devoted to the development and promotion of Universal Mental Liberty. To the maintenance of this great principle, without which we cannot possess and extend that genuine and untrammelled Free Inquiry which is the direct road to Truth, the INVESTIGATOR will continue, as formerly, to lend its undivided and constant support. The field it occupies in the domain of thought and action, though deemed a dangerous one by its opponents, is yet to us a realm which contains all the facts of Nature and Reason—and under the inspiring influence of this true and healthful Philosophy, we have all the incentive we need to go forward with our publication. We are thoroughly satisfied with the Liberal or Infidel principles we maintain, believing that they lead to Truth, and promote in every rational and practical way the best interests of Humanity in this world. We deal with facts, not fiction—with earth, not heaven; and wish to substitute for the vagaries of eternity and faith the substantial realities of reason and knowledge, and of every demonstrated or conceivable improvement which appertains to time and sense.

Assisted as we shall be through the coming year by an able corps of contributors, we are confident we can make the Fortieth Volume of the INVESTIGATOR acceptable to the Liberal public, and therefore we solicit their continued aid and support. We again ask our old friends who have stood by us so long, and cheered us in our arduous task by their kind patronage, to stand by us through the coming volume; and should any new friends be disposed to enrol their names on our list of subscribers, we think we can furnish them a paper which will prove in all respects satisfactory. At least, this will be our continual study and highest ambition.

Is the organ of Thought and Progress in the moral or spiritual sphere. It deals with Principles and Social Laws. It would help to reconstruct society upon a higher plane. It would anticipate the future by dealing fairly with the present. It seeks to determine a true authority—the authority of Truth and Fact. It thus meets a demand than which the present age has none greater. For what does self-government imply but an abandonment of traditional and personal authority for the commanding influences of Right Reason?

THE CANDLE OF THE LORD.

[Read in Dover, N. H., Feb. 2, 1868.]

"The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord."
PROVERBS, 20: 27.

I once heard Wendell Phillips tell the following story:—Many years ago, two men, of no small name and influence in their day and generation, were sent from widely distant parts of the country to Washington as members of Congress. They were both selfish in their views of life; and in their living were faithful enough to the theories they held. Ambition and self-interest lay at the bottom of their public course, and gave direction to the employment of their large abilities. On meeting, they contracted a strong friendship for each other, and whatever time they could save from public duties they spent in each other's company. Being both thoughtful men, their conversation ran mostly into intellectual channels; and in the privacy of their own rooms they talked often and earnestly about the immortality of the soul. Equally sceptical as to its continued existence beyond the grave, they endeavored to find some reason for accepting a belief which they would gladly have entertained, if they could have convinced themselves of its truth; but their discussions, however frequently held, and however long protracted, led always to the same conclusion. It was no use,—they remained sceptics still. On the expiration of their terms of service, one was re-elected, the other not; and dwelling so far apart, they found no opportunity of further intercourse.

At last, after an interval of twenty-five years, they both happened to attend a Presidential levee at the Executive Mansion. Across the large and brilliantly-lighted hall, they saw each other entering at opposite doors; the crowd was dense, but slowly edging their way towards each other, they met at last, and joined hands in a long, cordial, and hearty grasp. For some moments they looked into each other's faces in perfect silence. At last one spoke:—"Any light, Albert?" "No! Any light, Louis?" "No!" Without another word, they clasped hands once more, looked sadly into each other's eyes, and parted in that gay throng, never to meet again. After twenty-five long years of anxious groping, they went, as they came, in the dark.

At what price, friends, shall we estimate the value of light? Light is that which gives value to all else, but itself is beyond all value. Not without profound meaning has Swedenborg made light symbolize truth. In the inventory of human possessions, truth is the most precious of them all; yet he who has come to prize the truth above life itself, and is willing to sacrifice all for it, gets from his fellow-men to-day the fool's cap-and-bells, as once the martyr's crown. Let a man postpone his private gain in the furtherance of an unpopular cause,—let him despise emolument and wed ideas for better or for worse,—let him devote his energies, not to the accumulation of money, but to the advocacy of truths that clash with public prejudice or policy,—and, until he conquers success, he passes for an incendiary or a lunatic. In what age has truth not been a foot-ball for the populace? Yet every man whom God has endowed with the power of thought, even though he has not strength of character enough to raise himself out of the mire of practical obedience to falsehood, must still, like our two members of Congress, yearn for truth's holy light. He may fill his eyes with mud, but he cannot forget that eyes were made for seeing,—cannot but groan over his blindness, albeit self-caused. Whoever rises in the scale of being above the level of the horse, which esteems a quart of oats the "highest good," must, in virtue of his very nature, be moved by inward cravings for the bread of truth. "What shall I do for you?" said a faithful son, bending over the bed of his expiring father,—“how shall I soothe your dying hour?” “Give me a great thought, my son!” was the faintly whispered reply; “give me only a great thought!” The light of truth shall make luminous even the darkness of the grave,—shall shoot a ray across its black abyss, and paint on the very storm-clouds of death the rainbow-arch of a divine and resplendent hope. We are all cowards in the dark; the apprehension of a peril against which one knows not how to guard, unstrings the stoutest sinews. But strike a light,—and the fear that was burglariously entering the heart takes to its heels. The light of truth is the secret of moral courage: the soul of every hero is illumined by the “candle of the Lord.”

Yes, that is what we want—the “candle of the Lord” to shine upon our path, and make plain the road. We can dispense with all beside; but this is indispensable. “Property and standing” may be good things; but we can get along without them. Fashion and fame may be good things; but we can get along without them, too. It is truth, light, the “candle of the Lord,” that we must have, or else find all these a curse. Where, then, shall the “candle of the Lord” be found?

“In the Tabernacle of Jehovah,” said Moses. So in the first apartment of the Tabernacle, opposite the table of shew-bread, up went the great golden candlestick, five feet high, three and a half feet broad, and worth thirty-five thousand dollars in green-backs. To symbolize either the seven planets or the seven days of the week, it branched into seven massive arms of gold, and shone all night in the “Holy Place” with a sevenfold radiance. Representing, as scholars say, the light of the law given to the Jews by Moses, it was the visible Hebrew religion, the ever-during pillar of fire that guided the “chosen people” through the wilderness of life. What better “candle of the Lord” could any man desire? Alas, the Chaldeans stole it, and carried it off to Babylon; the Romans stole it, and bore it in triumph through the streets of Rome before the victorious Titus. Where it is now, no one can tell. A better “candle of the Lord” than this must be found, or poor humanity will stumble in perpetual midnight. Where, then, if not in the Jewish temple?

“In the Church of Christ,” says the Apocalypse. So believers turned to the seven churches of Asia, as the seven branches of the new sacred candlestick of the Church; and they bowed down before him who “stood in the midst, with seven stars in his hand, with eyes like a flame of fire, and with feet like fine brass burning in the furnace.” They remembered the saying of their Master,—“Ye are the light of the world;” and, losing its finer meaning, took the Church of Christ as the “candle of the Lord.”

A great and stately candlestick has it been, burning with powerful blaze through eighteen centuries, and standing still, in the eyes of Christendom, as the eternal beacon-light of truth. Doubtless it has lighted many a darkened soul upon its way, and will yet light many another. But, in the eyes of maturing humanity, its lustre burns dim, and radiates darkness as well as light. The church has degraded and denied the truth that should have been its inspiration. It has been a great persecuting power from the earliest ages; the blood of countless victims, shed by Romish priests and Genevan ministers, stains its garments; the guilt of obstructing every great reform lies at its door; the continuance of many a baleful oppression, like the conservation of human slavery, has been part of its unhallowed work: and to-day the onward march of civilization is checked in many ways by its paralyzing influence. Building on his mistakes rather than on his truths, the Church that calls itself by the name of Christ has betrayed and reversed the best spirit of Jesus, and, as an institution, stands to-day between mankind and the rising sun. The long night is passing away at last; and in the increasing daylight of modern civilization this “candle of the Lord” burns with pale and smoky gleam. The long wick hangs black and sooty over the candle's edge, the wax runs melting down its side, the flame flickers and flares in every gust; and where are the snuffers that shall revive its feeble light? Is there a drearier spectacle than that of a lamp still burning in the hour of dawn? Not, this, surely, is the “candle of the Lord.”

Neither Jewish Tabernacle nor Christian Church, neither the Law nor the Gospel, is that “candle of the Lord” without which the path of humanity is wrapped in night. These have been candles of human manufacture, and have well served in the exigencies of transient needs. But the day is passing by, when man can walk by any outward light. From the very beginning, whoever has spoken profoundly in this matter has more or less clearly proclaimed the truth, that every form of outward light is but a reflected ray of the inner light. The writer of the book of Proverbs doubtless spoke a truth deeper than he himself comprehended, when he penned the saying I have taken for a motto:—“The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord.” Neither the Tabernacle nor the Church, neither the Law nor the Gospel, but the spirit of man, which created these two, is the true revelation of duty and of God. Faith in Man, coming to consciousness of its own divine origin and nature, shall supersede these penny-candles of the night, and in imperial glory mount up the skies as the rising sun of a new epoch,—the candle which God has kindled in the heavens to rule the day. When every man has learned to trust and obey the inner light of his own spirit, if ever that halcyon time arrives, a flood of sunshine will irradiate the world, and the dark shadows of ignorance, superstition and vice will flee like ghosts before the dawn. That inner light of God, shining in each heart as personal conscience and reason, needs but to be allowed to shine out into the world in our daily words and deeds, to transform the world's moral midnight into “sacred, high, eternal noon.” The “spirit of man is the candle of the Lord,” sufficient, if we will but trust it, to guide us in perfect safety through all perils, and to dissipate every cloud that spreads obscurity over the way.

Am I understood? The Jewish Law, as it stands in the Bible, was an imperfect product of the human mind, not a system handed down out of the clouds from God. It was useful in its time, but its time has passed; and the expansion of the human spirit compelled it to break its self-imposed fetter of the Mosaic Law. Doubtless, all Christians will admit without dissent that the so-called “Mosaic Dispensation” has passed away, to make room for higher truth. But no Christian will admit what I regard as equally sure,—namely, that what is called the “Christian Dispensation” is also passing away, to make room for still higher truth. The Christian Gospel, taking it as it stands in the Bible, is quite as truly as the Mosaic Law an imperfect product of the human mind, not a system given to man by Divine Authority. It has its limitations and its fundamental errors, and the further expansion of the human spirit is compelling it to break the yoke which it has itself created. Neither in the Law nor in the Gospel can we find a guide, for the simple reason that there can be no guide outside the soul itself. Superior to every outward guide must be the inward guide of the individual conscience and reason. Take the Law and the Gospel for precisely what they are worth; but still maintain your spiritual independence over everything that is without. They may be useful servants, but they make despotic masters. Profound reverence and trust in the nature God has given us as his deepest and divinest revelation of himself, of our duty, and of our destiny, is the very corner-stone of a faith that cannot be shaken. There is no other faith that can stand the shocks of modern science, or of intimate knowledge of the laws of the universe. The moment we try to lean on anything whatever outside our own nature, on anything whatsoever but the indwelling yet universal Light, we are liable to be pierced as by a broken reed. The Mosaic Dispensation is not the "candle of the Lord," neither is the Christian Dispensation; the Law is not that candle, neither is the Gospel. But the spirit of man, the Dispensation of the Soul, the inner "light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world,"—that is the "candle of the Lord," and he is the truly wise man who dares to live by its light,—to stand upright before the heavens and the earth, and act out in sturdy independence the dictates of his own soul. If we cannot trust ourselves, I know not whom or what to trust; but, trusting ourselves, I believe that we are trusting in God. Through the still, small voice within, must we interpret the highest law of universal nature.

THE AMBITION OF JESUS.

[By Rev. R. H. Howard, in the N. Y. Christian Advocate (Meth.) for March 31.]

It will be recollected by some of our readers that a Mr. Abbot, formerly a Unitarian preacher at Dover, N. H., has formally renounced the Christian name, and committed himself to the teachings of pure Theism. No longer regarding Jesus as a Saviour, as the object of his supreme heart-allegiance, unlike many of his former ministerial brethren, he has had the manliness and honesty to lay aside the name and profession of Christian. If it should be the devil to whose service he has committed himself, he would have at least the consolation of knowing that he has not stolen the livery of heaven to serve him in. One cannot but honor this unflinching honesty, however much we may deplore the spiritual blindness of this singularly gifted young man.

Under the circumstances, we cannot but be deeply interested to know in what respect, or respects, this professed Deist takes exception to the claims of Jesus as the absolutely "perfect man." He finds but one infirmity in him—that "last infirmity of noble minds"—he was ambitious. Mr. Abbot speaks with the utmost reverence of Jesus. He is none of your foul-mouthed scoffers, like Parker. More reverent far than Higginson, Frothingham, Weiss, or Emerson, he is yet, if possible, a more pronounced Deist than either. As already intimated, his principal charge against Jesus is that he was ambitious. Not that he was selfishly ambitious: his ambition was purely unselfish. His ambition was to reign in the hearts of men; to reign not by force, but by love; to reign not by being served, but by serving. Still he was ambitious to reign. Than this ambition thus to reign by serving there is but one thing higher or sublimer, and that is, to serve without reigning. He says:—

The true originality of Jesus lies, I conceive, in the means he adopted to accomplish his end and realize his ambition. Here he stands alone. Strange as it may seem, he aimed to win absolute power by absolutely renouncing it. This is the identification of contradictories—the very Hegelianism of conscience. With a new conception of what constitutes true royalty of soul, he sought to earn his kingship by the more than regal majesty of his service. The "great Masters" have been rare, indeed; yet how much rarer have been the great Servants! It is the grandest and most original trait in Jesus's character that he sought to realize his supreme Mastership through a supreme Servantship. Here also I find the secret of his wonderful success in subduing souls to his sway. He would govern, yet through love; he would secure absolute allegiance, yet bind men to it by the spontaneous outgrowth of their own gratitude; he would wear a crown, yet bow his head to receive it from the hands of subjects burning with eagerness to place it there. Thus, and thus alone, he aspired to reign, the welcome sovereign of every human soul.

What astounding, yet sublime audacity! How mean, compared with this, the ambition of Alexanders and Cæsars! How brutal is the ambition that relies on force, compared with the ambition that relies on love! Yet, because it involved his own elevation to a throne, albeit a spiritual throne, his ambition was ambition still, the "last infirmity" of a noble mind. It precluded the possibility of self-forgetfulness in service—of that supreme modesty which teaches that the value of the grandest soul is not personal, but inheres in the universal humanity it contains and the universal ideas it represents. There is but one ambition sublimer than to reign by serving—and that is, to serve without reigning.

We regret that we have not the data upon which Mr. Abbot bases this charge. We have read the Gospels through a great many times, and we have never been able to find any trace of this infirmity he speaks of; and the fact that the great bulk, if not indeed the whole of the wisest and best, the saintliest and most useful men and women that have ever lived, have been unable to discover any trace of this infirmity in the character of Jesus, should, it seems to us, be regarded as presumptive proof by Mr. Abbot that the fault or defect must be in himself.

Christ says concerning himself, that he came to seek and to save them that were lost. To this end he sought to establish his own personal influence, and the influence of the truth which he illustrated, as a kingdom in the hearts of men. Through the conservative and reformatory influence of that truth he aimed to subvert the kingdom of error, of wrong, of sin, and ultimately redeem man to righteousness. And we submit whether the success of the enterprise has not vindicated the wisdom of the plan, the excellency of the agencies employed.

It is undeniable that Christianity is not only one of the great religions of the world, but is associated with the highest form of civilization, the most advanced and advancing culture, and best morality. It is the religion of the most powerful nations of the globe, and is the sole source of that philanthropy, that blessed missionary genius, that, like a soft south wind of love, is breathing over the whole face of the earth. If the Gospel was ever so divine, if Jesus was ever so perfect, what more, what differently could he do than he has done?

And having this work to introduce, to establish, we cannot possibly see how it could have been done more moderately, more meekly, more unambitiously. We wonder that Mr. Abbot has not allowed his mind and heart to be influenced by the consideration we have just hinted at, rather than by those of an abstract or speculative character. There are various kinds of evidence. By far the most satisfactory is, that which is derived from the legitimate outcome of given doctrines. This is the kind of evidence the Saviour recommended. "By their fruits ye shall know them. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Is it not legitimate to conclude that that religion which will do the most good, make people the happiest and best, yield the most abundant harvest of manhood, is the divinest? Let Mr. Abbot contrast the experience and usefulness of John Wesley and his followers with the experience and success of such men as John Sterling, Blanco White, and Tom Paine. Let him consider who are the men and women that to-day are threading the lanes of poverty in our great cities to carry glad tidings of human sympathy and hope to the outcast and the fallen, and who are the self-sacrificing men and women that are visiting the utmost verge of the green earth, often encompassed with cold, nakedness, and want, to diffuse the blessings of civilization. A converted skeptic gives the following significant testimony: "I was a skeptic, but this scene discovered a new world of thought to me. As I travelled on my lonely way I never saw a church in the little villages that were stationed thirty miles apart, with no intervening civilization, but the thought arose, 'Who is this man, that he can do these wonderful things?' Voltaire's sneers, the arguments of Hume, the ribaldry of Paine, vanished like maternal mist in the effort to reply. For see, sixty generations have come and gone since, in an obscure and lonely village of a remote and despised province of the Roman Empire, was born of poor Jewish parents a man who, though without culture, social position, or political power, uttered words that have since moulded the lives of the greatest, most powerful, the best, the wisest, aye, and the vilest also of the most enlightened continents of the globe. History, since this young man died, has been a mere record of the struggles either to assert or to resist his dominion. He left no written word; yet the human race has bowed before the report of His sayings by the waysides of Galilee, and the deserts of Judea, to a group of fishermen, and crowds of the despised of earth. I never saw a church in these frontier settlements, and considered the civilization that invariably sprung up, garden-like, round about them, without feeling a sense of awe as I thought of the origin of the religion it represented. Scenes like these and thoughts like these opened the heart to reply in the words of earnest Peter:—'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God!' Now, then, does not Mr. Abbot and those like him owe it to themselves in like manner to open their hearts to influences like these? What, indeed, is the sense of higgling about and stumbling over miracles, in the technical sense of the term, when here, right before our face and eyes, is this stupendous miracle, the Christian Church, and our Christian civilization, unaccounted for? In what other way surely can the secret of this unparalleled success be explained than on the supposition that Christianity is divine?

Mr. Abbot writes like a man profoundly sincere, and with a mind open to conviction. There is something almost plaintive in the following sentences. Certainly we should sympathize with, rather than denounce, the man who speaks with such inflexions of sadness as this:—

However some may yearn, having lost all faith in the Messianic idea, to retain nevertheless the Christian name, whether from love for its venerable associations, or from reluctance to bear the odium of its distinct rejection, I believe that the proprieties of language and increasing perception of what consistency requires will slowly wean them from this desire. The world at large can never be made to understand what is meant by a Christian who in no sense has faith in the Christ. If Jesus really claimed to be the Christ, if he made this claim the basis of the Christian religion, and if through this claim he still infuses into his Church all its Christian life, then the world is right, and may well marvel at a Christianity that denies the Lord, yet wears his livery. For myself, I cannot evade the practical consequences of my thought. The central doctrine of Christianity is for me no longer true, its essential spirit and faith are no longer the highest or the best, and with the reality I resign the name. Far be it from me to do this in levity, or mockery, or defiance! Far be it from me to turn my back in scorn on my own most hallowed experiences in the past! Once I felt the full power of the Christian faith; now I cleave to a faith diviner still. If I am in fatal error, and rush madly into the woes denounced against the Antichrist, even so must it be; but, come what may, let me never plunge into the deeper damnation of moral faithlessness, nor make my heart the coffin of a murdered truth.

God grant that this, as we think, deceived, misguided young man may yet see that there are truths of the heart more precious even than any truths of the head; that there is such a thing as the Gospel of salvation being hid, in consequence of the understanding not having been colored or magnetized, so to speak, by religious emotion; that truth, full-orbed, will satisfy the heart as well as the intellect, give us peace, joy, hope—a happy, earnest, enthusiastic devotion to the self-denying duties of life. May he grant, finally, that, in answer to humble, believing prayer, this vigorous thinker and earnest soul may yet be blest with such an "intuition of Jesus," as Neander calls it, as shall lead him joyfully to exclaim, "Credo," "I do believe!" "My Lord and my God!"

CHARLES H. READ AND THE FACULTY OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

[We find the following correspondence in the April number of The Iconoclast, a new liberal paper just started in Washington, D. C., and published monthly at fifty cents a year.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 5, 1870.

To the Faculty of Harvard University:

SIRS:—The undersigned take the liberty of sending you the enclosed hand-bill of Mr. Charles H. Read, and respectfully call your attention to the last paragraph of the same, in which an allusion to you is made, and your names, or at least some of them, are attached.*

We are inquirers, and have no object in view but to ascertain the truth in respect to this matter. We have seen Mr. R. perform, some of us under quite favorable circumstances, and can but confess our inability to account for many things done by him upon any known scientific principles. Still, aware as we are of the extent to which tricks of deception are practised, we do not feel authorized to declare that these may not be classed in this category, and are anxious to have the opinion of those more learned in science, and who have enjoyed better opportunities for investigation. We should therefore be especially gratified if you would be pleased to answer for us the following questions:—

1. Is the statement made in the paragraph alluded to of Mr. Read's hand-bill correct in substance?

2. Had Mr. R. any authority to attach the names there signed?

3. Were the results of your investigations published, as he states, in the Boston Commercial Advertiser, or any other paper, and if so, of what date?

Mr. Read states that he appeared seven times before you; that you placed him upon a glass floor, tied him with a silk cord, sewed him up in a sack, and did many other things to test the phenomena, but that they took place notwithstanding. To give these statements credence we require something more than his testimony; but if they are true, your confirmation of them would be worth more to us than even the testimony of our own senses. Any general statements on your part with regard to these matters will be thankfully received.

In conclusion we desire to re-assure you that we are prompted to this action by no other motives than those of pure scientific inquiry, and desirous neither of proving nor disproving any pre-existing theories of our own, either in physics, metaphysics or religion. We have no doubt that these phenomena take place in accordance with natural laws, and we only desire to know whether, in your opinion, (provided you have made the experiments alleged,) these laws are among those already known, but disguised by the dexterity of the performer; or whether they are to be classed among those (of which there are still doubtless many) which science has not yet been able to deduce and define. Hoping you may not deem our demands unreasonable, and may, as far as practicable, accede to them, we respectfully subscribe ourselves

HARVARD COLLEGE,)
CAMBRIDGE, Mass., 11th April, 1870. }

Messrs. Ward, and others:

GENTLEMEN:—I remember that Prof. Wyman, who is now in Europe, mentioned to me some time last year, that he was present, with other gentlemen of Cambridge, at the house of Prof. Treadwell, in which a man who professed to be tied and untied in some mysterious manner, and who went through the usual programme of that character at first with success, found himself unable to repeat the performance when he was tied with simple spool cotton; and again, when a piece of sticking-plaster was put over the knot.

Since receiving your note I have written to Prof. Eustis, who was also present on that occasion, and who writes me, "that no doubt was left in the mind of any one that it was a simple trick of slipping the hands out and replacing them." He thinks the man's name was Read, but does not feel sure on that point. "The spool cotton, with a simple tie around each wrist, and more than a foot slack, with no other fastening, was thoroughly disheartening to the spirits, and they abandoned the field."

Prof. Wyman told me nothing of "insulation," "silk cord," "sewing up in a sack," and I entirely discredit each item of the story.

Truly yours,

E. W. GURNEY,

Dean of the Faculty.

*NOTE.—The following is the paragraph which appears on the hand-bill alluded to:—

"Mr. Read has appeared before eighteen of the Professors of Harvard, and they pronounce his exhibition one of the most wonderful they have ever witnessed; and that the manifestations were satisfactory to them—although they could not account for them upon scientific principles—Prof. Treadwell, Prof. Agassiz, Prof. Eustis, Dr. Wyman.

"LIBERTY MAKES BROTHERS OF US ALL."—During a stay of a few months abroad in 1862, I visited Ireland, and spent a day in Dublin. I felt a special interest in that city, connected as it was with the memory of the many struggles of the liberty-loving Irish for political freedom. Moreover, in the days when O'Connell and his companions pleaded for "the Repeal of the Union," I tried my Yankee tongue in advocating the claims of Ireland. Hence I felt the greatest interest in anything connected with the memory of "the Great Agitator," and at my earliest moment paid a visit to the ground where he lies buried. It was a plain vault in the hillside of the cemetery, for I was told by the old sexton that a beautiful monument, then in course of erection in another part of the yard, was for O'Connell.

As I stood in front of the iron door which hid all that was mortal of "the Great Commoner," I noticed a mound close by with a cheap, plain slab at the head of it, on which was this inscription:—"Sacred to the Memory of Thomas Steel, who departed this life—, aged —," I well remember Tom Steel (for we nickname those whom we love—as we say Tom Moore and Bobbie Burns), and if my reading was correct, he died a martyr for liberty. So I turned to the old man who stood by as I read aloud the brief record of the stone, and asked, with an assumed tone of surprise:—

"Was not Steel a heretic?"

"Faith, he was!" responded the man with great emphasis.

"And," said I, "is not this consecrated ground?"

"Indeed, it is," he answered.

"And was not Daniel O'Connell a good and faithful son of Holy Mother Church?" I continued.

"He was," he responded. "Didn't he have the blessing of the Pope himself?"

"Now," said I, "I am a heretic, and a heretic priest; but I judge you from your own standpoint. Why do you let a heretic lie in sacred ground?"

I never knew the quick wit, proverbial of the nation, to fail in an answer; but I never heard a better answer than that day fell from the lips of the old sexton.

"You see," said he, "Daniel O'Connell was for liberty!"

"He was the great agitator," I replied.

"And you know Tom Steel was for liberty?"

"He was a martyr," said I.

And then with a look and tone beyond my description, he added:—

"You know liberty makes brothers of us all!"

I took the dear old patriot's Roman Catholic hand, and shaking hands over Steel's grave, I repeated the eloquent declaration of my dear brother:—"Liberty makes brothers of us all!"

That is the grand key-note of true political union—North, South, East, West. And the heart which does not echo the voice sounding from the cemetery in Dublin, whether it throbs under fustian or satin, is the heart of a traitor or tyrant. I thought the old sexton had sounded the watchword for our nation; and not for ours only, but all who love liberty.—Rev. T. H. Smith, in Hearth and Home.

RELIGIOUS HALLUCINATION.

The Lancaster, (Pa.) Intelligencer says:—

A most singular case of religious hallucination, resulting fatally, occurred in East Lampeter township, on Saturday last. A young man named Jacob Harnish, about seventeen years old, residing near Midway, on the Lancaster and Strasburg pike, deliberately cut off his own leg with a hatchet. It appears that for some time past his mind had been deeply exercised on the subject of religion, and he spent his spare moments in reading the Bible. On Saturday morning he worked on the farm as usual, and at noon unhitched his team, put the horses in the stable, threw some hay down from the mow, and told another lad to feed the horses. He then went to the wood-yard, took off the boot and stocking from the right foot, and laying it across a log, deliberately cut it off above the ankle by striking it three heavy blows with a sharp hatchet. He then picked up the dissected foot, threw it away, and composedly sat down on the log. His mother, who was not far off, witnessed the operation, but had not the remotest idea of his intention until it was too late to prevent it. His father, who was on the farm, was immediately summoned, and seeing his son bleeding to death, asked him why he committed the act. In reply, he said he had done it in obedience to the command of the Savior, who had said:—"If thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off and cast them from thee; it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire." Surgical aid was procured as soon as possible, chloroform was administered by Drs. D. Musser, Jacob Musser, and Jacob Weaver, and every effort made to save the young man's life, but the fearful loss of blood from the severed arteries had been such that he died shortly after the arrival of the surgeons. While the surgeons were operating, the effect of the chloroform passed off, and young Harnish, awakening, looked at the mangled limb without showing any signs of pain. He told Dr. Musser before he died that he was sorry for what he had done, though he thought at the time he was doing right. Until the commission of the present act he has never been suspected of any tendency to insanity or monomania. His parents are very intelligent, respectable and pious people, belonging to the new religious denomination known as New Mennonites. We have not heard in what manner, or for what reason the deceased supposed his foot to have "offended."

ON THE DEFENSIVE.

[From Zion's Herald, Boston.]

The course of discourses on "Christianity and Skepticism," delivered in this city this winter, by Congregationalist scholars chiefly, has been of excellent use. The chief themes of debate have been ably handled. If any mistake occurred, it was in striking too much at Comte, Huxley, Spencer, Lessing, European infidels, and neglecting those at our own door. A series against the errors of Horticultural and Music Halls, reviews of Parker, Emerson, Alger, and Frothingham, of all sorts of modern and present Antichrist, would have been more popular and profitable. We hope the success of this course will lead to a catholic course on "American and Boston Skepticism," next winter. Let the list be made up of popular speakers and writers in our vicinity, of all Christian denominations, who shall handle free love, spiritualism, free religion, and all the phases of unbelief, in their sharpest and handsomest style. Among the speakers, let us have Parks, Brooks, Warren, Fulton, Townsend, McDonald, Webb, Manning, Chapman, and such. We have had the theological and metaphysical doctors, now give us the popular.

WOMEN AS PHYSICIANS.

Those who doubt the capacity of women to acquire a thorough medical education, ought to have attended the examination of students at the woman's college of New York, the last week in March. The committee of able physicians who conducted the examination, testified that they never met with better classes nor attended a better examination. Large numbers of well educated ladies are entering the profession yearly, and in our cities they are getting very respectable patronage. If male physicians would now do themselves the honor of welcoming them to medical associations, so as to give them the benefit of the experience and discussions brought out in those bodies, it would be no more than just and fair in them, and would prove to be very helpful to those ladies who are struggling against prejudice and ignorance to win reputation, place, and usefulness in this profession. Why don't they do it? Why should they wish to monopolize all the advantages of the profession?—Morning Star.

THE AMERICAN BISHOPS.—Among all the champions of ultramontanism none are more consistently vehement than the American bishops, who sign everything in favor of Infallibility that is presented, and canvass for votes among those whose opinions are supposed to be wavering. Their last act has been to unite with that portion of the French clergy most devoted to Roman interests, in another postulatum, demanding the solemn condemnation, by the Council, of the Gallican party, which they propose shall be declared heretical. It will really be a pity if so much labor should prove to be in vain, and after all, no American prelate should carry home a red hat, yet it is quite possible that in the next consistory they may be left out in the cold. The United States are so very far from Rome that a resident cardinal could not get across the water in time to be of any use on any important occasion, such for instance as the election immediately succeeding the death of a pope; and then Pius IX. is not perfectly sure that such an appointment would be looked upon with favor by the great mass of the American people. He recollects the not particularly pleasant reception given to a monsignore who was sent out as a nuncio some years ago, and he does not want to make another mistake of the same kind; so that Monsignor Spaulding, Purcell, McCloskey and Kenrick will in all probability be told by Antonelli: Non possumus!—N. Y. Evening Post.

MEN WANTED.—The great want of this age is men, Men who are not for sale. Men who are honest, sound from centre to circumference, true to the heart's core. Men who will condemn wrong in friend or foe, in themselves as well as others. Men whose consciences are as steady as the needle to the pole. Men who will stand for the right if the heavens totter and the earth reels. Men who can tell the truth and look the world and the devil right in the eye. Men that neither flag nor flinch. Men who can have courage without shouting to it. Men who know their places and fill them. Men who know their own business. Men who will not lie. Men who are not too lazy to work, nor too proud to be poor. Men who are willing to eat what they have earned, and wear what they have paid for. These are the men to move the world!—Seaside Oracle.

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.—The adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution is the fulfilment of the prophecy of Alexander H. Stephens in the Georgia State Convention of January, 1861, when he declared that the Government had given the South "Louisiana, Florida, and Texas, out of which four States have been carved, and we might spread the institution of slavery—and ample territory for four more to be added in due time." "If by this unwise and impolitic act you destroy this hope, you perhaps lose it all, and have your last slave wrenched from you by stern military rule, as South America and Mexico were; or by the vindictive decree of universal emancipation which may reasonably be expected to follow."—Toledo Blade.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"My copy of THE INDEX, which greets me weekly, has found its way in spite of its incorrect address, which should read Miss instead of Mr., as has sometimes been the case. Yes, I belong to the feminine sex, and although only a young girl, not yet out of my teens, I read with eager and ever-increasing interest the words of true Radicalism and rational thought, unwarping by bias or tradition,—words so grateful to one who has been groping for the truth, seeking to find expression for thoughts, and who, though void of power to originate, can recognize and appreciate them when uttered. The organs of our Unitarian denomination have done something—have done much, toward liberalizing the people; but their position has been rather an anomalous one; groping with one hand for the New, the True, they have yet clung with the other to the skirts of the Old, the Traditional,—unable through fear or lack of strength to take the bold leap which would send them far on in the direction of that ultimatum towards which you press with steps unflinching. The Radical, which also finds an entrance into our home, is a kindred spirit, full of fine and stirring thoughts, and has accomplished much. Although but a little girl at the time of the National Conference, at Syracuse, which I attended with great interest, I remember well your earnest pleading of your cause; and understanding better, as I now do, all that your words implied, I rejoice that the embryonic plant has germinated into such fruition. May you ever, as now, be animated by the spirit of fearless yet reverential inquiry which suffers you, untrammelled by the superstitions and terrors of the incurious hordes, to lift the veil from off this Isis, knowing that to the immortal soul it is permitted to look on Truth."

—"I am a Spiritualist, and believe with regard to spiritualism as the old man did with regard to matrimony, 'It is what we have all got to come to.' Now from orthodox to spiritualism is rather too big a jump for most people to take without something to step on between the two, and I think THE INDEX will make an excellent stepping-stone from orthodoxy to spiritualism. At any rate it will be a great help to what we most need—mental freedom. Your enterprise is a good one and I wish you success."

—"I was very much 'taken' with No. 7, and think I shall peruse the succeeding numbers with increased pleasure and profit. I am on the platform 'fair and square,' and it is the only one that meets with my unqualified approbation. I am ready and more than willing to co-operate with you in holding up the banner of religious freedom in our midst entirely unshackled and untrammelled."

—"I sincerely wish it was in my power to append a long list to the single name I send you at this time. I shall, however, lose no opportunity to say a good word for your paper, whose success in all respects I earnestly desire."

—"I hope you are getting all the subscribers which it deserves. Fresh, strong and reverent, it ought to achieve instant and great success."

—"I congratulate you, and the world at large, that religion at last addresses itself to man's understanding instead of his fears."

LOCAL NOTICES.

The First Independent Society meets every Sunday morning, at 10½ o'clock, in the church on the corner of Adams and Superior streets. Sunday School at 12. The public are cordially invited to attend.

The Radical Club will meet in the same place, at 7½ o'clock, Sunday evening, May 1. Subject for discussion—"Should radicals in religion organize, or favor organized action, for the spread of liberal principles and ideas?" The public are invited.

The Free Evening School for men and boys will hold its closing session for the season on Friday evening, April 29. The Industrial school for girls held its last session Saturday afternoon, April 23. Both schools have been successful and well sustained, beyond the expectation of their projectors; and the sincerest thanks are returned to all who have helped sustain them. It is intended to re-open both schools early in the autumn with better accommodations; and little doubt is felt that they will become permanent institutions. Mrs. F. A. Jones has kindly volunteered to continue the instruction of a limited number of scholars twice a week during the summer.

I. CHAOS.

The transformations of created things,—
Be this my theme. Smile on my arduous task,
O favoring gods! (for by your will divine
Each wondrous change was wrought), and grant that I,
From Nature's birth down to the passing hour,
May tell the secrets of the shadowy past
In one unbroken and harmonious song.

Ere earth and sea and, canopy of all,
The o'er-arching vault of heaven their being had,
The face of Nature one drear likeness wore,
Rough, without form, which mortals Chaos named.
The jarring elements of matter, thrown Into disorder, waged unceasing war.
No radiant sun had yet illumed the globe;
No milder moon refilled her wasted horns;
Nor had the solid earth suspended hung,
Self-balanced, midst the clear and ambient air;
Nor had the billowy sea within its arms
Embraced the islands and the lengthened shores;
But mingled all in one were earth, sea, sky.

"THE AMBITION OF JESUS."

On our second page will be found an article with the above heading contributed to the New York Christian Advocate, the leading paper, we believe, of the great Methodist denomination. Its author, Rev. Mr. Howard, of Brookfield, Mass., manifests towards one whom he calls a "Deist" such a kindness of feeling and such an unfeigned desire for his return to the Christian fold,—such an absence of the bitter, intolerant, and condemnatory spirit of which we have seen too many instances of late,—that we confess to having felt deeply touched. If anything but a change in our convictions could win us back to the Christian Church, it would surely be such treatment as this. We shall not, however, discuss now the general question of the ambition of Jesus; Mr. Howard's article has awakened a different train of thought in our mind, and we take this occasion of saying something we have long desired to say, yet have hitherto postponed saying for reasons that will be readily understood.

We refer to the expression of confidence in our "honesty." Many of our orthodox and semi-orthodox critics have taken particular pains to emphasize this point, and disclaim all intention of insinuating suspicions of insincerity on our part. Instead of confining themselves to the main question, and discussing the issues raised on their merits alone, they have felt it necessary to disclaim all purpose of attacking our personal character, and to state again and again that they cast no imputations on our integrity because of our opinions.

Now while fully appreciating the chivalrous sentiment which leads such critics to avow their belief in the uprightness of one who advocates unpopular ideas, we submit that the necessity for such an avowal is a most significant and disgraceful fact. Why should we not be "honest"? Is honesty so rare that it must be set under a glass case and put on exhibition? Or does the presumption of dishonesty lie against every man who dares to think and speak for himself? What need is there thus to defend the reputation of men charged with no offence against good morals?

The fact is, that Christianity has created a public opinion which condemns as morally wrong every departure from orthodoxy. The Catholic Church used to burn unbelievers because unbelief was wicked; and the Protestant Churches to-day hold that heresy has its real root in a depraved state of the heart. Sincere and logical Christians, whether Catholic or Protestant, cannot help believing that something is morally wrong with every one who dissents from the Christian standards of faith,—that faith in Christ is an absolute duty of every man,—that lack of faith in Christ is, of itself, turpitude and sin in the sight of God. The logic of the Christian system constrains them to accept these conclusions; the spirit of the Christian system creates a public sentiment in harmony with them. Belief in Christianity is a duty,—disbelief in it is a crime. That is the deep, underlying, fundamental principle on which the Christian Church rests, has always rested, and always will rest.

That is the reason why we have had so many advocates against the unwritten yet real indictment of the Christian public. The very officiousness of the defence proves the existence of the accusation. Our defenders have come forward in purest kindness and with most generous motives; but we protest against indictment and defence together. — Honest! Who but a bigot dares to doubt that we are honest? Who dares to question our honesty, but the slave of a despotic system? If, turning the tables, we were to approach Rev. Mr. Howard, for instance, and say—"Sir, notwithstanding the fact that you are a Christian, we do assure you that we have perfect confidence in your integrity, and mean to proclaim this fact far and wide in the public papers,"—Mr. Howard might justly charge us with insulting him. Wherein do the two cases differ? Simply in this,—that liberalism brings no indictment against any man for his religious opinions, while Christianity indicts every man who has religious opinions of his own; and that Mr. Howard speaks against a real accusation, while we should speak against none. That is why the same act is a generous and friendly one in him, which would be a direct insult in us.

But we want no defence against this sort of charge. If any man chooses to denounce us for dishonesty simply because his religious convictions are not ours, we shall not stoop to answer him, and we are sick of hearing answers volunteered in our behalf. We hope never to hear another,—not because we fail to appreciate the kind intent, but because there is something humiliating in such defences.

We scorn the petty assumption that a non-Christian is necessarily a knave. It is not worthy even of a denial. Instead of compliments on our "honesty," let us have some strong thinking and plain speaking on the main question. We shall waste no time on any man who is too much of a bigot to take our "honesty" for granted.

We cannot close without expressing our regret that Mr. Howard should descend so far as to call Theodore Parker a "foul-mouthed scoffer," or to institute undeserved and untrue comparisons between "Higginson, Frothingham, Weiss, or Emerson," and ourself. Whoever finds irreverence for aught that is good or great in any one of these men, must certainly have identified reverence with superstition. If the charge of irreverence lies against such as these, we count it a disgrace not to be included in the indictment.

WOMAN AND THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The Revolution of April 14, has the following sentence in a letter from Mrs. Stanton:—

"The Fifteenth Amendment, the great moral measure on which the Republican party specially plumes itself, is the establishment of an aristocracy of sex, reducing woman to the condition of a serf, practically placing the wives, mothers and daughters of this republic under a foreign yoke."

Supposing that we had for a long time owed Mrs. Stanton a thousand dollars, and should call to-morrow to pay her five hundred dollars of the debt, would she call that partial payment a repudiation of the other five hundred? Would she not regard the payment of part as an indication that in good time we should pay the whole? Such certainly would be the common-sense view of the matter. Now that is precisely the case with the Fifteenth Amendment. It is a partial payment, made by the United States, of a long outstanding debt due to humanity. The United States owes the exercise of suffrage to the whole people, of all colors and both sexes. The Fifteenth Amendment, being a partial discharge of the obligation, is the best possible pledge that ultimately the whole debt will be paid.

When it is said that this Amendment "establishes" an aristocracy of sex, and "reduces" woman to the condition of a serf, the statement implies that hitherto no such aristocracy has existed, and that woman has previously occupied a higher position in the community. Neither of these implications is true. The new Amendment leaves the political status of woman unchanged; and instead of establishing an aristocracy of sex, it has simply destroyed an aristocracy of color. It therefore gives great cause for hope that before long the aristocracy of sex, which has existed from time immemorial and has been shaken to its foundations, not "established," by the overthrow of the aristocracy of color, will tumble also into ruins.
